THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE

"Patronage is a two-edged sword which cuts both ways. * * No dependence is to be placed on the allegiance of soldiers of fortune. * * Their service is mercenary. * * The people whom they pretend to represent consist merely of a knot, greater or smaller, of aspirants to office, useful chiefly in the dirty work of smothering the popular voice in primary elections and nominating conventions."—HENRY C. THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

"The reform of the civil service auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions, which lurk in the power of official patronage, may be wisely and effectively avoided."—Republican National Platform, 1888.

"The law should have the aid of a friendly interpretation, and be faithfully and vigorously enforced. All appointments under it should be absolutely free from partisan considerations and influence."—From President Harrison's Letter of Acceptance.

"Heads of departments, bureaus, and all other public officers having any duty in connection therewith, will be expected to enforce the civil service law fully and without evasion."—From President Harrison's Inaugural Address.

THE object of the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is to promote civil service reform, and, incidentally, other things pertaining to better administration. No one can look over the state of Indiana and say that the field is not wide. And so long as in the country at large over 100,000 federal offices are still used as mere spoil with which to reward personal and party service, the voice of protest must be raised. We ask the support of those who are interested in these subjects. The conductors of this paper do not believe that a party organization or a party name is a thing to be worshiped, but that a party is simply an instrument, and, like any other instrument, may wear out.

THOSE who receive this paper are earnestly urged to subscribe for it, if they have not already done so. The price is so low as to be within the means of every one desiring to help the cause of good government. The paper is not to make money. It must depend for support upon those who sympathize with its objects. We expect, however, to get a good many subscribers who do not sympathize with its objects. We think we can make it interesting to them, as they will find a certain kind of truth told here that will not be in the papers of their ordinary reading.

FOR four years Indiana has been a great agitating ground for civil service reform. It is admitted throughout the country that this agitation has materially advanced the cause. To repeat what is not disputed, the Indiana managers of the affairs of the late administration viewed the law and the reform as so much dirt, and, without the slightest regard to solemn promises, they proceeded accordingly. But from the beginning to the end they found this path beset with very ugly thorns. They must to-day, in the fires of defeat, look back over their course with small satisfaction. Whether they will now recognize, what is becoming daily more patent, that the spoils system is doomed, remains to be seen. Meanwhile the struggle in this state affords many valuable lessons which the new administration, for obvious reasons, ought to know by heart. We shall notice these lessons from time to time.

THE agitation against the misuse of the law has made many facts of administration clear. These are so staring that no executive desiring to enforce the law can ignore them. The first is the secrecy which now veils the execution of this law. It is a cloak for fraud. With a knavish politician or a tool of knavish politicians for a postmaster, and a knavish politician in control of the local board and local examinations, the thing is easy. Of what use is it for the public to know that an ignorant favorite of the postmaster, who reads with difficulty and writes with more difficulty, has not passed, since the rules permit the above-mentioned knaves to cut off the public with the cool statement that he has passed. Make the favorite's examination paper a public record, so that his neighbors can see whether or not it is in his hand-writing, and whether or not it is such a paper as he could possibly have made out, and one eminently practicable means of cheating the law will be cut off.

A SECOND staring fact is that the present system of local boards seems arranged to enable the head of an office, if so disposed, to manipulate the law. At present the board is formed from employes of the office after consultation with the head of the office, who has also the power to dismiss these employes at any time. The mere statement of the plan shows its innate worthlessness. A civil service commission afraid to do its duty adds to the difficulty. In 1885 a commissioner came to Indianapolis and allowed Postmaster Jones to select the local board. Thirty minutes' inquiry would have developed the fact that the choice was unfit. Yet through four years the commission was evidently too timid to correct its mistake.

A THIRD radical change, if promises of enforcement of the law are to be kept, will be in choosing heads of offices who are friendly to the law. Putting men who are mere politicians and nothing else, and who have only the views of mere politicians, enforcing this law is very like turning thieves into a bank. The average party politician has no stubborn opinion upon any subject except that his partisans should have the offices. He is, therefore, unalterably opposed to any law that seeks to reduce the transaction of public business to a business basis, and which therefore cuts off the use of subordinate places as spoils. To evade this law is not regarded as dishonorable among mere politicians. It is passed off by calling it "politics." When the democrats, four years ago, were laying their plans a local manager significantly said: "There is no penalty for not enforcing that law." The machinery of the law was directly or indirectly guided by petty politicians to whom civil service reform, or "civil service," as they call it, was a great joke. It can not be said that their management has resulted in much profit to themselves or to their party.

Now the republicans can make the same mistake or they can profit by the example. Let us have the utmost publicity. Let all the examination papers, all records and all lists of those who have passed be open to the public. Every community like a fair play, and when a competitor has fairly won the first place on the list he will have at his back the demand of his neighbors that he shall have the first appointment. There is more hope for civil service reform in this one change than in any other that can be made. Then let the machinery of the law, including the appointing power under it, be put into the hands of men who would consider it a dishonor to cheat the law, and the republican party is hardly aware of the moral and numerical strength which will rally to it. We may add that the worst possible head of an office is the respectable old izen who is ignorant of the law and who acts upon the theory that he can carry out the law and give the members of his party the preference.

IN the line of his duty, some eighteen months ago, Henry Cook was obliged to jump into the canal to save himself from a falling wall. The shock and exposure brought on an illness from which he never recovered and which will probably prove fatal. He has no means of support. The fire department has many other men who quietly perform the duty at hand and risk their lives for the people of this city. They do not stop to inquire the politics of the man whose factory is burning, but the people are less generous. They permit these men who are willing to peril their lives for the sake of earning small wages, until they become crippled or broken down, to face each day the possibility of removal because their politics do not suit a dozen petty politicians of this city. Thirteen democrats at present are allowed the privilege of earning their daily bread in an occupation requiring qualities we have been accustomed to honor in the soldier, but their chief, who declined to dismiss them because they were democrats, after thirty years of honorable service in the fire department of Indianapolis, was removed for that reason and against the wish of ninety-nine hundredths of the people of this city. This is what is called "practical civil service."

WILL MCKINNEY, of Indianapolis, called upon Postmaster-General Wanamaker this afternoon, in company with Colonel W. W. Dudley. "Mac" wants to succeed Gwynn as superintendent of the railway mail service at Cincinnati. Colonel Dudley remained with Mr. Wanamaker for some time, and afterwards informed McKinney that the appointment was as good as made, and that he (McKinney) would be the man.—Washington Dispatch to the Indianapolis News.

W. W. Dudley is under the charge of writing a letter which, if true, makes him morally, at least, a fit subject for the state prison. He seems afraid to meet this charge, and acts as though it were true. Under the circumstances, the postmaster-general of the United States would appear much better showing Dudley the door than counseling with him over appointments to office.

THE conference of civil service reformers which was held at Baltimore February 23, was probably the most important meeting of the kind ever held in this country. The large number in attendance from all parts of the country, the high character of the men, and their unmistakable earnestness demonstrate the strong and increased hold this reform has in this country.

It is interesting to note that the Maryland reformers, with great persistence and ability brought Senator Gorman and his party so near to defeat that a republican congressman has stated that if it were not for the approaching division of spoils, the republicans would carry Maryland at the next election. Full accounts of the meetings may be found in the Civil Service Reformer, of Baltimore, and in the Civil Service Record, of Boston, for March. Among those attending the conference were Charles J. Bonaparte, John C. Rose, Joseph Packard, Jr., Thomas B. Mackall, of Baltimore; Theodore Roosevelt, Rev. A. Mackay Smith, and E. L. Godkin, of New York; Ethan Allen Doty and William Potts, of Brooklyn; Henry A. Richmond, of Buffalo; Herbert Welsh, Joseph Parrish, Rev. J. Andrews Harris, Stuart Wood and James G. Francis, of Philadelphia; Robert N. Toppin, Morrill Wyman, Jr., and Richard H. Dana, of Cambridge; Arthur Hobart and Henry H. Sprague, of Boston; J. N. Swan, of Paxton, Ill.; Charles Claflin Allen, of St. Louis; Prof. J. A. Woodburn, of Bloomington; William D. Foulke, of Richmond; and Lucius B. Swift, of Indianapolis.

THE INDIANAPOLIS POSTOFFICE.

Since the comments in another column, relating to the appointment of heads of offices in the classified service were in type, President Harrison has nominated Mr. William Wallace to succeed Postmaster Jones in this city. We note the following utterances of Mr. Wallace, made after his nomination:

"What will your policy be in regard to the changes in the service?"

"The civil service law, as I understand it, was designed to put efficient men into office. Other things being equal, good republicans will be given preference when possible. If I thought I was to have no choice in the personnel of my subordinates I should not accept the office. It would be unjust to hold me responsible for acts of men in the appointment of whom I had no choice or option."—Indianapolis News interview, March 14.

"Do you propose to make a clean sweep?"

"I intend to obey the civil service laws. Of course, nothing in the law prevents the postmaster from discharging every employe. The civil service law provides how the employe shall get in and the postmaster decides how he shall get out. I am frank to say that republicans will be given the preference whenever a vacancy is to be filled."—Indianapolis Sentinel interview, March 15.

"The public may as well know from the beginning," said Mr. Wallace, "that as a life-long republican, I will always give republicans preference in my appointments, other things being equal. The colored people shall not be ignored either. There are certainly a number of positions which they shall have."—Indianapolis News interview, March 15.

There are fully one hundred places at the disposal of the Indianapolis postmaster. Mr. Wallace has not only said that he will give republicans preference in his appointments, but that he will not ignore the colored people.—Indianapolis Journal, March 15.

It is stating it very mildly to say that this is discouraging. Years of agitation resulted in the enactment of a civil service law. The fundamental principle of the law in view of the agitation and of the law itself can not honestly be mistaken. It is that certain positions of a clerical nature shall be thrown open to competition. The competition is to know no distinction of color, politics, religion or rank. To put a man at the head of an office which is within this competition, and to put him under oath that he will faithfully perform the duties of that office, is to put him into a position that he may abuse, as a judge may abuse his position on the bench. But every principle of honor requires that he should deal with contestants in this field of open and fair competition exactly as an upright judge deals with the contestants before him. The law invites citizens to compete for these places, and there goes with this invitation an implied promise of the people of the United States who enacted this law that competitors shall be treated with the most scrupulous fairness.

If actual words repeatedly spoken are to taken as true, Mr. Wallace proposes to trick this law. He says, "Nothing in the law prevents the postmaster from discharging every employe." The President has the power to pardon every federal criminal out of prison. That is vastly different from his right to exercise that power, and if he should exercise it he would be impeached and removed from office. Very properly the power of dismissal is left with the postmaster at Indianapolis. But if he dismisses an employe in the classified service, except for good cause, he violates his oath of office and tricks the law. Good cause is drunkenness, or dishonesty, or inefficiency or similar faults. It is not good cause to dismiss a man because he is a republican or a democrat, or because his place is wanted for some one else.

Mr. Wallace also says: "The public may as well know from the beginning that as a life-long republican I will always give republicans the preference in my appointments, other things being equal." If Mr. Wallace has a vacancy to fill in the classified service, three names will be handed to him by the local examining board from which to make his appointment. If he gives one of these the preference because he is a republican, or if he allows party belonging to color or in any manner to influence his appointment, he will violate his oath of office, and he will evade the law.

To repeat, here is a law which opens public employment to the children of the poorest, the most obscure and the least influential on equal terms with the most powerful. Its success depends upon honorable dealing by executive officers. Now comes Mr. Wallace, an old and respected citizen, and serves notice upon the people of this state that it will be practically useless for any but republicans to compete. The question is suggested of what use he has made of his powers of observation during the past four years. He ought to know that no other one thing except the acts of Senator Gorman in Maryland made President Cleveland so much trouble or did him and his party so much harm throughout the country as the conduct of the Indianapolis postoffice, which was run on a line exactly parallel with that now proposed by Mr. Wallace. General Harrison was familiar with the facts of the former conduct of this office. He did not believe that the law was enforced. He did not believe that a man could be rightfully dismissed from the classified service without cause. With these things in mind he said in his letter of acceptance, "The law should have the aid of a friendly interpretation and be faithfully and vigorously enforced." And in his inaugural address President Harrison said: "Heads of departments, bureaus, and all other public officers, having any duty connected therewith, will be expected to enforce the civil service law fully and without evasion."

In this community President Harrison's word for thirty years has not been held lightly. We do not believe that he means this word to be held lightly, and it is most unfortunate that Mr. Wallace either thoughtlessly or deliberately has so regarded it. It is not too much to say that he has done a damage almost irreparable. No matter how repair is attempted, every act will have attached to it a suspicion that he is carrying out his declared intentions. By careless words he has by a long period put off the day when the people will believe that competitors are fairly dealt with, and will compete accordingly.

THE SCRAMBLE FOR OFFICE.

No better illustration could be given of the utterly vicious character of the present system of making appointments outside the classified service than the disgraceful scramble for office which has prevailed since the election, and particularly since the inauguration of General Harrison. The democrats of four years ago, after twenty-four years exclusion from power, made no more unseemly struggle for the loaves and fishes than republicans are doing now. Every man who conceives that his inability to earn a living elsewhere entitles him to "recognition" at the hands of the party is circulating his petitions, his requests for letters, and making untiring solicitations and personal appeals to the President and the heads of departments. The most persistent applicant secures the greatest number of letters and signatures. Responsible men, not only in politics but in business life, will sign their names to palpable falsehoods in respect to the qualifications of an applicant who presents his petition in person. They will recommend men as fit whom they know are not fit; they will declare that applicants are "able lawyers" and "men of responsibility and integrity," to whom they would not confide a case before a justice of the peace, and whom they know to be utterly irresponsible and would not trust for a dollar. Sometimes these very men write letters disavowing the testimonials which they have signed and declaring they "did not mean it," but more frequently they remain silent, and the administration, misled through these false certificates of character, is certain to appoint many men who will bring upon it nothing but discredit and disgrace.

An illustration came to our knowledge a few days ago. A man who has been the laughing stock of the community in which he resides, a man without skill, without ability, without integrity, received the signatures of the best business men in one of the most important cities of this state, to a petition which stated that he was a man of integrity, a lawyer of great ability, eminently qualified for the position in every respect and that he ought to receive it as a reward for services to the republican party. There is not a man whose name is signed to the petition who would not blush to have his signature exposed. The men who certified to the qualifications of this applicant, every one of them, knew that they were perpetrating what, in the very best view of it, would be a huge joke upon the administration. The position asked for was one requiring the highest qualifications. The appointment of the man would bring disgrace upon the American name among the people where his duties were to be performed. Yet, nobody was deterred by any such considerations. The applicant went around personally asking for signatures. The men whom he solicited "did not like to refuse." This is happening everywhere. How can General Harrison tell, while such a practice is all but universal, who are worthy of appointment and who are not? There is not a man prominent in public life in the republican party who is not receiving every day letters asking for his indorsement. Sometimes the men are worthy, but more often they are men whose only claims upon the office are their necessities or desires. Good and bad are thrown indiscriminately together. The signature to the petition and the letter of recommendation are given to all. Nobody has the independence to refuse. This evil comes from the frailty of human nature, from an indisposition to disoblige a friend. Sometimes the application will be from one in favor of whom some personal obligation is incurred; and there is not one man in a hundred who will refuse to liquidate it in this manner at the expense of the public.

There are no places more likely to be filled by men not qualified to fill them than the foreign service, especially the consular service. There are no places through which the American name is brought into greater disgrace than by these. Has not the time at last come when the necessities of the case demand that no man shall be appointed who can not show by some sort of test his ability to discharge the duties of this office? Ought a man to be sent to fill a business position in a foreign country who can not speak its language, who scarcely knows in what part of the world the place is situated to which he is accredited, who has no knowledge whatever of the duties which he is required to perform? These disqualifications could be detected by half an hour's examination.

There is not a civilized country in the world that does not demand for its representatives higher qualifications for positions like these than is demanded by the American republic.

The time has come for us to make a change. Even if the party in power were entitled to all these offices, there still ought to be some plan by which each party can keep its "own dunces out." It is time that some sort of examination should be prescribed for the consular service.

EXAMINATION QUESTIONS.

If this paper were published twice a day and 365 days in the year, and each issue carefully explained just what the examinations for entrance to various places in the classified civil service consist of, there would still be heard the venerable jokes about requiring from applicants a knowledge of obscure African lakes, rivers and mountains. Still it is well not to weary, but to show the facts. To begin with, the questions are of the most simple and elementary sort: "Multiply $34\frac{1}{2}$ by $15\frac{1}{3}$." The writing, spelling, composition, punctuation and grammar are incidentally shown by requiring the applicant to "copy a printed statement," by "writing down from memory the substance of matter orally communicated," by "writing a letter to some official, giving an account of the schools attended and the studies pursued by the applicant." These are samples of the questions asked of applicants for clerical service. For instance, if Mr. Thomas Markey of this city had wanted a clerical position instead of being a candidate for the insane hospital board (his candidature was successful), the fact that he wrote that he had to address the "nights of labor" would undoubtedly have been a disadvantage. But had he, under the present "scholars' test," desired a position in the fire or police department, or as foreman of laborers, in Boston, he might have had to answer in writing, or in certain cases his answers would have been taken down by a stenographer, such of the following as pertained to his department. Ten questions in city information: The locations of public buildings, bridges, fire engine houses, etc. "How are the following-named officers elected: mayor, aldermen, councilmen?" "Where does the water come from that is used in this city for fire and other purposes?" Eight questions relating to general work. The use of tools, reading grade stakes, tallying, etc. Twelve questions relating to the different kinds of sewers, the preparation and use of cement and other materials and trench work. This is enough to show that the examination system, as it now is, is simple, flexible and confined to the work a man asks to be put at. It even puts in a United States mail carrier of this city who takes a half holiday in recognition of Washington's birthday under the impression that Washington was an Irishman.

THE PROMISES.

WHAT have we a right to expect from the republican party? At a recent meeting of our Indiana association we had occasion to examine, somewhat in detail, the precise meaning of the declarations of that party in regard to civil service reform. I desire at the outset to recapitulate in a few brief words the conclusions to which we were led. That party acquired power upon certain definite promises embodied in the national platform. This is the language: "The men who abandoned the republican party in 1884 and continued to adhere to the democratic party, have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance, of freedom, of purity of the ballot, but especially have they deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs, or because their candidate has broken his."

The platform is made not simply a declaration of policy, but a definite "pledge" (that is the word), which it would be impossible for an administration, acquiring power upon the strength of it, not to regard.

The platform goes on: "We therefore repeat our declaration of 1884, to wit: The reform of the civil service auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions, which lurk in the power of official patronage, may be wisely and effectively avoided."

General Harrison tells us in his letter of acceptance, that in regard to every subject embraced in the platform, he is in entire agreement with the declaration of the convention. He is therefore in agreement with this pledge, and has made his own promise.

Now, what is the meaning of these words? They are capable of pretty definite construction.

"The reform should be extended to all grades of the service to which it is applicable." By whom must the extension be made? Undoubtedly by that branch of the government which is now invested with control over executive appointments.

It is the President, and not congress, to whom we must look for the redemption of this pledge. The promise can not be fulfilled by a mere approval of reform legislation. The affirmative act of extending the system must be done by the President, in whose hands the power resides. * * *

The President has the right to extend the rules, and General Harrison has given his promise that they shall be extended to all grades to which they are applicable.

The next question is: To what grades of the service is the reform system applicable; this, also, as to many of these places is capable of definite ascertainment. The civil service act itself enumerates grades to which it is applicable, and to which it has not yet been extended. The sixth section makes it the duty of the postmaster general to classify the public service at each post-office where there are fifty persons employed. "And thereafter, on the direction of the President, to arrange in like classes the persons employed in connection with any other post-office."

Under this section there have been brought into the classified service some thirty-seven post-offices. The statute recognizes others to which it should be extended. There is no reason why it can not be extended to all offices where there is a free delivery of letters. There is as much reason for its application there as to the larger places. The duties are substantially the same; the positions are non-political. There is no court in christendom that, in construing the promise, would deny that the system was applicable to such places. By the terms of the act, it is the duty of the President to direct this extension. Such extension he has, therefore, definitely agreed to make.

Similar provisions are contained in the act regarding the employes of collectors, naval officers, surveyors and appraisers in the customs service, and the platform applies to all these places where the rules are not yet extended.

The promise to extend the reform to all places to which it is applicable certainly includes those grades to which civil service regulations have been successfully applied elsewhere. In such cases experience has shown that the system is applicable. The platform was made with reference to this fact. The men who drafted the platform, and the convention which adopted it, knew that similar provisions had been successfully applied to grades of the service in Massachusetts, New York and elsewhere, to which they had not yet been extended by the federal act, and in promising, the reform should be extended to all grades to which it is applicable, they certainly included these. Let me offer an illustration: The experience of Massachusetts has shown that it is desirable that the labor service should be placed under the rules. By this means the country will avoid the unwholesome spectacle of vast numbers of men employed in navy yards and elsewhere, just before election, in order to secure votes and political support.

By the federal act, laborers need not be classified, but there is nothing which forbids such classification. The President has the power to make it. It ought to be made, and the platform has substantially promised that it shall be.

The civil service commissioners, without regard to party, have brought to the attention of the President other branches of the service to which the rules may be applied. Among these were the employes of the railway mail service, and many places in the Indian bureau, in the labor bureau, in the war department and in the department of agriculture. Some of these recommendations have been adopted, and the outgoing administration has done no act more important than the inclusion of the railway mail service within the rules. We believe that we have not only the promise of the President-elect that the extension made shall be maintained, but also that the law shall be applied to those places to which it is not yet extended, but where the unbiased judgment of those best qualified to determine shall declare that this is applicable.

These are some of the places to which it can be definitely affirmed that the republican party has promised an extension of the reform. In respect to a much wider range of non-political offices, such as consulships and fourth-class postmasterships, where the ground is more debatable, as to these, we may hopefully await the ripening influences of time and a more progressive public sentiment. But the promise does not stop at the extension of the rules. "The spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive appointments."

That "spirit and purpose" is, that in non-political offices, men are not to be appointed, rejected or discharged on account of political services or opinions, but on account of their fitness to perform the duties of office, and that they are not to use their official places for political purposes.

The President-elect in his letter of acceptance, shows that this is his understanding. He says, "In appointments to every grade and department, fitness and not party service should be the essential and discriminating test, and fidelity and efficiency the only sure tenure of office."

We believe, therefore, that the spectacle will not be repeated of the appointment of new and untried men to positions for which they have shown no qualifications, on account of the aid given by them to the party or its candidate during the campaign. It will be impossible, for instance, that such a position as a consulship, a place requiring business ability, and a knowledge of the language and usages of the country where the duties are to be performed, shall be filled by a man without business qualifications, ignorant of both language and usages, because such person has been an effective campaign speaker, or useful in the organization of the party in power. Fitness is to be the essential and discriminating test.

But, more than this, the President-elect says: "Only the interest of the public service should suggest removals from office." This means a great deal. It means that the clamor of aspirants and local political sentiment shall not accomplish the removal of that democratic official who has faithfully performed his duty. * * *

General Harrison says: "The law should have the aid of a friendly interpretation, and be faithfully and vigorously enforced." This can not be done, if men who are not in favor of it, men who, like Postmaster Aquilla Jones, say that they despise it, if such as these are appointed to carry it out. If spoilsmen are to be chosen for the service of the government, we must insist, as a vital matter, that they be excluded from places which involve the selection of employes under the civil service act. General Harrison says: "All appointments under this law should be absolutely free from partisan considerations," but this can never be if those clothed with the power of making such appointments are themselves warped by the prejudices of the spoils system—From an Address Delivered at the Conference of Civil Service Reformers at Baltimore, February 23, 1889; by William Dudley Foulke.

SINCE its annual meeting, the last of January, the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association has gained over sixty new members.

INDIANAPOLIS, Nov. 28, 1888.

To the Editor of the Civil Service Record:

I have your request for a statement of what I think civil service reform associations ought to do to help on this reform under the next administration. We have before us the unpleasant fact that, in less than four years, over one hundred thousand federal employes have been put out and their places taken by new hands. No civil service reformer believed that it would or could be done. Nevertheless, it has been done. Further, in those places where anything like a thorough investigation has been had, the civil service law has been tricked. It is useless to charge trickery in those places not investigated; it is also useless to ask the average mind not to believe that, with stray exceptions, it exists. At any rate, it is safe to say that no progress has been made toward inspiring confidence that it is worth while for any one to compete who is not in political accord with the administration and that the efficiency of the service has been greatly damaged, and damaged most where the rioting in spoils has been greatest. Civil service reformers may have that melancholy consolation. If the service had shown improvement or no deterioration, this reform would have an up-hill road indeed.

By far the most important constitutional duty of the President is the management of the civil service. President Harrison will have to undertake this management with one hundred thousand democrats under him who largely got their places as spoils, and with great offices as illustrations that the civil service law can be so "managed" that the sweep can be made just as clean there as anywhere else. Yet these things are neither an example to be followed, nor shall they be an excuse for their repetition; they are only a warning, a calamity to be avoided.

General Harrison has not been prolific in promises of civil service reform; indeed, there has been a silence about the subject that seems studied. This does not in the least lessen his duty, nor should it lessen the demand that he perform that duty. He should be held to just the same performance as if he had covered his door yard with promises. The President has no right under the constitution to use the federal service as a party spoil, or to permit it to be so used by congressmen or other persons. If such a right is in the constitution, or if it was in the intention of the makers of that instrument, it would be well for some one to point it out. Again, the platform upon which General Harrison was elected binds him; and it is not to be expected that he will seek to avoid this obligation. It is explicit, it has no uncertain meaning, and there is no escape from it. It leaves no room for the spoils system during his administration. He is not a man who will like to leave a basis of truth for the charge that he has violated the promises made by his party and himself in the platform. Further, in his letter of acceptance, he said that the civil service law should be carried out by friendly hands. He must have written advisedly. He is familiar with the law and with the scandalous abuse of it in his own city; and it will be strange, indeed, if the machine is now made to run the other way, and similar effects produced for the other side.

No amount of other promises could add anything to the duty which the constitution, the platform and his letter of acceptance will put upon the new President. If this duty is performed, congressmen will attend to legislation and not to dividing offices, editors will not be subsidized by the score with offices, controllers of patronage will have no occupation, and there will be no clean sweep. If this duty is done, President Harrison will without delay extend the civil service law to the railway mail service, the Indian service, the navy yards, the free delivery cities, and "to all grades of the service to which it is applicable." If he is to observe "the spirit and purpose of the reform * * * in all executive appointments," promotions will be the rule in those appointments. In fact, the use of the public offices as spoil will be ended. This is the position which the republican party and its candidate took deliberately and in writing. This is a brief statement of the duty of General Harrison, to be performed as he knows how, if he makes up his mind to it.

President Cleveland's party, however, broke him down in this respect. The republican party machine has exactly the same intent with regard to General Harrison. Quay and Mahone and Ingalls mean to rival Gorman and Voorhees and Vest; and General Harrison, as sure as his inauguration comes, will have to face the issue presented to him by these men and their likes. There will be no half-way about it; he will conquer them, or they will conquer him. The result can not be told; but, in the presence of such capable, determined and hungry enemies, the civil service reform associations should prepare to contest every inch of the ground from the start.

These men are relying upon the admission of new states and upon breaking the solid south to keep up the republican party. General Harrison is also quoted as relying upon these and other possible sources of strength. President Cleveland had analogous hopes for his party; but it would have paid him and his party better if he had kept his promises in regard to the civil service. History is trying to repeat itself. Republican spoilsmen want the offices, whatever the consequences.

The attack is not likely to be made openly. The "clean sweepers" have met with little public encouragement, and few like to declare openly for it. If they succeed in bringing about a condition of vagueness and apparent uncertainty of intention about removals and how far they are to go, the signs will be dangerous. Under the guise of "weeding the service," weeds will be found as long as democrats last. The plan will be to find cause for removal until another clean sweep has been made. Such a course should be stubbornly resisted at every step, and the responsibility fixed. On the other hand, if President Harrison takes the country into his confidence, and lays down a well-defined, carefully matured plan as to how he proposes to manage the civil service, and if this plan makes possible reasonable progress in this reform, he should have the support of civil service reformers so long as he executes his plan without vacillation.

The same method of working by the associations will be adapted to either case. The recent election in Maryland shows what reformers can accomplish by a relentless publication of the facts which mark the daily progress of the spoils system in full swing. A publication of the facts which mark the civil service management of the new administration will be an act of the strictest justice. If the administration conquers the spoilsmen, this publication will be a crown of glory for it; if it is ruled by the spoilsmen, there can be no complaint because its acts are brought to the daylight. I should say that this is the most important work to be done, and each association should commence it systematically in its own community. For instance, the execution of the civil service law should be watched, what office-holders do in politics should be noted, and every case of unjust removal or improper appointment, with all pertinent facts, should be made a record. Public attention should be called to these and other matters noted in like manner, and from time to time they should be embodied into reports to be widely circulated. If this work is well done, it will greatly strengthen the hands of a President bent upon administrative reform; and no administration bent upon a clean sweep can stand such a fire. To do this in the best manner will require some money, and there ought to be some way taken to raise it.

It is also imperative to do much in other directions. While associations should keep their records, their persuasive powers should never rest, but should be used to encourage good works. For instance, the republican congress should be asked to keep the platform promise by repealing the four-years' tenure act. The extension of the civil service law by the President should be steadily urged until it covers all of the service to which it is applicable. A system of local boards, independent of local appointing officers, should be asked for. In places like Indianapolis, secrecy is a cover for trickery; and it would be better if the examination papers and the eligible list were public records. The demand that reasons shall be given for removals should be persisted in. The bill making it a penal offense for congressmen to interfere with appointments should be urged with all the force that can be brought to bear. A systematic agitation of the principles of this reform, between this time and the inauguration, would find ready listeners. The republican spoilsmen are now attacking these principles with great glibness; the question of a clean sweep in the federal service is before us, and public attention is attracted to administrative concerns.

LUCIUS B. SWIFT.

From the Civil Service Record, December, 1888.

THE Washington Post, edited by Frank Hatton, who was Postmaster-General under Arthur, says of the raid of office-seekers upon Harrison: "We were forewarned in the winter and spring of 1885 of the grand army of invasion that was to descend upon Mr. Cleveland, with their aid and counsel and hungry clamor for a share in the spoils from which for a quarter of a century they had been barred out; but the rush and scramble at that memorable period was no more than a Sunday-school picnic to the jam that, after only four years' seclusion from the flesh-pots, is already setting in upon Indianapolis, and threatening to overwhelm the President-elect with pleas for patronage little short of the highwayman's in brutality."

POSTMASTER JONES sat in his comfortable office in the federal building at 11 o'clock and remarked that a large element of relief will dilute his regret at giving up the office.

"We have made some mistakes," he said reflectively, "some mistakes; but I have done the best I could all the time. The newspapers have not been very charitable toward me."

"How many republicans remain in the office from the last administration?"

"I do not know exactly. There are several, however."

"A letter-carrier said he thought there are eight carriers who are republicans."

"Yes. I think that is right, except two of the eight didn't vote the way your informant thinks. Two voted the democratic ticket. Then there are two or three men in the office who before the election talked loud about voting the democratic ticket, but I happen to know they did not do it. One or two republicans did vote with the democrats though, and two or three did not vote at all. A few of the boys have republican tendencies, but their wives are strong democrats, so I concluded to let them stay."

"Are any of the carriers intending to resign soon?"

"Yes, some of them are. Four have already resigned and will quit next Saturday. Last Saturday I employed three new carriers, all republicans, and two of them, I think, ex soldiers. I never fought in anybody's war, but I guess my sympathy for the soldiers is equal to that of other men. I don't want to hamper the new postmaster, and so concluded to employ republicans."

"Who are the new appointments?"

"I don't know. Three men were needed, and the first three names on the list of those who had passed the civil service examination were republicans, and I just ordered them to be employed."—Indianapolis News Interview, March 15

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given," and, on breach of this condition, "by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord. The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and there professing that he did become his man from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord." Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

SENATOR QUAY left yesterday for Florida, to be absent until the latter part of February. He desired the press to announce that he would oppose the appointment to office of any man who applied to him for assistance prior to March 4.—Washington Dispatch to the Indianapolis News, January 29.

WASHINGTON, January 16.—The subject of patronage is giving the republican congressmen much concern. The largest boxes that are now to be seen upon their desks are labeled "Application for Office." Many of them greatly regret that the reformed civil service system does not apply to all offices within the gift of the President. Some of these have no special devotion to the reform, but fear that the privilege of making suggestions to the President, which some of them are already beginning to characterize as "nominations," may also bring with it certain political responsibilities which they do not care to assume. One of the Illinois congressmen says that he has been advised that the following course will be pursued by the senators from that state in the distribution of patronage, after March 4. As to the offices in Cook county, Senators Culom and Farwell will call the three republican representatives from Chicago into conference, and hear their suggestions. As to the offices in the other congressional districts, the several republican representatives in the different judicial districts will be convened in conference. It is ascertained already that every congressman in the northern Illinois district has a candidate for United States marshal. The gentleman who furnishes this information says that the representatives have not been informed that their wishes will be respected by the senators in making recommendations, or that the nominations for the offices shall be put to a vote of the delegation, or those interested in them. Some of the representatives indicate that they shall make independent recommendations to the President as to the offices in their respective districts.

The democrats have watched the case of General Newberry, nominated to be postmaster of Chicago, with much interest, because it might be regarded as a precedent as to confirmations to offices the terms of which extend beyond March 4. The circumstances under which General Newberry was confirmed yesterday will, however, hardly constitute a precedent. He was confirmed after an executive session of only five minutes, and in accordance with an understanding which was arrived at with Senator Farwell that Newberry shall resign the office promptly in March. Senator Sawyer, the chairman of the post-office committee, is disposed to do exactly what the republican senators from any particular locality desire him to do, unless they wish him to do an injustice. The representation which Senator Farwell made to him secured the favorable report from the committee, and after that the confirmation was a mere matter of form.—Special Dispatch to Evening Post.

WASHINGTON, March 1.—General Browne is receiving so many applications every day for post-offices and other official positions that he is compelled to content himself with simply classifying and filing them, and attending to the applications in their various forms without answering them, as has been his custom. It has for some time required the entire time of a stenographer to answer his letters, and now the General finds the volume so great that it will be impossible to answer those who simply send applications for office. His correspondents may rest assured, however, that their applications will receive the same prompt attention that they would if the applicants were notified of the receipt of their requests.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

WASHINGTON, March 5.—Office seekers are doing themselves violence and the administration an injustice in rushing upon the President and his cabinet officers, and upon the friends of these men, just at this time. Their importunities are not in season. There will be three or four cabinet meetings held before appointments are made. The first selections will be of the assistants to the cabinet officers, then will come the heads of bureaus and the chiefs of divisions. All this will be done before appointments are made to offices located throughout the country, except where emergencies arise—that is, to fill vacancies already existing, or to succeed officers who are considered incompetent or unfit for the places they occupy.

Applicants will not be given any advantage in pushing their claims just at this time. Senators and representatives in congress are overwhelmed with applications, and thousands of aspirants to political positions are here already, personally urging their merits. This is not only unnecessary, but it is distasteful, because the condition of affairs is not such as to warrant action. These statements are not to be construed that the present administration intends to protect democrats in office to the disparagement of republicans, nor should they be construed to mean that the general service of the government will not need to be reorganized. It is simply to indicate that there should not be a great haste on the part of office-seekers, and that the time for importunities will not come for two or three weeks.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

WASHINGTON, March 6.—Thousands of office-seekers are here working for places in the government service throughout the country, while hundreds of thousands have sent their applications to men in congress, notwithstanding the fact that appointments outside of the managerial positions in the departments will not be made under some weeks, except in a few instances.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

WASHINGTON, March 7.—Every hour or two during all of to-day a messenger entered Private Secretary Halford's room, and, throwing his long arms around a great pile of applications for office, lugged them into an adjoining room, where they were piled upon a desk for classification and pigeon-holing. Several bundles of these papers were received between 9 and 6 o'clock. The stream of office-seekers was continuous from the moment the outer doors were opened until they were closed.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

THE Indiana republicans in Washington have been holding meetings for the last two or three days, and have been engaged in the serious matter of distributing the patronage of the administration.—Special, Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette, March 7.

THE demand for office, which began long before President Harrison was inaugurated, is now a scramble. Almost every man who carried a torch or escorted a delegation of visitors during the campaign, is making a pull for an office.—Indianapolis News, Ind., March 7.

SENATOR MANDERSON, of Nebraska, says the list of applicants from that state would be "a directory of the state."—Evening Post, March 8.

SENATOR INGALLS says that all the offices in the gift of the administration would be insufficient to satisfy the demands of the candidates from Kansas.—Evening Post, March 8.

THE present rush of office-seekers in Washington is not a healthy nor a hopeful sign, nor a gratifying sight. It is not in accordance with the better sentiment of the Republican party, and we have no doubt it is a disagreeable experience to the President and his executive assistants.—Indianapolis Journal, Rep., March 8.

THE two broad tables occupied by the President's stenographers were completely covered with letters fresh from office-seeking constituents, and the work of classifying application, has been thoroughly begun.—Indianapolis Journal, Washington Dispatch, March 8.

WASHINGTON, March 8.—Representative Cannon did some good, solid work this morning in behalf of James Clark, of Mattoon, Ill. Mr. Clark wants to be second Auditor, and Mr. Cannon sees no reason why he should not secure the appointment. The Illinois delegation has indorsed Mr. Clark in a most thorough and decided manner, and they are satisfied that his chances are as good as any one else's. One of the Illinois senators was extremely frank with the President on the question of state patronage. When it was suggested that the delegation give the President a list of what they wanted, the senator said: "Would it not be better, Mr. President, if you were to give us a list of what you think we ought to have?"

CONGRESSMAN BYNUM returned from Washington Tuesday. He is in good health and spirits, and takes a sanguine view of the political future. He says that Washington has never seen such a rush of hungry place-seekers as now crowd the city, and that the new President will find himself unable to satisfy one-twelfth of the greedy patriots who are besieging him, even if he makes a clean sweep.—Indianapolis Sentinel, March 8.

EVERY republican member of Congress, senator and member-elect is suffering from a visitation of a good portion of the male population of his district. They get scarcely time enough to eat their meals, are hustled out of bed at an early hour, and it is late at night, usually, before they retire. Several have been obliged to follow the example of Mr. Wade, of Missouri, and change their quarters, keeping their new address secret. On Wednesday morning the constituents of Mr. Wade began to ring his front-door bell at a quarter of 6. When he rose, at half past 8, the parlor was full of people with petitions to be signed and with requests that he accompany them to the White House or to some of the departments. His breakfast hour, his lunch hour and the time for dinner passed without his having time to eat. The next day he moved, and since then no one has been able to discover his habitation.—Indianapolis Journal Washington Dispatch, March 9.

WHILE the majority of Indianians have returned home, there are still a large number here, vigorously pushing their claims for positions. It is almost certain that John C. New will go to Austria and ex-Governor Porter to Rome. J. N. Huston, chairman of the Indiana republican state committee, has gone home to arrange his business to accept the position of treasurer of the United States. Dan Ransdell, of Indianapolis, who lost an arm while serving in General Harrison's regiment, will be marshal of the District of Columbia. It is said that Mr. Huston will have charge of the appointment of postmasters and railway mail clerks in the Indiana districts represented by democratic congressmen, and that Sergeant McKinney, of Indianapolis, will be superintendent of the railway postal service for the fifth division, which embraces the states of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana and Tennessee. C. Bradford, of Indianapolis, is making a vigorous fight for commissioner of patents, but it is understood that office will go to Iowa. Col. Dudley is doing his best to secure positions for Indianians. He does not desire any position at the hands of the administration. He is building up a valuable business as an attorney, and proposes to stick to it.—Commercial-Gazette Washington Special, March 9.

WASHINGTON, March 11.—General Browne, to-day, presented the application of Col. W. A. Cullen, of Rushville, for the position of Utah Commissioner; Gen. Silas Colgrove, of Winchester, Deputy Commissioner of Pensions; D. C. Binkley, of Wayne county, for Third Auditor of the Treasury; Mr. Charles W. Stivers, editor of the Herald, at Liberty, is largely indorsed for the same position. His papers are also in the hands of the President. L. H. Mitchell, of Henry county, has had his application for Second Comptroller of the Treasury filed.

It is not probable that a new postmaster will be appointed at Muncie till the present commission expires. It will be the policy of the administration, in cases of that character, to permit the incumbent to serve out his time, unless good and sufficient reasons are given showing why he should be removed.

General Browne has recommended the appointment of the following fourth-class postmasters for the sixth congressional district:

Edward R. Pugh, Windsor; Lewis L. Perdieu, Cowan; William R. Fizer, Rural; James W. Hannan, New Corner; Isaac N. Chenoweth, Middleton; William K. Boyd, Moorland; John M. Neff, Eaton; Alonzo Geyer, Arlington; T. M. Goff, DeSoto; F. W. Owens, Clark; Norman E. Black, Selma; Leo M. Harlan, Whitewater; Nancy Pierce, Modoc; Edward C. Charles, Carthage; Philip K. May, Wilkinson; W. H. O. Goldsmith, New Salem; Noah McCormick, Cadiz; J. F. Camplin, Lewisville; Addison St. Myer, Williamsburg; Fielder E. Olvey, Economy; Emanuel Zimmerman, Emmetsville; Lindley M. Thornburg, Farmland; Leonidas R. Allison, Greensboro; C. C. Coffin, Kennards; Charles S. Unthank, Webster; Austin K. Smith, Milroy; Elizabeth Zuenger, Falmouth; Ira E. Snodgrass, Reed.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

GREENCASTLE, March 12.—There are an even half dozen candidates for the postoffice in this city, and all are equally confident of securing the prize. The names include L. P. Chapin, J. McD. Hays, Joseph B. Sellers, Jonathan Birch, A. A. Smith, of the Times, and Mrs. Jeannette Preston Lane. It has been decided by the candidates to hold no election, Chairman Huston, of the state committee, having advised against it in a circular addressed to all aspirants in this state. The candidates, therefore, have concluded to rely upon petitions and letters from their friends. The commission of the retiring postmaster will expire on the 27th inst.—Special to the Indianapolis News.

THE impression has become general that Mr. New will control the distribution of patronage in Indiana, and in consequence he is besieged continually by office-seekers. A dozen may be seen about his office during any half hour of the day.

The unexpected appointment of S. N. Chambers as district attorney is said to be due mainly to his intimate association with General Harrison as an opposing counsel in the trial of the Wise will case at Sullivan during the six weeks preceding the nomination at Chicago. He impressed General Harrison at that time as possessing uncommon ability as a lawyer, and as Chambers was one of the most devoted supporters of Harrison, he was kept in mind for a good appointment.—Indianapolis News, March 13.

WASHINGTON, March 14.—The Illinois delegation captured nothing but the Danish mission in the first charge, but they are going to make another, and are girding themselves for the struggle. If they don't get something better, then they will believe their failure is due to the fact that Illinois supported Gresham at the Chicago convention. They are asserting this with some positiveness now, but Cullom warns them to hold their tongues and try again.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

WASHINGTON, March 14.—General Browne placed before Secretary Blaine, to-day, recommendations for a number of appointments to consular positions. Among them were Dr. George W. Thompson and George W. Patchell, of Union City, for consuls to Toronto, Canada, and Hong Kong, China, respectively; Dr. Hamilton, of Connersville, consul to South America, and Thos. B. Reddin, New Castle, a European mission.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

The following extracts are from the addresses delivered at the annual meeting of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association, January 23, 1889:

Now, it is not necessary for me to say to the members of this association that this partisan method of appointing officials is unbusinesslike and prejudicial to the interests of the people. I shall not call it the "spoils system," or its advocates "spoilsmen"; for, while it is true that a painfully large number of office-seekers do think much more of their own private gain than of the public weal, it is equally true that many persons of honesty and intelligence are as much opposed to the system of civil service examinations as others are to the system of party control. "Spoils" is an offensive word when used by the opponents of the latter system; and I doubt whether we can so easily convert its adherents to our views by calling them names and casting doubts upon their honesty of purpose as by temperate and rational argument. I would say, then, to the advocates of rotation in office, that I believe the system is contrary to business principles, and is therefore not the system by which the affairs of the nation may be most economically and efficiently administered. Let me illustrate. If I wish to have a pair of shoes made, what kind of man do I employ to make them? If I have a choice between two men, one of whom is a trained shoe-maker, but happens to differ with me on the tariff, the other a tailor, who, though ignorant of the cobbler's art, belongs to my political party; which of the two should I select? Is not the answer to such a question self-evident? Or, suppose I were ill, and in urgent need of medical attendance; should I call in a skilled physician, in spite of his differing with me in politics, or an indifferent lawyer who belonged to my own party? To ask the question is to answer it. And again—I ask the business men in this audience: Would you deposit your money in a bank, the president, directors, cashier and tellers of which were ejected every four years and replaced by men unacquainted with the business of banking? Would you buy stock in a railway company, or risk your lives on its trains, if every four years a new president of the company were to discharge all the engineers, firemen, brakemen, switchmen, conductors and train-dispatchers, and replace them by his own political partisans, without regard to their knowledge of the steam-engine?

The answer to all these questions being so exceedingly plain, why is it that the American people, who, surely, have never been accused of a lack of common sense and practical sagacity, should cling so tenaciously to a system that is unpractical and inefficient to the last degree? Is it because the people regard the government of sixty millions of men a simple matter—a matter simpler than the making of a pair of shoes, the conduct of a bank, or the management of a railway? Paradoxical as it may seem, I believe there is such a belief among the people. Vague and undefined as it is, there does exist a general feeling that, while a question of law or of medicine, of shoe-making or of carpentering, of painting or of music, does require special knowledge and training, a question of politics, on the contrary, requires no training at all, but can be settled off-hand by any male individual that has reached the age of twenty-one.—From the Address of Prof. R. H. Dabney of Indiana University.

THE executive must, of necessity leave to others what the constitution and the law contemplated should be done by himself. What more natural course, under the circumstances, can be conceived than to appoint men recommended by the representatives in congress who are in political sympathy with the administration? And when we consider the weakness of human nature, what can be more natural than that the senator or representative should seek to reward his friends and strengthen his hold upon his own place by recommending men for appointment who have been or can be most useful to himself? The good of the public service is lost sight of in the scramble for office, or for recommendation to office. Claims for party service, or, worse yet, for personal service, are apt to outweigh every other consideration. Nor are the men engaged in the scramble so much to be blamed. It is the inevitable result of a vicious custom, which not only serves the corrupt purposes of bad men, but which serves the bad purpose of corrupting good men. If not remedied it will continue to corrupt more good men, until it shatters the foundations of our government.

But I apprehend no such result. The reform has already begun and the support of reform laws has already been given it by congress and by some state legislatures. So far these laws have adopted but one plan as a substitute for the vicious system fostered by custom in the absence of any fixed rules. This plan contemplates competitive examinations among all applicants for position in certain classes of the civil service. Such an examination conducted under rules framed by a commission whose members are appointed for their known sympathy for the cause of reform, may or may not be productive of the best possible results. Human invention has never yet attained perfection, and a better system than that of competitive examinations may be suggested; but in the absence of anything better, we claim for the system of competitive examinations a fair, impartial and honest trial. This, owing to the rancor of party spirit and the clamor of spoilsmen, the system has never had. We claim this trial because the busy working population of the country, engrossed by private cares, have found by experience that they in their capacity of electors have no means of competing with those who make a business of politics, and because the vast machinery of government can not be managed in detail by any executive, however able; and finally because it brings to the aid of the executive a system. No other system prevails, unless a vicious custom may be called a system. None other is offered, and without system is chaos.

The only objections to the honest trial of the reform come, as in all other reforms, from those who are most injured by the prevailing evil. The men who manipulate conventions, or who upon election days manage the distribution of assessments to the blocks of five, or the men who profit by their labors, or who hope to do so, thus ruining their manhood, stifling their honor, destroying their liberty, and wrecking the institutions of their government, are the first to sneer at any proposed reform of their methods. For it is a reform even of these methods. Take away the hope of reward for party service and much of the rancor and bitterness of party spirit will also disappear. And were it not for a bitter party spirit prevailing, honest men would look with horror upon methods which they now behold with more or less equanimity, tempered with the knowledge whether it is one party or the other which is to profit by a particular bit of rascality. Good men, not caring to engage in these methods nor to profit by them, are led into a feeling of hostility to the reform of them by the outcry made by the so-called practical politicians. Is there anything in this outcry?

The worst that has been said of the proposed reform is that it creates a class of office holders, and is, therefore, hostile to American customs. Suppose it does, by a system of competitive examinations, choose the best among all applicants, and retain them during good behavior. Is it less American to have the public service filled by a class of well-behaved, competent employes, than it is to have it filled by a class who have political influence, based upon services rendered to some boss of primaries? If it is, then God save the mark! But in a country of free schools, where education is free to every man's child, rich or poor, an examination based upon educational qualifications, open to all comers, for the filling of all vacancies, can never create a class. It is only under such conditions that the son of the mechanic can successfully compete with the son of the millionaire, or that the modest, able and honest man can compete successfully with the bold, unscrupulous trickster. In fact, it is intended to abolish a class which has proudly designated its members "practical politicians." And the outcry made by them at the small measure of success already attained by the reform leads us to hope that further progress in the same course will lead to ultimate and complete success. This is the irrepressible conflict, the old war never ending between progress and reaction.—From the Address of A. A. McKain, of Indianapolis.

THERE is no political corruption that does not demand the spoils system as its condition. It subverts the will of the nation's founders. It is a stumbling block to self-government. It is the incarnation of venal selfishness, whose end is destruction. It breeds the seeds of weakness and disintegration. * * * But the reform movement must be one in party lines; that is to say, the republican reformer must remain in republican ranks, and the democratic reformer must remain in democratic ranks. In the mad rush for office, the friend of reform must stand firm just where he is. Let him refuse to be carried along with the crowd. A few sturdy men may often avert a panic, and a few sturdy patriots may in this case avert danger to their nation. Emerson commends the man that has strength to turn and face his party.

But if he goes off and founds a new party with the few of his belief, he consents to the elimination of his own influence. It is the spirit of the pious man that withdraws to the cloister, because the world is so evil. It indicates either this instability of courage, or a consciousness of superior goodness. It means the voluntary choosing of the weakest fighting ground. It emasculates effort. It shoots overhead, short or wide, any way so as not to hit the mark. The third party, in the majority of instances, is merely giving away the case, as the lawyers say. There may be reforms that succeed through third parties, but they do not include the civil service cause.—From the Address of C. R. Lane, Editor, Richmond Sunday Register.

THE first condition which determines what the teachers in all grades of schools can do towards laying bare the ugly features of the spoils system is a thorough knowledge of the civil service question. This is illuminated from two sources. The one is acquaintance with our history and the workings of our government. The other, acquaintance with the history of the civil service in this country, England, Germany and other countries of Europe. * * * As far as my acquaintance with school histories goes, not a single one contains even a hint at the system of federal appointments * * * and not a word about the beginnings of civil service reform which have taken place in the last twenty years. * * * The early Romans put betrayers of public trusts to death, and a lapse of 2200 years does not at all disprove that this or some other severe fate can be safely foregone in this country. * * * We may as well accept the fact that we are under the same laws that govern older and more populous countries. What is hurtful to them is dangerous to us. * * * Our attention should rest on the fact that those features of our constitution and laws which were most severely modeled after old-world examples and most slowly modified away from these types have been most satisfactory and most efficient. * * *

On him [the teacher] devolves in part the assertion of a right of which the consummation is most devoutly to be wished—the assertion of the right of the scholar to take part in politics. The campaign of 1884 emphasized a fact which is properly to be considered one of the anomalies of our political system. Ostensibly our political institutions are founded on a basis of intelligence and education. But among nations laying claim to culture and high civilization we stand out in bold contrast in the little consideration we accord to the man of letters in the management of our political affairs. * * * In 1884 the partisan press of one side was filled with epithets and denunciations, mostly aimed at the liberal scholar and man of letters in politics. He was a "political dude," a "Miss Nancy," a "Howadji," a "holier-than-thou" and political pharisee. English was not fluent enough to furnish billingsgate with which to smirch his name; the long forgotten jabber of a defunct Indian tribe was resurrected to call him a "mugwump." * * * But the tide is again on the rise. The same political party which delved into archæology to find terms of reproach in 1884, in 1888, chastened by a defeat to which these scholarly voters had undoubtedly contributed no small share, used the terms "mugwump," "dude," and "pharisee" with diminished zest and zeal, quickened by the inward consciousness that the power of the independent voter had been greatly underestimated. As the scholar's end of the beam begins slowly to ascend, the so-called "practical" detractor's end—the end weighed down by those who scoff at any considerations, except those of immediate personal reward—begins to descend toward the Avernus of the more crass and bold of the class—the state's prison. In Ohio, in Illinois, and in our own commonwealth a few of the most practical of the direct benefit school of statesmen and publicists—those who wish to stretch out their hands and grasp the apples of success and rewards, without being troubled by the formalities of law were condemned by juries of their fellow-citizens to retire from active handling of the political reins to the privacy of prison life, or to an enforced surrender of their leadership.

The unscrupulous chevaliers d'industrie who keep up party fences and haul sand for congressional and other candidates have only learned the alphabet of the scholar's influence. * * * It is the duty of the upper fourth of political society to assert itself and demand that it be not deprived of its vote and its proper influence. Of this fourth the teacher is a considerable strand. Among his secondary duties none stand higher than that which demands that he make himself felt as a factor in politics. The teacher can not safely join the scramble for office. But a judicious and dignified exercise of political functions in no wise detracts from his office and raises him to his true position as a factor in public affairs.—From the Address of Prof. S. S. Parr, of De Pauw University.

THE democratic party is again master of the situation. It has absolute control of both branches of the state legislature. Victory brings power, and power brings responsibility to the people who conferred it. The eyes of the people are upon it. Will their representatives harken to the popular demand for reform, or perpetuate the system that has given rise to it? Will they give us the wise and beneficent conception of a democrat, whose bill entitles him to the plaudits of his countrymen, for the government of our state institutions? Will they give us non-partisan boards of control? Will they substitute the merit system for the spoils system? Will they lift our state institutions out of the political mire? Will they use their power for the benefit of humanity or the aggrandizement of party? Will they relieve the burdens of the tax-payer, now that the maintenance of the state's dependents of all classes, including the inmates of our jails and poor-houses, involves an annual expenditure of nearly two millions of dollars? Will they belie the accusation of its opponents that the democratic party is a spoils party, and by the wise and beneficent laws they enact, prove to the world that it is animated by the highest statesmanship and a philanthropy that shields the humblest of God's children.—From the Address of Howard Briggs, Editor, Putnam Democrat.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

"My brief experience at Washington has led me often to utter the wish, with an emphasis I do not often use, that I might be forever relieved of any connection with the distribution of public patronage. I covet for myself the free and unpurchased support of my fellow-citizens, and long to be able to give my time and energy solely to those public affairs that legitimately relate to the honorable trusts which you have committed to me."—Senator Benjamin Harrison.

Address THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

"The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions, which lurk in the power of official patronage, may be wisely and effectively avoided."—Republican National Platform, 1888.

"The law should have the aid of a friendly interpretation, and be faithfully and vigorously enforced. All appointments under it should be absolutely free from partisan considerations and influence."—From President Harrison's Letter of Acceptance.

"Heads of departments, bureaus, and all other public officers having any duty in connection therewith, will be expected to enforce the civil service law fully and without evasion."—From President Harrison's Inaugural Address.

No reform in the civil service will be valuable that does not release members of congress from the care and the embarrassment of appointments; and no boon so great could be conferred upon senators and representatives as to relieve them from the worry, the annoyance, and the responsibility which time and habit have fixed upon them in connection with the dispensing of patronage, all of which belongs, under the constitution, to the executive. On the other hand, the evil of which President [William Henry] Harrison spoke—the employment of the patronage by the executive to influence legislation—is far the greatest abuse to which the civil service has ever been perverted. To separate the two great departments of the government, to keep each within its own sphere, will be an immeasurable advantage, and will enhance the character and dignity of both. A non-political service will be secured when congress shall be left to its legitimate functions, when the President shall not interfere therewith by the use of patronage, and when the responsibility of appointments shall rest solely with the department to which the organic law of the republic assigns it.—Twenty Years of Congress, vol. II, p. 651.—JAMES G. BLAINE.

THOSE who receive this paper are earnestly urged to subscribe for it, if they have not already done so. The price is so low as to be within the means of every one desiring to help the cause of good government. The paper is not to make money. It must depend for support upon those who sympathize with its objects.

THE President did but his plain duty in removing United States Marshal Hawkins, of this district. The latter appointed a great number of deputies at the last election, and these made such widespread and apparently concerted arrests of republicans for no reasons or for frivolous reasons, that it can only be put down as a deliberate plan to scare voters. No such official outrage has been committed in Indiana since the war. That it went wide of the mark does not excuse it.

NOT even the democrats claim that the removal of Postmaster Jones was undeserved. Assistant-postmaster Dodd's farewell address was to characterize the list of eligibles, examined under him as a member of the local board, as "a regular set of yaps," and advise that none of them be appointed.

BEFORE he gave up his office, Postmaster Jones performed one act of official death-bed repentance that deserves notice. Andrew J. Wells had served as a soldier through the Mexican war and again through the rebellion, four years. For his conduct at Shiloh he was promoted to be a lieutenant. Afterwards, for nineteen years and one month he was a letter carrier of this post-office, working for thousands of people, and to their satisfaction, and during that time he was once tardy two minutes. To make a place for a partisan, Postmaster Jones discharged him, and since that time it has been impossible to fit himself into a place in the community where he could support his family. It was one of a group of cases here, which illustrates the spoils system in all its arrogance and calloused selfishness. It ought to be a relief to Mr. Jones that before leaving his office he had the local civil service board certify Wells back for re-instatement under the rules, and re-instated him.

WE are informed by the president of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association that thirty-five new members have been received since our last issue. It is to be hoped that every one who believes in the principles of this association will join it. There are no dues or charges.

POSTMASTER WALLACE has repeatedly and emphatically declared that he means to enforce the civil service law in letter and spirit. He is a lawyer and knows what this means. He has taken his stand so firmly as to the classified service and has kept it against such heavy pressure for the sixteen days he has been postmaster that there is no reason to expect him to depart from it. When once it is understood that there is no underground road, that all stand the same chance in competition and that no one, whatever his politics, will be dismissed without cause, there will be no further trouble. Mr. Wallace may have the satisfaction of knowing that, excepting hungry place-hunters, this community will sustain him in making his office an exclusively business institution.

His reinstatement of Mr. Thompson as assistant postmaster, Mr. Craft as head of the carriers, and Mr. Welling as stamp clerk, are excellent appointments and free from politics. He has changed all of the heads of divisions, but the only one, Mr. Johnson, the head of the money-order office, who might have deserved to be kept, did not want to stay. Since the above was written comes the fact that Carrier Ward has been removed for cause and Frank Rogers, an Irish democrat, first on the eligible list, has been appointed to the vacancy. And later still comes the Indianapolis Journal with the following:

The first man appointed to a clerkship in the post-office department at Washington, when the civil service law took effect in July, 1883, was a democrat. The first letter-carrier appointed in Indianapolis, under the present administration, to succeed one removed for cause, is a democrat. This is an honest construction and enforcement of the law. If enforced and observed in that spirit for a few years we shall have a non-partisan civil service based on the idea of the survival of the fittest and in which honesty, intelligence and efficiency will be the guarantee of retention and promotion, instead of party service and political influence. It is only a question of time when the civil service will have to be established and maintained on that basis. The business interests of the country and the successful administration of the government, if not its very preservation, will demand it. It is as fair for one party as for the other, and when the working force of the public service gets to be about equally divided between the parties and composed of honest and efficient men, neither party will feel like reviving the barbarous custom of "sweeping removals" for political cause alone.

IF a man is to be appointed upon the recommendation of overwhelming numbers of people best able to judge, the President will have to keep Mr. Oberly as Indian commissioner. The Indian Rights Association, hundreds strong, headed by Mr. Herbert Welsh, have asked for this reappointment, and hundreds of their friends have joined them. It is true that Mr. Oberly was an Illinois politician. It is also true that he has, while in office, gradually sloughed off his politics and has become thoroughly converted to the principles of civil service reform. The evidence is too strong for this to be longer denied. He has become familiar with Indian affairs, and stands ready to carry out the civil service law if the President will but extend it to that service. He has the entire confidence of the men who for years have devoted their time and money to the welfare of the Indians. Surely President Harrison will not refuse this powerfully supported request.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND made an order, as the civil service law provides, ordering the railway mail service to be classified, and fixing March 15 as the date after which the entrance to the service should be by competition. This action was final. The law provides for only one act of the President in this direction, and when that is done the service acted upon is as much in the classified service as is the Indianapolis post-office. A President, having exercised the one power left him by the law, may no more postpone the date than President Arthur could have postponed the date of the taking effect of the Pendleton act beyond the sixty days therein specified. President Harrison put off the date named by President Cleveland to May 1. It is said that the civil service commission reported that it could not get ready by March 15, yet the commission, with two of its three places vacant, has not been filled up, while days and weeks have been spent in making appointments to places that were neither vacant nor in urgent need of being made vacant. Further, the time is being used in turning democrats out of the railway mail service and putting republicans in their places with steadily increasing rapidity. One of these changes here resulted in the appointment of a negro politician named Bagby, of unsavory reputation, a matter so urgent that it was done by telegraph.

THE postponement was not necessary. This service has already a system of checks and examinations that would have rapidly weeded out the incompetent men. To take their places were hundreds of men of the highest skill, who had been dismissed because of their politics, and who could have been reinstated under the civil service rules or a slight modification of them. Not only was the setting aside of President Cleveland's order not warranted by the law, but so far as changes are made in the meantime on the plan of the spoils system, they are distinctively an act of bad faith.

It is to be hoped that the President and the civil service commission will heed the very general desire that the lists of those who have passed examination for appointment in the classified service shall be made public. This desire found unanimous expression in one of the resolutions of the Baltimore conference, and no one anywhere advocates a continuance of the secrecy which never had anything to justify it. For thousands of years the public has enjoyed watching competitive contests, whether physical or intellectual. Further, there is no other umpire that can so absolutely guarantee fair play. When a vacancy occurs in the Indianapolis post-office, this city will be interested in knowing who stands at the top of the list, and who next. And, if the top man is not taken, the people irrespective of party will demand an excellent reason for it.

THE new marshal of Indiana, W. L. Dunlap says: "My office is not governed by civil-service rules, and of course I will not only give preference to republicans, but will appoint no one from any other political party." He has since completed his clean sweep. His predecessor had eight deputies, all democrats; he has turned them out and put in eight republicans. This is Marshal Dunlap. Delegate Dunlap in the republican national convention said in the platform: "The spirit and purpose of the reform (civil service reform) should be observed in all executive appointments." And he with his fellow-delegates emphasized this by saying of certain misguided people, "we will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs."

REASONABLE EXPECTATIONS.

We have been told that we ought to be reasonable in our expectations of what the present administration should accomplish in way of civil service reform, and that to expect more would render us liable to be charged with captious faultfinding. Let us have a fair understanding. The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is not for the purpose of making it appear that any administration, federal or state, is a success or a failure. It is published solely to advance the cause of better administration. It happens that the control of it were strongly in favor of the election of President Harrison, and along with that goes a feeling of personal respect and a wish that he might lay up for himself treasure in history by turning his hand to the only great work now within reach of a President—the complete reorganization of the federal service and the rebuilding of the whole system of appointments upon an absolutely new foundation. This involves shutting the door once and for all in the face of any and every congressman coming for patronage. It involves leaving clerical positions to be filled by impartial tests. It involves having fourth-class postmasters, for instance, appointed after a report by the head of a neighboring large office or by an inspector. And it involves the complete disappearance, as political factors of weighers, gaugers, collectors, postmasters and the whole host of federal office-holders except a small number of the higher grade. We do not underestimate the consequences of such an undertaking. It might be that President Harrison's party would refuse him a re-nomination, though we do not believe it. It might be that if re-nominated he would be defeated at the election by those whom he had refused to quarter upon the people; that also we do not believe. But if defeat in either case was sure to follow, the occasion demands the sacrifice. The temporary loss would be the ignoble triumph of a comparatively small section of people. The permanent gain would be the imperishable fact of having been right in a great struggle. The opposite has in it no certainty of avoiding disaster. The course of President Cleveland with the civil service is a sign-board that may be read miles away.

But the President does not feel an irresistible call to undertake this work. He doubtless does not regard it of equal importance with other matters. We think he is mistaken, but he is not inconsistent with his past course. He may bring about a decided advancement in civil service reform in the coming four years. If he does, his party will point to it and boast of it and it will have its due weight with all good citizens. We cannot shape our course by that. The spoils system is the spoils system under whatever President it exists and it is none the less to be opposed because it appears under President Harrison instead of President Cleveland. We regard the use of public office as party spoil as a colossal evil. It is the greatest evil in any manner connected with federal or state government. There is no other evil that in any manner approaches it in viciousness and in actual damage done. In the federal service there are now about 142,000 places. The thirty-five men quarreling over the collectorship of customs of this city, until the appointing power is bewildered, is a fair example of what is now going on over the whole country. These numberless circles of wrangling factions pour in upon the President, and we have the present disgraceful spectacle. Those who protest are not a handful; the protest is almost universal. The other side of the question is the despotism in the arbitrary removal of over 100,000 place holders, and in putting into their places a like number of partisans. This is "the danger to free institutions which lurks in the power of official patronage," referred to in the republican platform. This danger is to be fought on every hand, in season and out of season. And the struggle can not be regulated by what it is thought reasonable to expect of President Harrison. For instance, he chooses to let congressmen distribute spoils. We regard this as without warrant in the constitution, and subversive of the objects of the constitution. Beyond all this we regard it as the key to the defences of the federal spoils system. The public business will never be done upon business principles while congressmen practice, in their respective territories, feudalism adapted to modern times. We mean to bring the facts of this American feudalism to the notice of the people to the fullest extent in our power. And if in persistently insisting that the facts shall be faced we hurt, now the Under-lord, now the Over-lord, now the Lord-Paramount, and now all together, it will be their fault for causing the facts to exist.

EXAMINATIONS.

A teacher who is in thorough sympathy with the need for ending the system of taxing the entire people in order to provide asylums for favorites is in doubt about the wisdom of the present plan of "competitive examinations." He says: "I am a teacher, and therefore supposed to be wedded to the examination system, but the supposition in my case is an incorrect one. My observation is that the system is pernicious. I venture the assertion that the teachers holding the highest grade of license in Indiana to-day are not the most successful teachers."

This opinion is founded on two wrong suppositions; first, that the examinations to the classified civil service are like those in schools, and second, that the work done by the public employe is of the same character as that required of a good teacher. The tests required of applicants to the police force, the fire department, the health department, the park department, the sewer department, the prisons, the hospitals of those cities under this system are not entirely, nor in any considerable degree, literary tests. In some of these not the slightest literary test is exacted, and yet they are competitive examinations.

The competitive examinations for policemen are for strength, for running, for endurance. These qualities rank first, and, in grading, are so counted. Then come tests for his knowledge of the city, and of the laws, and of his wit in meeting emergencies peculiar to his work, and these have a certain proportion in making up his final standing, and, incidentally, his ability to read and write and compose sentences has to be tested. These, in the final estimate, are counted least. The examinations in schools and for teachers are entirely literary tests. The examinations for entrance to the civil service are examinations bearing upon the work to be done, and are, therefore, only incidentally literary, and, in many cases, the literary test has been entirely excluded. It must not be forgotten, though it generally is, that any and all of these examinations only admit the successful applicant to a chance for a trial. As to comparing the work, we think we have only to suggest to this teacher that every day and every hour in the day if he is a successful teacher, he has to do original thinking, to be a creator as a writer is a creator, while the public employe as a rule has nothing but routine work to do—to make his hand quicker and his eye more true.

THE CIVIL SERVICE AND PUBLIC TEACHERS.

To do the public business well and cheaply, and to avoid the serious disturbance to the business of the country involved in changing 100,000 employes and hiring 100,000 others, are the phases of civil service reform that concern taxpayers. Whatever touches the pockets of the people, always commands the first attention; but that it is, therefore, of most relative importance does not at all follow. Happily there are two professions, the minister and the school teacher, who aim to view questions first as they affect the moral well-being of the community. They have a pressing and peculiar part in the abolition of the spoils system.

The moral degradation of slavery was palpable. It could not be blinked. The moral degradation of the spoils system is not less. Like slavery, it walks hand in hand with brutality, suffering and treachery; but like a dry-rot, it works under the surface.

Consider the suffering experienced by the families dependent upon the 100,000 government employes, who work under the apprehension that each day may be the last of certain employment and the beginning of the search for new. Consider the helplessness of thousands of the most capable and conscientious wage-workers when compelled to seek new employment after years of routine in a certain line. It is not surprising that, in the face of this, men yield to the temptation to do "base service," for the man who controls their living in this way. It is now as it was when cities were to be sacked for the loot; all that is brutal and base in men is supreme under the knowledge that places are for spoil. The past four years have afforded a melancholy spectacle of men eyeing greedily their neighbors, and pressing, and lying, and fighting for their places in the government service. The coarse callousness to suffering that goes with any degree of following that mediæval maxim, "to the victors belong the spoils," must exclude it from the practices of a civilized people. It goes along with mutilating and scalping the enemy.

But the suffering involved in this system is not the worst thing about it. The treachery, the cowardice, the servility, the dishonesty connected with holding office under it, or seeking office under it, lead to a moral paresis. The people of this country would not tolerate the baseness of the system for one moment were they compelled to see it. But the otherwise excellent men, who pass through these bogs on the way to the consummation of their ambition, are not fond of describing in public places the filth that sticks to them. Whose duty is it to do this unpleasant and unpopular work? We must look first of all to the minister and to the school teacher to so clear their vision of party bias and party passion as to see the facts. It is their duty to cut away the sophistry and the juggling with words with which spoilsmen seek to hide the facts from an indolent people. The principles of this reform, the practical workings of it when tried, they must know and must tell. All this has been shown by Professor Moncrief in another column, and it must convince the clergy of Indiana that their duty does not end with silent hope for the abolition of the spoils system.

But now, when the principles have been explained and the belief frankly stated, the duty of the minister and of the school teacher ends. When the practical application of these principles comes and the matter is brought for decision before the tribunal of public opinion, it remains for these men to decide whether they will watch the contest from afar or go down into the battle. Each man must decide whether his personal tastes or his peculiar place in the community make it best for him to enter into a struggle where the passions of men are so fierce and unbridled. This work has to be done by somebody; but volunteers are generally to be found, and in this, as in other memorable struggles, there are different uses for different men. It has seemed necessary for the civil service reform association of this state, during its brief existence, to war not a little; but it has room for the men of peace; it understands their position and it asks for their co-operation.

THERE is, we believe, but one rule in this matter, and that is for the classified service to be held up to the law without a single exception, and whenever a man is discharged from it the cause to be made known, and moreover that cause to be so palpable as to make an end of argument.

This from the Indianapolis News is an example of the clearness and steadiness with which for years it has maintained the sound construction of the civil service law and pointed out the ways in which alone it can be made of effect.

THE HISTORY OF A RAILWAY MAIL CLERK.

The way of the well-doer is at least sometimes hard. W. H. Craft had been employed in the railway mail service as a substitute for two years when President Cleveland came in. A substitute has no regular run, but has to depend upon temporarily getting the places of regular clerks who for some reason do not go out. Craft was a republican, but had no political influence, and got no promotion. It is admitted on all hands that he became a skilled and efficient railway mail clerk. In 1885, under the new regime, he was not employed for seven months, but finally the chief clerk at Indianapolis asked him to take work again, saying that many men had been discharged and the service was weak. He went back and took the work of a substitute. He has run on the Pittsburgh and St. Louis, the Chicago and Cincinnati, and other heavy lines running through Indianapolis, and has filled every position from third man down. In 1888 he had three examinations, standing 99.21, 99.29 and 99.45. In one examination he threw 1,376 cards into 149 boxes, and made 11 errors. In another he threw 700 cards into 127 boxes, and made 5 errors. In another he threw 1,971 cards into 150 boxes, and made 11 errors. Running upon so many different lines, he learned an unusual number of schemes. Yet, in spite of his undoubted efficiency, new men came into the service and were by dozens appointed over him. He had anything but a steady job. Having a family to support, he hunted work ravenously, and what with keeping up the runs he secured and looking out for a new one to follow, and trying to collect what he had earned, he alternated between excessive overwork and anxiety for want of work. The chief clerk favored him as much as he could. Once when the state supreme court, the state executive departments, the United States post-office department, and the congressman from this district, astonished the country by the appointment as transfer clerk at the union station of a man who had been twice in state prison and had been eleven times in jail as a violator of the law, a vacancy occurred in that position until the authorities could recover from the shock, and Craft was appointed as acting clerk, working from 6 A. M. to 6 P. M. He was there a month and ten days. To see a republican in that position threw the local democracy into convulsions, and Craft had to be removed. The chief clerk told him that he could continue on the road as a substitute where he would not be seen.

There are interesting facts in his experience. He ran for months for one clerk, who, in addition to being a railway mail clerk, had a cigar business and much political work for his congressman to attend to. The cigar man drew the full pay, which was so much a day, Sundays and all, paid Craft the week-day wages and kept for himself the wages for Sundays, amounting to about $10 a month. This was the rent to the lord of the fee, who in thirteen months himself took his run only 135 days. In another case Craft ran many weeks for a regular clerk who was less generous. In this service there is a run and then a lay-off for rest. This clerk, who had done no work, drew the whole pay and handed over to Craft the per diem for the actual run and himself pocketed the per diem for the lay-off. There were other experiences; some more pleasing and some meaner. Some paid him readily, some after repeated duns and some not at all. Craft was in no position to dictate terms. The general result was that in order to make fair wages Craft was obliged to run all the time. At last it seemed as if a full appointment was certain, and his name was sent to Cincinnati at the request of Superintendent Gwin, but nothing came of it, and Craft is still a substitute. Thus the spoils system works out its meanness and injustice.

POSTMASTER PEARSON.

The refusal of the President to re-appoint Postmaster Pearson to the New York post-office is an important event. The latter became postmaster in 1881, succeeding Mr. James, promoted to be postmaster-general, and who had since 1873 been laying the foundation for the total breaking-up of the practice of using the positions in the office to pay personal and party debts. This work was entirely completed by Mr. Pearson. Few people are aware of the greatness of this office as a business institution. There are 2,276 employees. These handle annually 3,700,000 pouches, deliver locally 355,000,000 letters, do $85,000,000 money order business, and receive and deliver 6,400,000 registered letters in packages. The office has an income of $5,100,000 and $3,200,000 receipts over expenditures. This is the coming and going mail of all the world. The statement of these facts is a demonstration that there is here no room for anything but the sternest business principles, and such is the condition of the office as Mr. Pearson walks out of it. He has made it as free from politics of every kind and nature as Broadway is free from weeds. Before the passage of the civil service law, he had the competitive system in force. Since the passage of that law there have been a few leading positions which he might have filled with reference to politics, but he has declined to do so. In every case of such a vacancy he has promoted a skilled man from the ranks of the classified service. He has held his men to their duty, and whenever an employee deteriorated in his work, competition put him in a lower grade and put a more skilled or a more faithful man in his place. He was the one postmaster who gave the law the "benefit of a friendly interpretation" to its fullest extent. As a result he had incomparably the best post-office service in this country.

In doing this work obstacles have been put in his way in a manner to stir the indignation of every fair man. His office became of the greatest use to the public but it was absolutely worthless to the party machine, and the party machine has followed him with remorseless hatred. It believed that he was the one man who stood in the way of enormous spoil to itself, and through change of parties and administrations it pursued its end of displacing him by one of its own. In President Arthur's time the postoffice department had an investigation made, of which Mr. Pearson was kept absolutely ignorant. Upon this, secret charges were filed that he was connected with some local dispatch companies. These charges were referred to Attorney-General Brewster, who, without inquiring for the other side of the case, recommended Mr. Pearson's dismissal. Three months later Postmaster-General Gresham wrote to Mr. Pearson a personal letter that such charges had been made and had been turned over to the district attorney in New York. Mr. Pearson's refutation was complete, and he showed that, more than a year before, he had three times written to the department urging it to break up these dispatch companies, but received no encouragement. These charges were on file when Mr. Cleveland became President and were made by the new machine to do the best duty possible, but without avail. And Mr. Pearson, in answer to an enormous demand of the business men of New York, was re-appointed. Of this the New York Tribune said, April 1, 1885:

"The re-appointment of Postmaster Pearson gives general satisfaction to those citizens who care for efficiency in that branch of the civil service here. It satisfies the public, because it is a good thing in itself: because Mr. Pearson is one of many republican officials who have proved so conspicuously fit that their removal, on whatever ground, and irrespective of the personal merit of any who may be selected in their stead, would be a positive detriment to the public service. Such an appointment is, of course, to be commended most heartily as a good thing in itself. * * * In itself this appointment is admirable * * * Mr. Pearson's unquestioned and superior fitness renders his retention in office the clear duty of a President who means to improve and not to degrade the public service."

The machine, though temporarily baffled, was nevertheless tireless. It found a willing ally in the new post-office department, whose course is a record of petty meanness. This office netted the government over three millions, yet the most urgent requests for reasonable allowances to pay employees were met with niggardly paring, or with silence, or with a short refusal. In one case it was fully granted with directions to raise the money by dismissing employees and cutting down salaries. Mr. Pearson required the work of the office to be done, and the department succeeded in its apparent plan of making his employees complain of him. His requirement that a man should do his duty crowded out of the service those who could not do the work and those who wanted sinecures. These banded together at the instigation of the local party machine and made up another attacking column, and these too were encouraged by the department at Washington. They failed in their object. Mr. Pearson could not be harried into resigning, and that party machine was compelled to pass off the stage and leave him in office. Its spirit never dies. The weapons against Mr. Pearson instantly passed into other hands.

The new men had expected to make the attack on the ground that in 1884 Mr. Pearson kept republican employes away from the polls and defeated Mr. Blaine. This was passed from mouth to mouth all over the country, but it was found out that it could be demonstrated to be a falsehood and it had to be dropped. The public does not know what the motive power was that at last succeeded in displacing him. It does know that the good of the service had nothing to do with it. He had been in the post-office business from boyhood. He was by nature fitted for it. He had great energy and executive ability. He was in every respect a trained officer. He was a manly and fearless man, and he performed the duties of his office in a manly and fearless manner. No new man can for a long time do anything but look on while his subordinates perform their duties and teach him his. Such a change is not for the good of the service. The new man, Van Cott, emphasizes this view. He apparently has a life-lease on office, for he has held office for years; but he is ignorant of the post office business, and his office-holding has not been because he was a skilled and efficient officer, but because he had done party work, for which he must be provided a place.

There is probably no other single act by which President Harrison could have damaged himself and his party so much throughout the country. The thousands of men who voted for him and who regret this act are silent men, but they are men with long memories. It is one of the things that will bear heavily in the scale when the account is taken at the end of this administration. The time has gone by when such a course is wise considered even as a party measure. In making his office stand out for years as a great business institution, in the midst of the general riot of the spoils system, Mr. Pearson has rendered a distinguished service to the country. His present reward has not been generous. On the other hand the "workers" have won a victory, but it is like the victory of the elephants of Pyrrhus

THE INDIANAPOLIS FIRE DEPARTMENT.

Some time ago the chief of the Indianapolis fire department was supplanted by a new man under circumstances that seemed inexplicable to the people of the city. We think it is fair, both to those who brought this about and to the people, that the facts of the matter should be impartially stated, and we have been at some trouble to gather them.

Joseph H. Webster is 56 years old, and entered the fire department of Indianapolis in 1860 as a stoker, working in that position four years. Then, for ten years, he was driver of the hook and ladder truck, of which he then, in 1874, became foreman. In 1876 he was elected assistant engineer by the council, and held that place for two years, until the office was abolished, and he then served again as foreman until 1882. He was then elected chief engineer by the council, and was steadily re-elected until January 1, 1889. Although a republican, the vote at every re-election was unanimous. He has, in fact, never had any other business but that of fireman. The fire department has not been run on a strictly partisan basis. A majority of the employes, both under republican and democratic city administrations, have been republicans. There are now some democrats in the service who have been there for twelve or fifteen years. Under the law, the chief engineer has the sole authority to appoint and remove firemen, and not only individual councilmen, but the council itself is entirely powerless in the matter.

The logical order of the facts is, that in 1885 P. C. Trusler, then a councilman, asked Mr. Webster to dismiss a fireman named Garver from No. 13 on the ground that Garver was "a disturbing element." The fly in the ointment seemed to be the fact that Garver was the only democrat at that station, and, to accommodate Trusler, Garver was transferred to another station. In January, 1888, there were sixteen democrats in the department. Up to that time no one had asked for the discharge of a man avowedly because of his politics. In that month Mr. Trusler again entered the council and was the first to make such a request. He began by calling for the dismissal of Michael Slaven because he was a democrat. In the way of easing Trusler off it was suggested that charges had been filed against Slaven and that he might go out on those. The matter ended by Slaven resigning. At the same time Trusler asked Mr. Webster for the dismissal, for the same reason, of Oscar Ray, an excellent fireman, who had been a substitute at No. 6 for about two years. The demand was yielded to and Ray was discharged by the chief without cause.

Some two weeks later, Mr. Webster being at home sick, the acting chief, Davis, came to his house and said that Trusler had inquired if the chief had discharged John S. Burkhart, a substitute for years at No. 1, who had begun in the fire department by running errands when a small boy. He was a good fireman and was a democrat. The following Sunday Councilman Thalman, having called on him, the chief protested against Trusler's working the democrats out of the department, and Mr. Thalman agreed with him and promised that he would see the other men and that it should be stopped. This was early in 1888. In February the chief was sent for at headquarters and found there Councilmen Trusler and Finch, and Alderman Connett. These men brought up the subject of discharging the rest of the democrats, and Connett wanted to know if Thomas Quinn, foreman of No. 1, could not be removed at once. The chief asked them to go to the council and get an order to him to "reorganize" the fire department on a republican basis, and he promised that it should be done in thirty days or thirty minutes as they should order. He told them that he would not otherwise take the responsibility. They made no reply to this proposition, and soon after the meeting broke up. After this the fire committee of the council, while Mr.

Webster remained in office, never again met at the fire headquarters as had been their custom.

The Presidential campaign came on, and it was unsafe while that lasted to attempt to crowd experienced firemen out of their places because of their politics. After the election, it being settled that the chief could not be moved from his resolution, measures began to be taken to supplant him. About a week before the time for the election of the chief for the ensuing year, Councilman Darnell came to headquarters, took Mr. Webster aside and told him that they had "got" him, but that if he would agree to let one democrat go each month he could be sure of a re-election. The chief refused, and at the election which followed every republican voted against him and secured his defeat.

This is a brief outline of the course which led to Mr. Webster's displacement. There has been some attempt to give other reasons by whispering from mouth to mouth, but these reasons are either known to be false or those who give them are ashamed to speak them aloud. The people of the city were practically unanimous for his retention. The entire insurance interest and a great amount of property interest openly protested, but without effect. This fire department employs eighty-two men, with a pay-roll of over $60,000 annually, and uses fifty horses. The head of it had had twenty-nine years' experience, obtained from holding positions on his merit, and was universally admitted to be admirably adapted to his place. The evidence leads to the inevitable conclusion that he was deprived of his place because he would not, in answer to the pressure of a few local politicians, turn out of the fire department a few democrats who were tried and experienced firemen, and against whom nothing could be urged.

THIS PAPER.

With 100,000 federal offices which may be used to reward personal or party service, the question of civil service is certainly a great one and interests every citizen. The CHRONICLE, at 50 cents per annum, ought to have a large circulation.—Indiana School Journal.

Editorially its contents are pointed and forcible.—Indianapolis News.

The Indiana civil service reformers show a disposition to measure the new administration by the same standard they applied to the last one.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

We have not seen a more able exponent of civil service reform views than this journal is likely to be.—New Albany Evening Tribune.

Its appearance at this juncture, when a greedy army of spoilsmen has the national capital in a state of siege, is peculiarly opportune. We wish the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE success.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

The CHRONICLE is devoted to a reform that challenges the support of all good republicans and democrats.—Putnam Democrat.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given," and, on breach of this condition, "by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord. The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and there professing that he did become his MAN from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord." Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—The following delegates to the last national republican convention have been appointed to office:

E. H. Terrell, of Texas, minister to Belgium. "He was the only delegate from his state that was for Harrison all the time. He made one of the speeches seconding General Harrison's nomination, and did good work among the southern delegates at the convention."

W. L. Dunlap, United States marshal of Indiana.

Smiley N. Chambers, United States district attorney for Indiana.

John B. Cockrum, deputy United States district attorney for Indiana.

Albert G. Porter, of Indiana, minister to Italy.

E. W. Halford, of Indiana, private secretary.

James N. Huston, of Indiana, treasurer of the United States.

—The following appointments of newspaper editors have been made:

Whitelaw Reed, editor of the New York Tribune, minister to France.

John Hicks, editor of the Oshkosh Northwestern, minister to Peru.

Ellis H. Roberts, editor of the Utica Herald, assistant-treasurer at New York.

W. W. Junkin, editor of the Fairfield [Iowa] Ledger, Indian inspector.

James S. Clarkson, first assistant postmaster-general, editor of the Iowa State Register and chairman of the republican state committee.

Robert P. Porter, editor of the New York Press, to be superintendent of census.

—The Iowa State Register says: "The congratulations of Iowa papers will be extended to Mr. W. W. Junkin, of the Fairfield Ledger, who was yesterday appointed an Indian inspector. The position is a pleasant one, and will not compel him to give up his connection with the paper with which he has been so long identified. As a hard-working republican and a newspaper man whose service to the party reaches over more than a generation, Mr. Junkin amply deserves the recognition that has come to him."

—Senator Farwell has been put to great trouble and annoyance in the matter of the Chicago offices. He had to go all the way from Washington to Chicago to choose his men. He has determined that Col. Sexton is most advantageous for the postoffice, and one Christmamer for the collectorship. It is expected that in time Sexton will learn from his subordinates something of the Chicago post-office business, and that in the same manner Christmamer will look on while the work of the second largest revenue district in the country is being in some manner got through with.

—Congressmen are ready to divide the internal revenue collectorships, but it is announced that they can not allot these places until after May 1st.

—The new superintendent of the railway mail service innocently arrogated to himself the appointment of John A. Montgomery to be superintendent of mails in the Chicago post-office. Senator Farwell, the lord of the fee, asserts his rights, as follows:

"I am not objecting to Mr. Montgomery personally at all. I think he is a man that is in every way fitted for the position and will give satisfaction in it; but I don't like the way the appointment was made. I think I should be consulted about matters relating to appointments at my own home. What I complain of is that the appointment was made without my knowing anything about it. I have nothing to say about Mr. Montgomery. He is as well recommended for the place as any man could be, but I think the incoming postmaster should also be consulted as well as me."

"It is reported that the postmaster-general did not know anything about the appointment."

"I don't suppose he did."

"Is it likely that Mr. Montgomery will be allowed to retain the position?"

"I do not know anything about that. The matter has been taken out of my hands and I have nothing further to say about it and don't propose to. He will make a good officer. All I object to is the manner of his appointment. I don't believe any insult was intended. I think it is due to the inadvertence of this new man."

"Have you decided anything about the postmastership?"

"No. I came home for the purpose of trying to select the proper man for the post-office and for superintendent of mails, and have had the matter under consideration, but so far I have been unable to decide about the thing. I may make up my mind some time next week."

"You are reported to have said that the present incumbents in the minor positions will be allowed to serve out their terms?"

"That is my opinion. I think each of the other office-holders will be allowed to remain his four years. In my opinion that will be the policy of the administration."

"It has been reported that the same difference is likely to arise between President Harrison and senators in regard to patronage as divided the late Senator Conkling and President Garfield."

"Oh, I think there is not much danger of that. I see there has been a little trouble about the postmaster at Philadelphia, but there has been no trouble with the Illinois senators. I think the President proposes to treat us fairly. I have no doubt about it."

—Postmaster-General Wanamaker issued the following order: "Hereafter and until further notice all clerks in the post-office department at whose desks papers relating to appointments to office or claims against the departments are filed will not disclose the contents thereof to, nor permit an inspection by, any person except on the written order of the postmaster-general, the first assistant postmaster-general, the chief clerk of the department, or the chief clerk to the first assistant postmaster-general. Where a chairman of a state committee or person by him duly authorized applies for information, the clerk may disclose the names of the applicants for the office inquired about, but further information should not be given."

—More than 140 congressmen recommended for commissioner of Indian affairs Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee. In the 42d congress the vote to expel Butler for selling a cadetship for $900 stood 102 to 68, two-thirds being necessary. He was then unanimously censured by a ye and nay vote.

—First Assistant Postmaster-General Clarkson's paper, the Iowa State Register, says of the offices within his appointment, that "to change these post-offices, amounting to nearly 64,000 in number, from democratic to republican hands, and increase the credit and reputation of the party in doing it, will require an unusual knowledge of men and politics. * * * the President insisted upon his services at Washington on account especially of his knowledge of politics and of the workers in the campaign, and the obligations of the party towards such men."

—General Browne, who leaves for his home at Winchester, to-morrow, made the rounds of the White House and the executive departments a couple of times to-day. On each trip he started out with arms full of applications for office. The General has worked like a slave during the past month to satisfy his office seeking constituents, and he is yet at it during every hour of daylight.—Indianapolis Journal, April 4.

—On March 21, Congressman Browne, of the sixth Indiana district, filed the name of his seventy-first man for appointment in the railway mail service. Some say that he can only claim the fealty of seven railway mail clerks, and that as he already has four "hold-overs" he is only entitled to three more. On March 25, having handed in a batch of names for fourth-class post-offices, it was announced that he would then come home, from which place he would "hereafter conduct his business." He granted several small holdings March 30.

—Congressman Owen, of the tenth Indiana district, has ordered and is superintending a large number of changes of fourth-class postmasters in his territory.

—Congressman Posey, of the first Indiana district, is in Washington allotting fourth-class postmasterships.

—St. Louis, Mo., March 23, 1889.—To the President, Washington, D. C.: DEAR SIR—We have the honor to submit to your favorable consideration, and in accordance with your suggestion to Mr. F. G. Niedringhaus, the following-named citizens of Missouri for appointments abroad: Charles E. Pearce of St. Louis, minister to Mexico; S. H. Boyd of Springfield, minister to Venezuela; Hon. Channcey I. Filley of St. Louis, consul at Liverpool, or something equally as good; George Bain of St. Louis, consul at Glasgow, Scotland; Mr. Richard Bartholdt, consul at Frankfort-on-the-

Main; Dr. H. M. Starkloff, consul-general at Brussels; Frederick Schroeder of St. Joseph, consul at Hamburg; J. H. Kaeser of St. Louis, consul at St. Gallen, Switzerland; P. P. Dobozky of Kansas City, consul at Rome; John R. Musick of Kirksville, minister-resident and consul-general to Siam; George H. Wallace of Fayette, consul-general at Melbourne; Sammel Hays or Charles R. Pope, St. Louis, consul at Montreal; Benjamin Horton, consul at Pesth, or any other small continental consulate; Albert Berg-ss (colored), minister to Liberia; C. H. Tandy (colored), consul to Honolulu. Yours respectfully,

W. H. WADE, M. C.,

Thirteenth District of Missouri.

W. M. KINSEY, M. C.,

Tenth District of Missouri.

F. G. NIEDRINGHAUS, M. C.,

Eighth District of Missouri.

NATHAN FRANK, M. C.,

Ninth District of Missouri.

—Illinois congressmen emphatically refuse to have the office of minister to England given to Robert Lincoln deducted from their share. They say it must be charged up to the President's share.

—Congressmen Sherman, Butterworth, Caldwell and Morey remained in Washington to see to the division of spoils for Ohio. It is claimed that Ohio does not get her share.

—Great fault is found with the Kansas congressmen, Ingalls and others. They are accused of giving the places to "old-timers," and of not giving "young blood" due recognition, and according to the Hon. W. P. Hackney, in the Topeka Capital-Commonwealth, these Kansas over-lords are even in danger of losing their holdings: "Our senators and representatives are either imbeciles or nincompoops, and I suspicion them of being both. The only way to get anything from them is to give them hell, and then they will get the office in order to keep them quiet. Oh, we have a daisy outfit, you bet. What a grand lot of shovelers on the street they would make! and that is about their size. But I digress, and beg pardon of the street-shoveler. What Kansas needs is a new deal all round in both senate and house—broad, liberal-minded, and unselfish statesmen who have some conception of the magnitude of their position and the very high honor the people have conferred upon them. These fellows are not and do not."

—As has already been stated, the Pennsylvania senators will appropriate to themselves the disposition of all the leading federal offices in the state and all offices in democratic districts, leaving to the congressmen only the fourth-class postmasterships and appointments to the railway mail service. There will be few exceptions to this rule.—Philadelphia Press.

THE question whether Pennsylvania is given over by General Harrison to a Gorman system, and is to be the Maryland and Botany Bay of this administration, is made sharp and plain by sudden developments concerning the post-office of Philadelphia. Mr. Wanamaker, it seems, offered this appointment to his friend, Mr. John Field, an energetic, intelligent merchant, a republican, and a man very competent for the duties of the place. But the fact of the offer became known and at once the political machine was put in motion to stop it. Senator Quay was amazed to hear that Mr. Wanamaker had plans of his own—for this one, it is alleged, had not been communicated to the senator—and made haste to file his own recommendation of that highly approved Philadelphian, ex-Sheriff Leeds. Mr. Field, however, after some hesitation, has decided to accept the appointment, and has so notified the postmaster-general.

In this shape the matter rests at this writing.

It is reported on one hand that Mr. Wanamaker has been compelled by Mr. Quay to give up his purpose of appointing Mr. Field, and that he will break his promise to that gentleman; on the other hand, it is declared that Mr. Quay, in the course of a two or three hour interview, on Tuesday night, could obtain no such concession. Doubtless any person of ordinary capacity would say that the postmaster general would of course select himself the postmaster of the city in which he lives, and that the attempt of a person living on the Ohio line—even if he be a member of the United States senate—to drag him concerning the matter would be a most gross and impudent proceeding.—The American (Rep.) March 30.

PROF. MONCRIEF ON MINISTERS AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

To the Civil Service Chronicle:

I have been asked briefly to discuss the desirability of ministers lending active assistance to the civil service reform movement. It seems best to begin with a general view of the political situation.

It is evident that the agonies of a presidential campaign, with its accompaniments, are fast becoming too great to be endured. These agonies are not only those temporary agonies which pass away as soon as the administration comes in and the spoils are distributed, but also the agonies of the disappointed "workers," the agonies of those who have been ousted for "offensive partisanship," and the agonies of the thoughtful and patriotic citizen who sees clearly that something must speedily be done or democracy will again prove a failure—and that, too, on a more gigantic scale than the world has yet seen.

Now, apart from the "ins" and the "outs," why did we have such intense excitement in the masses during our last campaign? The cause was not patriotism, for all intelligent people knew that the commonwealth would neither stand nor fall with either of our great parties. The cause was not principle, for it was evident that while there were real issues, they were so exaggerated as to be very like party shibboleths. But, positively, we find the zeal without knowledge of the honest but deluded masses who had been led to believe that their physical, moral, and almost spiritual existence depended on the results of the election. These good people thought they were patriotic and devoted to principle; they were in fact dupes. And this leads us to the real cause which appears in the last analysis—the selfish interest of party leaders who hoped for material gain in the spoils of victory. These men, with their myriads of henchmen of all grades and characters, were able to work the people into a frenzy of excitement, and politics became a shrewd scheme by which demagogues sought to gain their own selfish ends at the expense of the rest of us; and most of us fell into line, grew enthusiastic in depleting the exchequer, degrading the morality of citizenship, and giving our commonwealth a telling impetus towards dissolution.

Now it is confidently believed that the removal of the civil service from party politics would go far towards reducing this political madness to a normal political enthusiasm—and to the same extent we should have healthy political action.

Now, has the Christian minister any part in the accomplishment of so great a work? It appears to me that he has, and the following are some of the reasons: 1st. He is a citizen, hence he has a citizen's rights and a citizen's obligations. It follows, then, that he has more than a passive interest in all that pertains to citizenship.

2d. He is a leader of men. If he be true to his noble calling, his influence is far-reaching. He is not out of the world, but he is in the world, and he must be in perpetual contact with the things of the world; he is simply commanded to keep himself unspotted from the world. He is at liberty, then, to the full extent of his ability and opportunity, to aid in the world's great movements to higher and better things. Such a minister, if he can not become profoundly learned in political science, will at least keep along with the best conclusions of that science, and so become an indispensable co-worker of the true statesman.

3. The minister will thus widen his influence with certain classes of citizens. Our age demands almost omniscience of a minister. If he can not enter intelligently and sympathetically into the secular ideas of his parishioners he soon gets the reputation for lacking common sense, and at the same instant is short of much of his strength.

4. In the nature of the case the minister must ever be unqualifiedly opposed to immoral tendencies as well as immoral acts. We have seen that a most prolific source of immorality is in the spoils system. And we may add that things have grown rapidly worse, until our last campaign startled all thoughtful citizens. To illustrate the state of political immorality take bribery. Since the election I have talked with many leaders and with many of the rank and file in both our great parties. They all admit it—most of them deplore it. This is not new to any one. Everybody knows it. What confidence can members of churches who have engaged in this business have in each other? What equipment have they for aggressive Christian work? What do those who make no profession of Christianity think of such Christians? And just here I wish to make certain quotations from a great man. They are from Lieber's Political Ethics—a book that I am just now re-reading with great care and great profit. The book was written in 1837-8. Those who are acquainted with Dr. Lieber's life know that he was not simply a learned theorist, but a man of wide and varied experience. Discussing honesty in politics, he says: "Thousands go every Sunday to church, and willingly admit everything that may be brought forth on the solemn obligation of truth, and yet are ready on Monday to asperse in public articles the character of a fellow-citizen knowingly with false accusations, or with charges the truth of which they know that they have not taken sufficient care to ascertain."*

Again: "So soon as covetousness becomes general in a civilized nation, so soon as dishonesty is a general crime, so soon as public places are considered by common consent as fair opportunities to enrich their holders willing to wink at each other's embezzlements, so soon as parties consider themselves by their success entitled to the spoils of the public—so soon there is a deadly cancer in the vitals of that society, and hardly anything but severe changes and revolutions can save it. Justice will be sold, bribes become common, public opinion become vicious, veracity will be disregarded, patriotism be derided, every memory of greatness or nobleness be disgraced, oppression in every degree become general, and the moral tone of society at large, which must always remain the first spring from which prosperity flows, will vanish."†

Dr. Lieber then illustrates from the history of England, France, Italy, Rome, Athens. If he were living now would he venture to prophesy?

Then, in view of patent facts in our present politics, in view of the solemn warning of the political philosopher, can the Christian minister be at peace with his conscience except by giving his energetic support to the cause of a reform that promises to remove so many of the causes of the present state of things?

5. Students of church history know that since the Reformation there has been a very marked development of the ethical tide of Christianity. In some cases this idea has been carried out too exclusively, but upon the whole we welcome the later development. There can be no doubt as to the agreement of Christian ethics and the ethics of civil service reform. And in this ethical development of Christianity the Christian minister finds a basis upon which to stand while supporting the great reformatory movements of his day.

6. When the minister takes up the cause of civil service reform, he does not at the same time become a party politician. The best men in all parties are its truest friends. The Chicago platform was not uncertain in its sound. President Harrison in his letter of acceptance was equally clear. The best elements in the democratic party and in the prohibitionist party are in perfect accord with the republican party and President Harrison on the subject of civil service reform.

Wise and good men may differ on the tariff and other questions of policy, but the matter of civil service reform is no longer debatable; the wisest and best statesmen of the civilized world have returned a unanimous opinion in its favor, and it now remains for us all to unite in bringing about its realization in the United States.

J. W. MONCRIEF.

FRANKLIN COLLEGE, March 27, 1889.

THE SIEGE.

—President Harrison said, in March, "I have been overrun with office-seekers since I arrived in Washington, and instead of having time to devote to the consideration and selection of foreign ministers and other important officials, I have actually spent it all in listening to the statements of delegations and in the purely clerical labor incident to the proper classification and arrangement of applications for office."

—Secretary Windom said, in March, "I have not had five minutes' talk with the President in a week, except at cabinet meetings. It is difficult to find the occasion. There are only twenty-four hours in the day, and some of them must, of necessity, be given to sleep. We shall not have time to do anything unless these people go home and give us an opportunity to attend to the public business."

—On April 3, 1,500 persons came up the elevator to call upon Secretary Windom, and most of them gained an audience. A prominent under official said: "This thing ought to stop. Mr. Windom, as a matter of fact, has as yet had no time to attend to the government business. His time has been wholly occupied in hearing statements about appointments to office."

—April 2 President Harrison received over 100 office seekers, each accompanied by congressmen. After it was over he said that for the life of him he could not remember what any one of them wanted.

—Some thirty men, including seven office holders, went from Buffalo to Washington April 9, and took post in the Arlington hotel. From there they marched to the door of the White House, and after a parley were admitted by the door-keepers and appeared before the President. Speaking with one voice through one of their number, they demanded that Editor Morgan should be given the place of collector of customs at Buffalo. There was no evidence that the good of the service needed a new collector, or that the President was hunting for one. There was everywhere prevalent the fact that Morgan must have a place.

—According to the Indianapolis Journal's Washington correspondent, congressmen have ordered out so many democratic postmasters that the department is much behindhand in making out commissions for the new henchmen. The postmaster-general says that he must have new clerks to do this work or it will have to be delayed somewhat while he and his present clerks go back to the work pertaining to carrying mails, for which they were appointed and for which the post-office department was organized. On the division of spoils the entire force works three and one-half hours extra daily.

—There are on an average six applicants for each of the 57,000 post-offices, great and small, the larger having more than 100 each. At the post-office department each state has a great case of pigeon-holes equal to the number of its counties, with extra ones for its larger post-offices. A large force of clerks is constantly employed, and the entire force works extra hours morning and night in sorting and briefing applications and putting them into these pigeon-holes. We don't know whether this is "practical politics" or "practical civil service."

—There are 40 applicants for the Manchester consulate, and for Birmingham 230.

—Under the constitution and laws the secretary of the treasury is appointed to attend to the business of his department. It was hardly contemplated one hundred years ago that such a notice as the following, posted conspicuously by Secretary Windom, would be necessary:

"The secretary of the treasury reserves the time from 10 to 11:30 o'clock A. M. for receiving senators and members of the house of representatives. Other persons desiring to see him upon matters relating to official patronage will please call between 11:30 A. M. and 1 P. M. The secretary requests that he may be excused from receiving visitors after 1 P. M., in order that he may be able to devote a part of the day to the consideration of the current business of the department."

—"Once in five minutes," says the Chicago Tribune, "the head of some democratic postmaster drops into the basket."

--So far President Harrison has made 374 nominations where President Cleveland made 171.

By the 1st of May a good many incompetents who thought they had secured life leases on their positions can be weeded out of the mail service and their places filled by men who know the geography of the country and can read writing.—Indianapolis Journal, March 14.

The official guillotine appears to work smoothly and with great rapidity.

The eye of the executioner seems to be fixed on Indiana, and democrats are momentarily retiring from public service.

Mr. Wanamaker's official guillotine appears to be working very smoothly.—Indianapolis Journal, April 13.

CORRESPONDENCE.

--From Lawrence county. "So far as this community is concerned, I think that about ninety per cent. are seeking Indian agencies, post-offices or some other facile and luxurious method of serving the government."

--From Fort Wayne. "Now is the time to renew work in the civil service reform cause. Many good names can be secured here by the aid of a little personal effort."

--We are permitted to quote the following: "In returning the constitution of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association with my signature attached, I beg to say that so long as the association stands by and lives up to the declaration of Mr. Foulke in his late address, that it will measure Mr. Harrison by the very same standard that it applied to Mr. Cleveland, so long will I aid the association in its efforts to make its objects obtain."

--Also the following from Vincennes: "It has occurred to me that the association might devise ways to assist and strengthen the President in the carrying out of the sentiments of his inaugural. He ought to be protected from his friends--the Indiana cormorants. We will hope and labor that the cause may be advanced during the current term."

--A clergyman writes: "Civil service reform is absolutely essential to the well being of our government. The recent assault upon the President is enough to disgust decent people and make one want to take a Gatling gun and blaze away at the politicians and hungry office-seekers."

--A university professor writes: "The spoils grabbers seem to be flaring and blaring, like an old-fashioned tallow dip, with the largest blaze just before they go out."

HENRY A. RICHMOND, of Buffalo, delivered an address upon civil service reform before the Young Men's Association of that city, which was published in the Buffalo Express March 24. Mr. Richmond was one of the civil service commissioners of New York and has an extended knowledge of the subject both in theory and in practice, and his address shows it.

Address THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE, Indianapolis, Indiana.

There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the Executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press. We have learned, too, from our own as well as the experience of other countries, that golden shackles, by whomsoever or by whatever pretense imposed, are as fatal to it as the iron bonds of despotism. * * *

It was the beautiful remark of a distinguished English writer that "in the Roman Senate, Octavius had a party, and Antony a party, but the Commonwealth had none." Yet the senate continued to meet in the Temple of Liberty, and talk of the beauty and sacredness of the Commonwealth, and gaze at the statues of the elder Brutus and of the Curtii and the Decii. And the people assembled in the forum, not, as in the days of Camillus and the Scipios, to cast their free votes for annual magistrates or pass upon the acts of the senate, but to receive from the hands of the leaders their share of the spoils.—President Wm. Henry Harrison's Inaugural Address, Congressional Globe, vol. 7, pp. 234-5.

Some fifty or sixty editors of leading journals have been appointed to office by the present Executive [Jackson.] * * * But the ground of complaint is that the aiding, by the press, of the election of an individual, is rewarded, by that same individual, with a gift of moneyed offices. Men are turned out of office, and others put in, and receive salaries from the public treasury, on the ground, either openly avowed or falsely denied, that they have rendered service in the election of the very individual who makes this removal and makes this appointment. Every man, sir, must see that this is a vital stab at the purity of the press. It not only assails its independence, by addressing sinister motives to it, but it furnishes from the public treasury the means of exciting these motives. It extends the executive power over the press in a most daring manner.—Daniel Webster's address to the Massachusetts Whigs in 1832.

The danger, then, consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this house, before the senate, for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. * * * Can we suppose a President, elected for four years only, dependent upon the popular voice, impeachable by the legislature, little, if at all, distinguished for wealth, personal talents, or influence from the head of the department himself; I say, will he bid defiance to all these considerations, and wantonly dismiss a meritorious and virtuous officer? Such an abuse of power exceeds my conception.—Congressman James Madison, June, 1789.

WE again ask friends of civil service reform to subscribe for the CHRONICLE, reminding them that this is not an enterprise for pecuniary profit. We can not employ a canvasser and must trust that those who want to see the cause succeed will take the trouble to put fifty cents in stamps into an envelope and mail it. We have a long list of names in this state to whom this paper can be profitably sent. We have received and are anxious to receive more subscriptions to enable us to mail the CHRONICLE to this list.

THE President has at last appointed the civil service commission, and the great excellence of his appointments helps to make up for the lateness of their appearance. Theodore Roosevelt is entirely a republican, but he is also entirely an outspoken civil service reformer. And the same may be said of Mr. Thompson mutatis mutandis. Both of these gentlemen will appreciate the dignity of their office and the great work of reform to be done in the civil service. They will maintain their rights and the rights of the law and will not attempt to shape the course of the commission in a way to mollify the the Ingallses and the Farwells. The matters which need their instant attention are the letting in of daylight upon all the operations of the law and the establishment of the complete independence of local boards.

WE have seen the original letter from the post-office department requesting the resignation of R. S. Stuart, an inspector, on the ground of lack of money. This being refused, he was removed. We have also seen that other inspectors in the same line were at the same time appointed. Obviously the statement as to lack of money was false. There is passing from mouth to mouth among republicans talk that Stuart was unduly officious, particularly so with Governor Hovey's mail during the campaign. It is also said that he interested himself in the defense of Sim Coy. Very well; if there is a cause for his dismissal let it be stated. It is unbecoming in a great government to have a cause and substitute a falsehood.

THE Indiana Civil Service Reform Association has gained twenty-five new members since our last issue.

SENATOR SHERMAN and Senator Quay or what in this American feudalism is the exact equivalent, Ohio and Pennsylvania, are at war. The cause is best stated in Pennsylvania's own words:

"Senator Sherman is a receiver of stolen goods. There was an agreement made between Pennsylvania and Ohio to divide the internal revenue appointments. Ohio was to have the deputy commissionership of internal revenue, which they got, with the understanding that Pennsylvania was to keep hands off, and that Pennsylvania was to have the solicitors'hip of internal revenue. I had picked out B. Frank Gilkeson, of Bristol, Bucks county, for the place and supposed there would be no interference, but when I went away Ohio went in for the solicitors'hip, too."

"The Percy ow't off Northombarlande,
And a rowe to God mayd he,
That he wold hunte in the mountayns
Off Chyviat within days thre,
In the mauger of doughte Douglas
And all that ever with him be.

"The fattiste hartes in all Cheviat
He sayd he wold kill and cary them away;
'Be my feth,' sayd the doughte Douglas agayn,
'I wyll let that hountyng if that I may.'

* * *
"At last the Douglas and the Percy met,
Lyk to Captayns of myght and of mayne;
They swapte togethar tyll they both swat
With swordes that wear of fyn myllan."

It seems to be undisputed that a man named Paul Vandervoort was chief clerk in the railway mail service in 1883, was repeatedly warned to mend his ways, treated the warning with contempt, declared that he had a "pull" which would amply protect him, was absent from his post 265 out of 310 working days, was in that year and for that reason discharged, and has now been appointed superintendent of mails at Omaha. The Omaha Bee [rep.] says it was done at the solicitation of the Nebraska congressmen, and adds: "It is certainly unfortunate that the state has thus been humiliated before the country." Under the President's plan of allowing congressmen to dictate appointments many scalawags work into the service; but it is inconceivable that the President, knowing as he now does the facts, will allow this particular scalawag to stay there.

It is proposed to erect a monument to the late Henry G. Pearson. It is as fitting to commemorate a civil servant, who has shown to an extraordinary degree traits admired by all men, and has fallen in his prime, as it is to commemorate great soldiers who have fallen on the field of battle. Subscriptions may be sent to William Potts Esq., 35 Liberty street, New York.

THERE is disappointment because President Harrison did not say more fitting things at New York. The cause is plain enough. He names it "public duties of a very exacting character." His work has not been public duties. Since he was inaugurated he has performed few necessary public duties. He has allowed his time and his energies to be drawn upon without cessation, and with a power absolutely absorbing by a class of persons who have but the single object of quartering themselves upon the treasury. To attempt to satisfy them is not a public duty. And no living man can look up after two months' steady attention to this work and go from Washington to New York with it all the time on his mind and make a speech at the one hundredth anniversary of this government, that will not disappoint his friends. The occasion is an exalted one and calls for exalted and noble sentiments. But giving out patronage to party friends and favorites is demeaning to the character, and it deadens the sense to those patriotic and just principles of government, which must, if a government is to live, from time to time be clearly grasped and boldly stated by the leaders of the people.

"It ["mugwump civil service"] has established rules and examinations that practically debar men of experience and sense * * * it can be used as a cloak for favoritism to shut out those who deserve recognition for services rendered the party. * * * It stimulates public lying. * * * It is not in harmony with our form of government. * * * It is therefore the duty of an administration * * * to be represented * * * not by political opponents nor political eunuchs." * * *
—Tom Platt, one of the New York aristocracy of office-holders, in Frank Leslie's Weekly.

"A rogue ne'er felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law."

JAMES PARTON, the historian, encourages the CHRONICLE with money and with sympathy. We are permitted to quote from his letter of April 20:

"The spectacle afforded at present by those at Washington, who are turning out post-masters so fast, is most pitiful and lamentable. What a satire upon them the inaugural celebration at New York! To think that what Washington began so simply and so nobly should have ended in this! There is only one class whom it does not sicken—the professional politicians, and they are the public enemy, as much so as Louis Napoleon was when he got astride of fair France, as much so as Nero was when he fiddled while Rome was burning."

It was a happy thought for Mr. Parton the other night at a dinner where civil service reform was a subject for malediction to pronounce the spoils system "not the system of Louis XIV., but the system of Mme. de Pompadour."

MARSHALL C. WOODS has been appointed box-clerk in the Indianapolis post-office. The place was given to him as spoil, and this has caused remark, for the place was supposed to be within the civil service rules. It was under those rules until 1888, when Postmaster General Dickinson, evidently desiring to keep the law within the narrowest limits, wrote around to different post-offices suggesting there were places that might be exempted from examination. Postmaster Jones naturally met the suggestion with alacrity, and between the two, the box clerk, the weighing clerk and all the money-order clerks, were taken out from under the rules. The pretense is, that they handle money, and that the postmaster, being liable for them on his official bond, should have the right to select those whom he can trust. For instance, Marshall C. Woods now and then collects a little money for box-rent and carries it to the cashier, and Postmaster Wallace by appointing him impliedly declares that he has made a careful selection, and that Woods is more to be relied upon than the clerks who come in under the competitive examination. And the same is true of the man who collects pound-rate postage in the back part of the post-office and carries it a few feet to the cashier. To state the case is to prove that these exemptions were never made except by deadly enemies of the law, and one of the first acts of the President should be to put them under the rules again. A very small bond from each will make the postmaster absolutely secure. And while the President is about it, he would do well to abolish the nonsensical exemption of the "heads" of departments in such post-offices, on the ground that they are "confidential" positions. Such places should be filled by promotion from the ranks after competition and not by ward-workers who leave nothing undone to bring the law into disrepute.

THE post-office authorities here have asked for and obtained a special examination for clerks and carriers, to be held in Indianapolis on May 22. The last examination was in February, and the next regular examination would be in August. There is no lack of names upon the eligible list. Why should a special examination be asked for, and why did Mr. Lyman, then composing the commission, grant it? This is exactly the course pursued by Postmaster Jones and the civil service commission four years ago. Are we to have a repetition of results, also? This office did not need any special examination, and the fact that one is to be held is a strong indication that there is a set of republicans "demanding" places, and that something is to be done to favor them. This is not the enforcement of the civil service law nor are these steps taken by those who want to put that law upon a solid basis. We do not know what the authorities intend, but we do know that persons who are to be examined are very confident that there is to be an underground republican way of getting in. The new local board does not inspire confidence. All concerned had better think twice before bringing about a state of affairs, where, after an examination at an irregular time, and upon practically no public notice, only democrats are dismissed and only republicans are appointed.

AMONG the appointments made by Postmaster Wallace the reinstatement of E. H. Moore as a distributing clerk is reported. Moore was discharged less than a year ago, and he could only get back into the service by the postmaster requesting the local civil service board to certify him again for appointment, and then appointing him. The Indianapolis Sentinel says that Moore was discharged by Jones "for running a gambling house for which he was arrested, taken to jail and subsequently fined. His resort was in the Talbott and New block, and at the time of the arrest a whole outfit of gambling apparatus was found in the place." This charge made some two weeks ago has not been denied. When Moore was discharged by Jones, the civil service reformers did not take up the case because they believed upon investigation that the dismissal was just. It would now be interesting to know first, how the local board came to certify this name for reappointment, when they can lawfully only certify those who have left the service without fault; and second, what is going to be done about it. No greater proof is wanting of the necessity of making local boards independent. Does anyone suppose that a board composed of John R. Wilson, Noble C. Butler and W. P. Fishback would have made the certificate?

NO SYSTEM of civil service reform that contemplates breaking up the use of public offices to pay personal and party debts can for a moment yield that presidential postmasters, heads of divisions, chiefs of bureaus and such officers are as a matter of course to be changed every four years. These places are to be for the rank and file, and are to be the reward of skill and efficiency, and are to be won by competition. The officers themselves are to be officers not of a town or city, but of a service making their duties a specialty, always with the understanding that there is no limit to the power of dismissal. Nothing short of this end will be civil service reform, and the object is not to be given up because there are flying around cant phrases about the good of the service and life-leases and keeping the offices near to the people, and an aristocracy of office-holders. To reasonable people we commend also the excellent plan for treatment of fourth-class postmasters to be found in the Civil Service Record for April.

BILLY PATTERSON.

The post-office department has selected Billy Patterson to be superintendent of mails at the Indianapolis post office. He has for a long time kept a livery stable in Court street with moderate success. He is a genial man who is fairly intelligent in the livery business. He has been helping to run elections in Marion County for many years and has several times been secretary of the republican county committee. His success in that field has been only indifferent and the republican majority has steadily dwindled under the management of himself and his fellow-workers. As superintendent of mails he is supposed to know at any given moment by what route the mail then made up can quickest reach its destination. This involves an exact and extended knowledge of railway time-tables and railway mail routes throughout a large portion of the United States. Further, he is supposed to periodically examine the distributors of the Indianapolis post-office upon their quickness and accuracy as distributors and upon the schemes of places and railways, with which they must be entirely familiar in order to perform their duties. He has other duties, but these two instances are fair examples. Where Billy Patterson is known it causes a smile to suggest that he is qualified for the place. He is not qualified and his appointment is a disgraceful use of public office and the public treasury to give a hardly successful "worker" some money. It is all the more disgraceful because there were at the least twenty men hereabouts qualified by a training of years in mail service, and wanting employment, who could have been appointed. This is a travesty upon the republican doctrine that fitness is the only discriminating test of appointment and every day that Patterson remains elevated before the people will give it additional and rasping emphasis.

THE CENSUS BUREAU AND CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

"The reform should be extended to all grades of the service to which it is applicable." So says the republican platform, and accompanies the declaration with the words, "we will not fail to keep our pledges."

"I am in entire accord with the declarations of the convention." "Some extensions of the classified list are practicable and desirable." "It will be my sincere purpose if elected, to advance the reform." So says General Harrison in his letter of acceptance. The time is not far off when it will appear whether or not President Harrison intends to make good his own promise and the pledge of the party to extend this reform. There is no branch of the service in which skill can be better demonstrated by civil service rules than in the census bureau. There is no place which ought to be kept freer from even the suspicion of partisan influence. This is a kind of work to which civil service reform has already been successfully applied elsewhere. Experience has shown that it is practicable.

The census commissioner himself is reported by the Indianapolis Journal as saying: "I propose to be governed by the following considerations: 1st. Those who have had experience in the last census will have the preference, and 2d. Those who have passed the civil service examination. For others I propose to have an examination and make appointments based upon the results of such examination." The commissioner then recognizes the necessity for trained men, whose ability shall be demonstrated by examination and actual trial, a principle which forms the ground work of civil service reform.

But scarcely is this declaration made when we learn that: "There continues to be strife over the question of extending the civil service law to embrace the census bureau. The proposition is unpopular in all branches of the public service, except in the building where the civil service commissioners are located. Secretary Noble said to-day, that he did not know whether the census bureau would be included in the civil service or not; that he was naturally loath to see that amount of patronage thrown away. He had not referred the question to the President, and did not believe Superintendent Porter would do so. Secretary Noble said he intended to go right ahead and make appointments for the census bureau without any regard to the civil service law, unless he was requested to stop. He believed that the appointments now being made were based upon the very best principle—that of fitness—and that there was no necessity for the civil service law supervening. The civil service commission announced that it can supply all the positions of the census bureau from almost any one of the series, as there are thousands more eligibles than there are places."

Now this matter is of the utmost importance. According to the Journal there are 175 supervisors, 1,200 to 1,600 clerks and over 40,000 enumerators to be appointed. To make these places dependent in any degree upon patronage is to give direct encouragement to political debauchery. The appointments are not all to be made immediately, but the time to extend the rules is the present time, before the scramble begins and before the maximum of "pressure" is applied on behalf of the old system. There is no better place than this to test the character of this administration as a promise-keeper or a promise-breaker. Will the reform be extended to the census bureau?

PAYING THE WORKERS.

Who will do the party work with no spoil? A man who has worked many seasons for his party and has never been paid out of its loaves and fishes, who believes in the necessity of party organization and feels a pride in what his own party has accomplished in that line, would come out squarely for a reform that would manage the public business for the public, if he were not concerned for the future of party organization. He asks who will do the party work if there are no offices for the workers. This organization, reaching into every school district, must be had, and when once you fill the clerical places with men hired only for their fitness and retained for the same reason, they will concern themselves chiefly with doing well the work for which they are hired.

It is hard to say what people will do until they are given a chance to try. If it is permitted to look outside of our own country to England, it is seen that parties are sharply defined, campaigns stubbornly contested and as much party organization had as its greatest admirer could ask for and no dearth of party workers, and all this in a land without the spoil of offices for division. There are two remedies, should it prove upon trial that our people have become so dead to patriotism, so indifferent to great principles at issue as to refuse needed funds for legitimate campaign purposes, to decline to hear speeches or to attend meetings or to shape a plan of campaign unless they were paid. We may return to the present system; or we may adopt a recent suggestion, hire two men for every office; one congressman to study great questions and make wise laws his counterpart to organize out of public officials a body of men, who, as Senator Ingalls eloquently said, will ride for him, fight for him, and arise for him and receive their pay out of the public purse; one railway mail clerk to distribute letters and papers and to feel that his tenure depends upon the quality of his work and his moral character and his counterpart to run for his congressman, to get the caucus packed for him, and to do the other malodorous labor described by Blackstone; to have one postmaster who understands that both political parties are taxed to pay his wages, that both have letters to send and to receive, and that both have eyes to see and senses to be tickled by the most skillful and courteous service, his mate to be the editor of the town paper, the chairman of the county committee, and the postmaster and his work to further, not the best interests of the country, nor of his entire party, but the ends of his own lord. This plan may, at first thought, seem a useless waste of public funds, but in fact it would be less costly than the present system.

SUSPENDING JUDGMENT.

DURING the month the President has said that he ought not to be judged too soon; that dividing offices is not the sole business of a President, and that judgment should be suspended until his action on matters not pertaining to the civil service can be seen.

The President clearly has a wrong conception of the relative weight of his constitutional duties. He is a treaty maker but only to a small extent does this call for his attention. He conducts our business with other nations; but only rarely does this absorb him. His great constitutional duty is with federal offices and federal officers. It is his duty to carry out the laws, and to enable him to do this he is made superintendent of a body of civil employes numbering about 142,000. This is a number six times greater than that under any private employer in this country. To fill the vacancies that would naturally occur in an ordinary business course and to keep these employes up to their work is the one duty of the President compared with which all other duties are insignificant. The President is therefore mistaken in thinking that there is a field outside of the civil service in which he will do great things. If he lets politicians make him believe that his chief work is to trade employes instead of putting employes at work and keeping them at it, he ought not to expect judgment to be suspended. Further, the people care nothing for office-seekers. They sign their petitions to get rid of them, but they hardly give a passing thought to a disappointed office-seeker. It is only the office-seekers who are in earnest, and they are very much in earnest. Men are apt to be so when they think there is within reach a good living and little work. They are apt to get excited, and desperate, and unscrupulous, and threatening, and when disappointed, as most of them must be, they very likely will not vote the party ticket, or at least not work at the next election. Now, this office-seeking demonstration may have blinded the President so that he can not see how contemptuously the people regard the whole business.

HENRY G. PEARSON.

Postmaster Pearson died in April under circumstances that have caused wide and increasing, rather than decreasing, remark. It is admitted on every hand that his death was caused by long and incessant work and care which came to him in the line of his duty as postmaster of New York city. Gradually also, it has come to light that the act of his re-appointment by President Cleveland was the sum total of virtue due the late administration in connection with this post-office. There is an old saying of Andrew Jackson's, "John Marshall has made his decision, now let him enforce it." This was the spirit of William F. Vilas and Don M. Dickinson as postmasters-general, toward the man whom public sentiment had forced the President to re-appoint. To them he had got the office and now he might run it. Through four years they looked on while the best postmaster in the country struggled with his means of work twenty per cent. short, and they answered his appeals for help with curt refusal or brutal cynicism. They hoped to see him break down and make room for one of their kind, but they were disappointed. He did the work as it had never been done before, although it brought upon him the enmity of a large section of his over-worked employes, and cost him his peace of mind and his life. Under no circumstances is Mr. Cleveland to be allowed to escape his responsibility in this matter. This post-office should have been his greatest pride and should have had from time to time his personal attention. He now seems to have thrown the commission as he would throw a bone to a dog, and then turned his attention to distributing 100,000 other places to men of a more congenial stripe.

It would seem that President Harrison in making appointments with that care, without which he has no right to make them, must have noted the excellence of this post-office, and that nowhere could he obtain for it a man by many times so skillful and competent as Mr. Pearson. Further, the magnificent working of this office had been brought about by the most rigid enforcement of those reform principles for which the platform and letter of acceptance upon which General Harrison was elected are noted. Now why did President Harrison refuse to reappoint Mr. Pearson, and second, why did he choose in his stead Van Cott, a man who has lived by politics and whose life has been a steady example of what is not civil service reform? General Harrison is a brave man, and he is also an honest man; these questions out of the mouths of men just as brave and honest, will be put to him until he will admit to himself that in this case fidelity and efficiency were not the sure tenure of office, nor was fitness and not party service the essential and discriminating test of appointment.

THE BRUTAL THOUGH FRANK AND BOLD SPOILS SYSTEM.

President Harrison, in 1886, alluded in the senate to the spoils system as "brutal," but if practiced he wanted to see it boldly and frankly done rather than tricked out in reform disguise. For two months there has gone on at Washington so unblushing a boldness in exhibiting the spoils system in all its savage nakedness that it would make a patriot almost despair, if the signs were not at hand that the evil had got to the point of working its own cure.

There is a large class of easy going and optimistic people in this country who find it more convenient to believe, as long as they can, that all goes well with the republic, and that no cessation from pleasure-seeking, or money-seeking is necessary from them. They have been for years easily irritated at the growing conviction that the time was near when their Puritan consciences would rise up in all their might and compel a recognition of the fact that all was not well with the republic when 100,000 offices, costing $80,000,000 of money, were used by the victorious party to perpetuate its power, and that in this lay a power menacing the free institutions of the country. The President and his party may wreck themselves, but not the reform of the civil service, should the instances of the lust for carnage pile up so thick and so fast that there is no respite from the horrid spectacle.

There are thousands who feel a personal humiliation in the fact that the Chief Magistrate of this country one day worships with all the solemn and grateful associations connected with an august anniversary, in the pew occupied a century ago by Washington, and on the next returns to his patient hearing of the unseemly demands of a band of office beggars. But the hopeful sign is that all over the country banked fires of patriotism have burst out and hundreds, where a few weeks ago there was one, feel that it is worth while for a time to abandon personal ease and go out and rid the land of a danger more menacing and insidious than any foreign foe. It is a notable sign that the religious press has so largely pointed out the cruel significance of the acts connected with Mr. Pearson's death and his fidelity to a high duty at great personal sacrifice. It is a yet more notable sign that in the same church in which Washington, before his inaugural, heard religious services, a bishop of to-day with noble and calm, but unmistakable language, reminds his audience how impossible it is to imagine that Washington could tolerate the sack of the country now in process. Nothing has more surely indicated, than have the wide spread commendations of this sermon, what a rock to stand upon has any President who will look to the people for approval and support in again obeying the constitution and doing the greatest public duty. When the churches and the religious press will, even in the most moderate way, chronicle the passing facts of the spoils system, its extinction is near at hand. A system that tramples ruthlessly on ever precept of humanity must fall.

THE RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

After President Cleveland had performed the only act the civil service law left to be performed, and had put the railway mail service under the law, President Harrison put off the date of taking effect six weeks. As we said last month we believe this act not warranted by law. It does not help the unlawfulness to say that Commissioner Lyman recommended it. The civil service commission was and had been crippled for many months. To make this commission efficient was the most pressing duty upon the President from the time of his inauguration; yet two months went by before this duty was performed. The commission was left composed of one man to get ready as best it could. Now the least to be expected was that the service would be let alone. Instead, here is Congressman Owen, just returned from Washington, having worked out 13 democratic railway mail clerks, and worked in a like number of his henchmen. This is a typical case; from all over the country comes the same story. Towards the end of the six weeks Assistant Postmaster-general Clarkson, a political buccaneer, and Superintendent Bell, apparently a mere tool of this political buccaneer, redoubled their efforts in turning out democrats and putting in republicans, and for sheer lack of time, they neither sent out the dismissals and appointments nor even kept tally. And although the law is pretended to be in force, these papers, made out by hundreds in the last hours before May 1, are now being put into effect. This is a trick worthy of the palmiest of the Gormans and the Vilases. The object of these changes is apparent in the following:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE GEN'L SUP'T R'y MAIL SERVICE,
WASHINGTON, April 13th, 1889.

Mr. J. T. Loving, Richmond, Va.:

SIR—Superintendent Vickery has referred to this office your letter of the 11th inst., asking the reasons for your retirement from the service, and in reply would state that the action was taken in consequence of no fault on your part, or for reasons affecting in any way your character or standing as a citizen.

The reasons for your retirement were of a political nature.

Very respectfully,
J. L. BELL,
General Superintendent.

Some of the men turned out were as good men as were in the mail service. The discriminating test in appointments is shown in such appointments as the negro politician Bagby, mentioned last month, and Billy Patterson and Paul Vandervoort spoken of in another column. There has been a six weeks' loot of the railway mail service. It was not believable that President Harrison would allow it. There is laid upon him a burden from which nothing but heroic treatment can relieve him. He should revoke every appointment made to this service since March 15, and should restore the service as it stood on that day and then should let the law and the rules, and the civil service commission do their work.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given," and, on breach of this condition, "by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord. The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and there professing that he did become his MAN from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord." Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—May 3. The President appointed his brother, Carter B. Harrison, United States marshal for the middle district of Tennessee. It is stated that there was no other candidate. Query: Would any office-seeker be a candidate against a President's brother?

—May 10. The President appointed his brother-in-law, John N. Scott, superintendent of construction of the Port Townsend (W. T.) custom house.

—May 15. The President appointed Alvin Saunders, father-in-law of the President's son, to be member of board of registration and election in Utah. Salary $5,000.

—Congressman Owen's raid:

April 27—Representative Owen arrived from Logansport this morning and went directly to the post-office department to secure some fourth-class postmasterships. He has so far had thirty-six postmasters appointed in his district.

April 29—He camped in the corridors of the post office department, and put a watch upon the office of the general superintendent of the railway mail service. In his pockets he carried various papers intended to procure democratic scalps and put into position several republicans. He has remained steadily on duty, with the exception of the twenty-four hours covering Sunday.

May 3—Representative Owen left Washington to-night for his home at Logansport. He came here to secure a number of changes in the railway mail service in his district, and met with extraordinary success. He secured the removal of thirteen democrats and the appointment of as many republicans to fill their places. This is one more appointment in this service than has been secured by any one man in congress. The clerks about the office of the superintendent of the railway mail service are now referring to Mr. Owen as "the Hoosier hustler."—Washington Despatches to the Indianapolis Journal.

—One of the most difficult and delicate duties falling to the lot of congressmen in the interior of the state is the selection of suitable candidates for post-offices in their districts. With half a dozen applicants for each place, every one of whom is supported by a personal friend of the congressman who imagines that the office rightly belongs to him, the ordeal of selection is one from which any man might shrink.—Philadelphia Press, April 15.

—The papers announced that Huginin was appointed postmaster at Newport, Minnesota. A citizen wrote to Senator Davis remonstrating. He replied that Representative Snider had control of the matter. Snider was seen and said that Davis had been interfering, that when he left Washington, it was understood that Durand would be appointed. Snider "then took the matter in hand," and Durand has been appointed. It seems that Huginin was a client of Senator Davis.

—"I feel to-night," said Senator Cullum "as though Asa Matthews would and should get the First Comptrollership of the Treasury."—Chicago Tribune, April 25.

—The first comptrollership is one of the most responsible positions in the department service. All warrants issued by the secretary of the treasury whether intended to cover public revenues into the treasury or to authorize payments of money from the treasury require the signature of the first comptroller. All accounts examined by the first and fifth auditor and by the commissioner of the general land office are re-examined, revised, and certified to by the first auditor, who also superintends the receiving of all debts due the United States. The requisitions issued in payment of drafts for salaries and expenses of ministers and consuls abroad must be certified to by him, as also the requisitions of marshals, collectors of internal revenue, secretaries of territories, and other disbursing officers for advances of public funds. His power is autocratic, so much so in fact that if he refuses to order the payment of any claim or honor the warrant of even the secretary of the treasury there is no higher power to whom an appeal can be made. The President of the United States cannot compel him to pay a claim, and the only means by which an obstinate first comptroller can be brought to time is by peremptory removal from office. That is what happened to Judge Durham, Mr. Matthews' predecessor, who was removed two weeks ago because he would not allow Johnny Davenport's claim of $3,000 for extraordinary election expenses incurred during the last campaign.

Mr. Matthews owes his appointment chiefly to the energetic manner in which Senator Cullum pushed his candidacy, though he was also indorsed by Senator Farwell and almost the entire Illinois delegation.—Chicago Times Special, May 10th.

—Commissioner of Internal Revenue Mason will very shortly have twenty special agents of internal revenue to appoint. These offices are very much sought by congressmen for active working friends. It appears, however, that of the twenty there are only nine to be distributed among the forty senators and 166 republican representatives. Mr. Mason states that there are four republican hold-overs, who will be reappointed; four who were dismissed by Mr. Miller, but who will be reinstated, and that others have already been promised to high official personages, so that there remain only nine for the rest of the world. There is an equally active scramble for the twenty-eight positions of special agents of the treasury, which are to be divided among the forty-two states. It is understood that the New York delegation has demanded, and been promised, at least six, if not eight, of the special treasury agents.—Indianapolis Journal Washington Special, April 25.

—The fight between the Maine senators and Tom Reed is not waging very briskly, because it is generally agreed that no changes will be made in the important offices at Portland until the terms of the incumbents expire. The war has been declared, however, and no one pretends to conceal it. Mr. Reed insists that he has a right to name the federal officers in his district. The senators maintain that the collectorship of customs, the surveyorship and the collectorship of internal revenue belong to the state at large and should be filled on their recommendation. The senators have already scored two victories—one in the appointment of W. H. Bigelow as division superintendent of the railway mail service, the other in the appointment of E. E. Pond as general appraiser. Mr. Reed had rival candidates in both cases, and in both, to use the language of the heelers, he was "turned down." For the collectorship of customs he is supporting by far the better man, Weston F. Milliken; but the candidate of the senators, Fred N. Dow, is the practical politician, and will probably win. How this local quarrel will effect Mr. Reed's chances for the speakership remains to be developed. —Springfield Republican, April 25.

—"During the last few days the pressure for appointments in the railway mail service has been unparalleled. The clerkships have been allotted by congressional districts, being assigned according to the number of miles of mail route in each district. This rule was enforced under the Cleveland administration, and has been deviated from thus far under Harrison in only a few instances. One result of this arrangement has been that some congressmen, to whom, perhaps, eight or ten places were assigned, have been besieged by from 50 to 100 applicants, and this pressure has, in turn, been transferred to the division superintendents."—Evening Post Washington Dispatch, April 29.

—Clarkson has removed fourth-class postmasters at the rate of from 150 to 200 each day.

I DESIRE TO MEET PARTY ABLE TO SECURE Federal appointment for competent person; with such a liberal arrangement will be made; communications strictly confidential. Address "J. S.," Post-office Box 2938, New York.—New York Tribune Advertisement.

—"Senator Quay, when he went home to Beaver after his tiff with Senator Sherman over the internal revenue solicitorship, left a number of matters unsettled in Washington. He left still hanging in the air all the principal federal offices in Philadelphia, except the post-office. His conference with Postmaster-general Wanamaker on Tuesday resulted in a thorough understanding between them as to the appointment of John Field. It is not likely, however, that the new postmaster will be appointed for some time. That was as far as the conference between Senator Quay and the postmaster-general went. Mr. Wanamaker is not undertaking to name the collector of the port, the collector of internal revenue, the pension agent, or the naval officer."—Washington Dispatch to the Philadelphia Press [Rep.]

—Says the American [rep.], "Since 1881 the hand at Harrisburg has been that of Mr. Quay. It is his 'orders' which direct the course of the legislature. He organizes it, senate and house. He dictates the choice of its presiding officers, and supervises the 'slate' by which the minor officers are selected. He revises the lists of the committees, in order that their action on legislation shall be subservient and not independent. To prevent the possibility that their own conscience and judgment might sway the members, and measures might be adopted contrary to his plans and interests, the whole system of legislative procedure is 'set up' from the beginning, and the whole machinery of the party is employed to make this secure and effective,—machinery to which Mr. Harrison added a driving-wheel for the present session when he constructed his cabinet as Mr. Quay demanded."

—VICE-PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 1, 1889.
Mr. Herbert Welsh, Cor. Sec'y, etc., 1305 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.:

DEAR SIR—In reply to yours of 25th ult., asking an expression of opinion relative to the retention in office of Indian Commissioner Oberly, I would say that, if my wishes could prevail, Mr. Oberly would be removed on the 4th of March, and his place supplied by a competent and conscientious republican.

Very respectfully yours,

J. J. INGALLS.

—"There are thousands of men in my state whom I have never seen, yet who make my cause their own, who defend my acts and my words, who would fight for me, who would sacrifice rest and spend money for me, who would get up at midnight and ride a horse forty miles to set at work influences in my behalf. Well, I am a very immoral politician—I WANT TO GIVE THESE MEN some of the things we have won."—Letter of Senator Ingalls to the Independent.

—It is related of Senator Ingalls that he called on the President and asked for a certain appointment. The President replied: "The man whom Mr. Cleveland found in that office was permitted to serve out his time. I do not see that I can do less than Mr. Cleveland did." The Kansas senator replied: "Well, Mr. President, you know where Mr. Cleveland is now." The President made no reply.—Chicago Times, May 13.

—If Postmaster Carpenter's removal had been accompanied with a fair, frank, and explicit avowal that it was made because he was a democrat, and that the place was wanted for a republican, the operation would have commanded a certain respect. This would have been the case, also, if the public had been plainly told that the removal was made for the purpose of giving an office to the gentleman who has recently been appointed postmaster. * * * We heard a good deal about civil service reform in the last presidential campaign. Over and over again the republican party pledged itself to the strict observance of its principles. Can that party afford to allow this removal, made in this way, to go on record as a redemption of its pledge?—New Bedford Mercury [Rep.] Only the interest of the public service should suggest removals from office.—[Letter of Acceptance.]

—Postmaster Sexton, of Chicago, says:

"Senator Farwell, the republican congressman from this district, and myself will meet at Senator Farwell's office to-morrow, and then we will decide upon the changes to be made in the post-office. They will be few in number, however. Who will lose their heads I haven't yet determined. I haven't any settled policy to pursue, and if an employee's work is satisfactory, no matter if he be a democrat, it will go a great way in his favor."

"Are you or Senator Farwell making appointments?"

"Well," slowly, "I, the postmaster, will make all selections, but, of course, I want Senator Farwell to be satisfied with the men I appoint. I want that they should satisfy the republican congressmen, also."

Col. Sexton has had trouble with the men employed in his foundry because he would not permit labor leaders to interfere with his relations with his employes. In the public service his aim is to "satisfy" Senator Farwell and the republican congressmen.

Later: The appointments were determined at a conference of Congressmen Taylor, Mason, Adams and Farwell, Postmaster Sexton being also present. It is charged that Congressman Adams got the lion's share.

—Congressman Payson, of Illinois, says: "As to the fourth-class post-offices I am getting all that I ask for, and I have asked for a good many. There is some deliberation shown in making these appointments, but they are ultimately made, and without a great deal of delay."

—With regard to the Boston collectorship, the Massachusetts senators support Beard, an "old school" politician, while the representatives support Burden, "who did very efficient service in securing the Massachusetts delegation at the Chicago convention for Harrison." The grave question has arisen whether this is a senatorial office, and the President is reported as saying that there are two sides to the question.

—Why he [Postmaster Van Cott] has been selected by the Platt politicians and forced upon the administration, unless it is because he will be an easy man to manage, is not known to the public.—Philadelphia American [Rep.]

—Congressman Frank telegraphed as follows regarding Collector Barnum and Appraiser Harrigan:

"WASHINGTON, April 18, 1889.

"Hon. F. G. Niedringhaus, St Louis:

"Call on Harrigan and Barnum and ask for their resignations, to take effect on May 1. The President wants it. If they don't resign they will be removed on Saturday. Bring their resignations with you.

NATHAN FRANK."

—The administration has been moving much more rapidly in Missouri than in Illinois in regard to the federal offices, and one man, not a congressman, has had more success than all the congressmen from that state. That man is the famous "Dick" Kerens, who is a partner of "Steve" Elkins in so many enterprises. Kerens secured a contribution of $25,000 for the national campaign fund, although he did not contribute liberally to the state fund—a fact which the congressmen have used against him here, but not with much success. Kerens is understood to have influence both with the President and with Secretary Blaine. At all events, he spent some time here, and secured the appointment of a United States marshal and of a sub-treasurer in St. Louis, and he supposed he had secured the appointment of Isaac Sturgeon as collector of internal revenue. In fact, it is reported that the order had been given to make out the commission of Sturgeon when Secretary Windom directed that the commission be withheld. The reason assigned is that one of the republican congressmen from Missouri arrived here and suggested that the congressmen were entitled to some consideration, and that the whole patronage of the administration ought not to be placed under the control of one man. So confident was Kerens that he was to have his own way about the collectorship that he had taken the train for home, supposing that the case was concluded. This is the story which the Missouri men tell as to the offices in that state.—Evening Post, April 16.

—Congressman Niedringhaus, of St. Louis, writes as follows: "Owing to the increased controversy arising from the present system of indorsements for federal appointments in Democratic districts, the republican representatives of Missouri, on the advice of the department at Washington, have concluded that the whole matter in said districts must be referred solely to the respective republican candidates for congress, whose decision will be considered final as far as any indorsements are concerned."

In the exercise of the foregoing power Defeated Candidate A. C. Eubanks, of the second Missouri district, writes as follows:

MILAN, MO., March 26, 1889.—DEAR SIR:—"I herewith hand you a full and complete indorsement for P. M., which I think will make all right for the P. O. I address you at Moberly, as you requested. In thinking about the matter we were talking about last night, an office like your P. O. ought to afford me $25—say $15 now and $10 more when you get your commission. This would help repay me for expense and time, etc. If there is anything further I can do for you, let me know and I will serve you. It may become necessary to oust the present P. M. If so, I will aid you if necessary.

"Very respectfully, A. C. EUBANKS."

And Defeated Candidate Love, of the third district, talks thus to a republican campaign committee:

"I desire to give you gentlemen notice that the time-honored custom of the party, and I never heard of any other precedent or practice, has been that the republican candidate who is elected or defeated, controls the patronage of the district. It will, therefore, be my pleasure as well as duty, as established by precedent, to receive all applications for local offices in the district and to present them to the President or the proper department at Washington. Of course it will be understood that there will be some expense attached to this proceeding, and applicants will be expected to contribute to this expense."

"As to the establishing of an office brokerage against which slurring insinuations are made (!!!) it is unreasonable to suppose that a person can personally superintend the presentation of applications for office without expense, and I have recently heard from a reliable gentleman that the state committee proposed to open up just such an office in Washington. I give you all notice now [this in presence of a part of the committee and about fifteen or twenty applicants for office] that anyone who comes to me for an indorsement to be presented to the state committee or through any other channel you will please excuse me. I shall indorse no such applicant."

--There was a general shaking up of the Darke county, Ohio, postmasters to-day. The Hon. John Devore, of Greenville, one of the most influential and energetic republicans in the western part of the state, who was a Harrison and Morton elector for the fourth district, was at the post-office department this morning, and secured a number of democratic scalps, and commissions for republican friends. [Here follow eighteen names of fourth-class postmasters.]—Special dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, May 2d.

THE New York Civil Service Reform Association has held its annual election of officers. An address on the present tendencies of the new administration toward civil service reform from the President, George William Curtis, and a memorial of Mr. Pearson by Dorman B. Eaton, were read. The proceedings will be printed and the CHRONICLE will undertake to furnish copies to those who may send their address. The Cambridge and Philadelphia association have recently met to pass resolutions condemning the failure to reappoint Mr. Pearson. The Milwaukee association has held its annual election of officers, and every civil service reformer can do no better than to urge as did Mr. J. E. Follett, in his address:

"That intelligent democrats who desire to enter the public service will not fail of preparing themselves for, and attending the examinations simply for the reason that during the next four years the examinations will be held under what may appear to be republican surroundings."

--If on the accession of any new President enough pressure be made he can "with bare-fac'd power sweep" every such officer from his place. And there is always danger that an overwhelming pressure will be brought to bear on him. The 409 senators, representatives, and delegates in congress have pre-audience with the President. He can not see and talk with everybody. But these hundreds of congressmen he must admit and hear; and if they, day after day, from month to month, incessantly argue, plead for, and demand indiscriminate change, then a break is liable finally to be made. Now, what the civil service requires, and what the best sentiment of the country wants, is that a barrier be interposed to protect the President from this pressure, and which at the same time will tend to establish the civil service on a non-partisan basis.—Administrative Reform by General C. C. Andrews.

THE SCHOOLS AND THE REFORM OF THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The will of the people as expressed in their laws is brazenly ignored by those whose sworn duty it is to enforce that will, and the derelict officers are quietly re-elected to repeat their offense. The offices that belong to the people are used as private property to debauch the public conscience and to defeat the popular will. At the threshold of the second century of our national life we are thus confronted with more intricate political, financial, and social problems than ever before, and the demand upon the intelligence of our citizens is correspondingly greater and more imperative. We must educate our masters or we must let them run the ship of state upon the rocks and learn wisdom from disaster. "But," it may be said, "that is just what we are doing." It is readily admitted that just so far as the work in our schools is productive of real power to think clearly, and of right habits of investigation, just so far it equips the future citizen with the power to decide intelligently the important questions that as a citizen he must aid in deciding; but just so far as that work encourages a stupid reliance upon authority and a readiness to be satisfied with less than a clear understanding of whatever subject the mind addresses itself to, just so far the school is aiding to prepare victims for the demagogue and tools for the unscrupulous politician. And it is an open question to-day which class of citizens is most largely recruited from the scholars that pass in and out at the doors of our schools.

There is not a subject taught in our common schools, except history and civil government, that has the slightest direct bearing upon the civil duties of a citizen; not one other that has a tendency to direct the student's attention towards those duties, to acquaint him with their nature or impress him with their gravity. * * *

Civil service reform has been ably discussed by thoughtful men for twenty years and, though the cause has made great progress, it has not yet progressed so far but that our newly-elected President is compelled to say that he has been constrained to defer the consideration of momentous public business to the importunate demands of place-hunters.

It certainly falls within the province of the schools to explain, in the proper place, what the civil service is, the motive of the duties to be performed by the subordinate employees of the government, to read from the reports of committees, and from the speeches of reverend senators, descriptions of the abuses to be corrected, and methods by which correction may be applied, and to explain the present civil service law. Who can doubt that if every school in the country had done its whole duty in this particular for the last fifteen years the progress of civil service reform would have been materially advanced.

It seems to me, then, that it is profitable for all citizens and especially teachers to consider some of the elements which form a good citizen. The teachers of the common schools in particular have a very great responsibility at this point, for they are preparing pupils to become citizens, i. e., rulers, in other words they are doing what Plato would have done for his ruling class.

Matthew Arnold justly criticizes us for our unceasing boastfulness and our disposition to rely upon some overruling Providence to care for and develop this part of the Anglo-Saxon race, as if this race were the chosen of God, and therefore we need do nothing—we need not work out our own salvation. Is it not time to discard the belief that "God cares for children, fools and the United States," and try to develop by our own power a high degree of civilization and citizenship?

The first element requisite for good citizenship seems to me to be a knowledge of the spirit of our institutions, and of our constitution. The average voter knows, perhaps, that the colonies broke away from kingly rule and established a free government; his knowledge goes no farther; he thinks that a government has been established in which he can hold an office if his party be victorious. You may think this a low view, but is it not true? Does not every-day observation attest its truth? Do not the hordes now marching "On to Washington" prove it? That most candid and friendly critic, Dr. Bryce, in his "American Commonwealth," one of the few books on the United States destined to live, remarks what most of our own disinterested thinkers, as well as foreigners, have noticed, namely, that hunger for offices is the dominant political idea. Bryce himself, in long observation, never succeeded in obtaining from any one prominent in politics a distinct answer defining the differences between our political parties. By an interest in, and knowledge of, the spirit of our institutions, then, I do not mean an intense desire for party success. Is not there something above that? Did the revolutionary fathers make their sacrifices that their descendants might hold a paltry clerkship? If they did, I for one can no longer revere their memory and visit their shrines.

* * * * *

I maintain also that this education should include the ability to think on common political affairs and ordinary questions of morality and the public welfare. To think is quite an uncommon habit. It is a necessary element in the education of a good citizen. A good citizen does not wish to be backed by a party caucus. His education, his self-respect, his morality should be above that. If he be taught to think for himself the party caucus and politician and party organ can't make him their submissive dupe. It is far better to be the subject of a monarch than the slave of the modern American caucus and politician.

* * * * *

At present the civil service of the country is prostituted to the dictates of the notorious doctrine: "To the victors belong the spoils." That public office is a public trust, and not a party benefit, is spurned by our politicians.

Office is looked upon as a reward for party service, and to be worked for all there is in it, regardless of the people's interest. It is the absolute duty of a good citizen to throttle this doctrine and choke the life out of it.

[From the address of Professor Demarehus C. Brown, of Butler University, to the Southern Indiana Association of Teachers and Superintendents.]

THE SIEGE.

—All applicants will be treated with consideration.—President Harrison's Inaugural Address.

—Brooklyn has a spoils committee which has endeavored to decide who shall be quartered, upon pretense of employment, at the navy yard. At one conference Mike Dady, one of the chiefest of the Brooklyn aristocracy of officeholders, "figured up that there are fifty-four important places in the navy yard to be had, and suggested that each of the twenty-six wards have two, and that the other two go to the county towns. In cases where a ward is divided between two factions he would have each recognized."

—Says Senator Quay of the office-seekers: "The half concerning them has never been told. Why, they actually commenced coming to my house before breakfast, and kept it up in a steady stream until midnight. Indeed, I believe that many of them are insane on the question of getting an office, and do not realize what they are doing. On account of being chairman of the national committee I was bothered more in this way than any of the other senators. I had people come to me whom I had never seen or heard of before, and never expect to see again. The large number of them are not representative members of the party, but rather the scum. There were more office-seekers this time than ever before."

—An army of Ohio republicans are awaiting command from Governor Foraker, who is expected to arrive here to-night, to move upon the White House. At their head is ex-Mayor Amor Smith, of Cincinnati, who wants to be collector of customs. There are here at his back Representatives Butterworth, Caldwell, Morey and others. A big fight is waging over this position, as well as over the position of collector of internal revenue for the southern district. Morey is pushing J. W. Clements, of Hamilton, while the other faction of congressmen want Col. E. D. McClung.—Special Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal, May 2.

—Last month we published the order of the Missouri office barons, naming Chauncey I. Filley for the office of "Consul at Liverpool or something equally as good." The Hong-Kong consulship was tendered, but Filley will have none of it. It is the St. Louis post-office or nothing. He says:

"There is no pecuniary consideration that would make Hong-Kong, at my time of life and circumstances, a home even temporarily to my wife and myself. And if pleasant and agreeable recognition is what is intended, or is deserved, something at home or not a month's journey therefrom would better fit the fitness of things. I make no complaint that every appointment so far made is of an Old Silk, and all that are now for the city federal positions agreed upon are of the same stripe, including the bulk of those agreed upon for the consular positions. It is neither politic nor good politics for the past or for the future. * * *

"When Col. Richard C. Keren's candidate for the post-office—the Arkansas Traveler—Frederick W. Schnarte, Sharty for short, is appointed and receives his commission for postmaster at St. Louis may I be here to see. There will be harmony, big H, then. It was so easy for those who did the work throughout the state to have been mixed up with those already recognized who did so little, to show the purpose of general recognition instead of the complete one-sided affair, and to aid instead of depress republican interests."

Filley has heretofore been known to history as the following shows: Says Senator Vest, of the Arthur administration: "It came within our personal knowledge that the patronage of the state of Missouri as to railway postal clerks was divided—one-half of it, the eastern half, going to Chauncey I. Filley, and the western half to Col. R. T. Van Horn. There was a factional fight in the republican party within the state, and in order to bring about that placid and ecstatic condition of political feeling that was necessary to the success of the party, there was a line drawn through the middle of the state from the Iowa to the Arkansas line, and one-half of the patronage was given to Mr. Filley and one-half was given to Col. Van Horn, and that instruction from the postmaster-general to the appointing clerk of the post-office department was put in writing. The result was that men were put in office utterly incompetent, and there were thirty-four of them in office when Cleveland's administration came into existence."

—Says General Boynton in the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette: "In the first place, the pressure has been something terrific. Since the days of Andrew Johnson there has been nothing to equal it. In the second place, in far too many instances the congressmen and state delegates have not dealt courageously or honestly with the President. The same has been true of party leaders of whom he had a right to expect better things. Representatives of this class have recommended and, in numerous cases, urged men of most unsavory record upon him."

—The guards and messengers at the White House were doubled to-day to keep the President from being overrun and crushed by the office-seekers. The crowd was enormous and entirely filled the reception and secretary's rooms. An old White House attache informed your correspondent this evening that nothing like it was ever seen before. It was impossible to keep the greedy throng out, and many of them were rude and persistent in their effort to interview the President.—Washington Special.

—The President broke off negotiations with office-seekers in time to pick up his hat and catch the train for New York where he attended the one hundredth anniversary of the government under the constitution. He returned at the earliest moment, his train making an exceptionally quick run. The negotiations were at once taken up where they were broken off and "appeals of office-seekers" had a continuous hearing of three hours and a half.

—May 1, the new chief clerk Bocket dismissed five watchmen of the treasury and put in five republicans.

—WASHINGTON, May 1.—There was no cessation in the activity around Assistant Postmaster-general Clarkson's room. He continued to receive delegations, examine applications, and write the cheerful word "appoint" or shake his head in refusal. There was a great deal more writing than head shaking, however.—Indianapolis Journal Washington Dispatch.

—For 210 consulships more than 4,000 applications have been filed at the state department.

—The President appointed W. H. Whiteman to the supreme bench of New Mexico. The Swiss consul charged Whiteman with the conversion of $1,500, the money of Swiss heirs. Whiteman said the money was deposited for the heirs in bank at Albuquerque. This was found to be untrue and the senate did not confirm the nomination. Whiteman then said that he had the money in his safe. The government arranged for the safe to be opened in the presence of witnesses and if $1,500 was found in it, Whiteman was to be appointed. He has since been appointed.—St. Louis Republic.

—WASHINGTON, April 26.—The name of ex-Postmaster-general Creswell of Maryland has been formally presented to the President for consideration in connection with the vacancy on the United States supreme bench. The office is treated by Mr. Creswell's friends as one to be sought after, and a regular campaign is to be conducted for it. He is supported by representatives of both parties in his circuit.—Special Dispatch to the Evening Post.

"There is nothing I should like better than to do something for you Sam, but I am afraid you greatly overestimate my influence. Your old friend Reed has placed his pension in my hands, and I am working away at it to get it soon. Perhaps there is no one in the country who has done so much for General Harrison during the last twenty years as I have, but because our democratic friends down in Indianapolis have started the hue and cry on me, Brother Ben. does not seem to feel that he can afford to recognize me as an acquaintance, and consequently I don't take dinner at the White House as might be expected. I have not been inside the White House since Cleveland's inauguration, a little over four years ago, but I will see if something can be done a little later on and tell you what to do. If you should not hear from me again, Sam, for the next two months don't be alarmed, for there will be just as good chances two months hence—and a little better—as there are now."

"Give my kind regards to all the boys at Anderson, and remember me always as your friend. W. W. DUDLEY."

—Letter to S. D. Van Pelt, April 15, 1889.

Address THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

"Practical men with their eyes open are aware that patronage is a disintegrating force, and the distribution of the offices almost always makes trouble within the party." New York Tribune.

"My opinion is, however, that the party in power is weakened by patronage. The wrath of the disappointed more than offsets the work of the men who are favored with place. Seriously, I think the patronage question is the rock that is most likely to wreck the administration of to-day."—Senator Washburn.

"It would be an astonishing spectacle, and one everybody would condemn, if at every change of directors in a great railroad or manufacturing corporation all the station agents, engineers, line-men and operators should be dismissed in order to make places for successors whose political or other opinions were supposed to be like those of the new board of directors. The business of the government is of common interest to every one of its citizens, and to be successful must be conducted upon the same principles and by the same general methods that are found to be wise and adequate in private affairs; and in these the man would be thought demented who should maintain that the views of the station agents or engineers or factory workmen on the subject of protection or woman suffrage, or any other of the questions of public consideration, make them any more or less fitted for or entitled to employment."—Senator Edmunds, The Forum for June, 1889.

"In my opinion there must be a change wrought in the prevailing custom of senators and representatives pressing the chief executive of this country for offices. It is all wrong and contrary to the letter and spirit of the constitution. The men who framed that instrument never expected or intended that congressmen should try to bring pressure to bear upon the President for the purpose of inducing him to make appointments in their favor."—Senator Sherman in April, 1889.

THROUGH the generosity of a friend the Indiana civil service reform association can furnish upon application the recent address of Charles J. Bonaparte, president of the civil service reform association of Maryland, alluded to elsewhere.

COMMENT at length will be found elsewhere, but in brief the civil service commission found at Indianapolis that Postmaster Wallace had violated the law in three appointments. It published the present eligible list, and directed that all future lists be posted up. It also directed that when the local board certifies three names to the postmaster, from which to fill a vacancy, these names shall at the same time be made public. The people then can watch the postmaster's action, and the community will require a good reason if the top man is not taken. The commission also added Wm. P. Fishback, Esq., to the local board, and admonished Postmaster Wallace and his officers roundly. With publicity and with Mr. Fishback on the local board, whose fairness and impartiality will never be questioned, the merit system has been put in fighting trim such as it never had before. The commission also flatly refused the special examination asked for, and, as was said last month, granted but afterwards revoked. They justly held that those now on the eligible list were entitled to a chance for a trial, and should not be deprived of it by a special examination. They also announced with unmistakable emphasis that this law and its advantages were for all citizens alike, and they wanted it to be distinctly understood that they desired democrats to come forward for examination. They guarantee to them absolutely fair treatment. It is to be hoped, therefore, that every democrat in Indiana who desires employment in this post-office will appear and compete at the August examination.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL MILLER has been in Indianapolis, and while here he said:

"In all the appointments made or to be made under this administration the two requisites are that the prize-winner shall be, first, a good man; second, a good republican."

Thus the administration flounders along to inevitable destruction in its wholly unconstitutional efforts to turn over to its partisans the tens of thousands of places which have no reason for existence except to bring about the transaction of the people's business upon the same principles as other business is transacted, and without regard to party.

SENATORS Farwell and Cullom in concert (coming out of the White House):

"When I came hither, I was lord high constable,
And duke of Buckingham; now, poor Edward Bohun."

ARE we to have a repetition of the course pursued with Higgins, Thomas, Dowling and others under the last administration? The triturating power of such cases upon the strength of an administration would seem to have been demonstrated for all time. Yet it appears that the present administration is not satisfied, for it still retains Paul Vandervoort, formerly dismissed for having been absent from his duties two-thirds of a year, and Bagby, a negro, reinstated in the railway mail service by telegraph with a court record for bastardy in 1886, and other insufferably objectionable appointees. The cause of civil service reform is not hurt by these things but rather strengthened, because outraged public decency turns to it for relief, but the President and his party will learn when too late that refusal to correct a mistake has great grinding force.

WHEN evidence was so easily accessible to show that Moore was a gambler and a keeper of a gambling place and had been discharged for that reason, the people have a right to inquire sharply why Postmaster Wallace and his assistant, Thompson, at this late day appeared before the commission as his defenders. The former said that when reinstating Moore he had relied upon information derived from ex-Postmaster Wildman, an uncle of Moore by marriage, and D. W. Elliott, clerk in the post-office and cousin of Moore by marriage. Whether it was these influences or some other powerful force that inspired this defense, the act is deserving of unqualified public censure. It is not an excuse to say that Postmaster Wallace was misled. He has no right to be misled. As to Thompson, the sooner his connection with this office is severed, the better it will be.

THE father of Isabella De la Hunt was postmaster at Cannelton, and she was his deputy, and afterwards, on recommendation of Senator Harrison, she was appointed postmaster by President Arthur. She was the widow of a democrat who died of wounds received in the service. President Cleveland removed her, under his infamous system of secret charges, for offensive partisanship, and gave the place to a democratic politician and editor. For this Senator Harrison justly held him up to public indignation in the following words:

"If there was in all this country one person, who by reason of her sex, who by reason of her widowhood, who by reason of the sacrifice she made in giving the arm on which she leaned to her country's service, was entitled to be kept in office, was entitled to have her reputation guarded jealously and by all men who represented the government, it was Mrs. Isabella De la Hunt."

Mrs. De la Hunt applied direct to President Harrison for reappointment, but Congressman Posey had other plans, and gave the place to a henchman. Naturally there has been wide comment and a questioning of the sincerity of Senator Harrison. Clarkson comes to his aid by stating that the President, supposing this fourth-class office to be a presidential office, was expecting to name Mrs. De la Hunt, but in the meantime he, by order of Posey, filled it. It would have been better to leave this transaction without explanation, to carry "its own pathos and its own indignation." We now have attached to it Clarkson, not only as a very offensive wholesale violator of party promises, but as a very contemptible liar. All friends of President Harrison must feel deeply the humiliating position into which he has been placed, but what else can he expect when he thus allots public offices to his under-lords and they grow fat on spoil? Both Clarkson and Posey undoubtedly knew his personal connection with this office, but no risk of humiliating him carried even this small place past the snap of their greedy jaws.

Up bobs an objector to competitive tests because they exclude all but young men just out of college. Then comes an examination at Bloomington, Ill., with 183 competitors composed mostly of middle-aged men. That objection disposed of, another is found that most of the competitors in a recent examination were school teachers, and while school teachers pass a high examination, in practice they make poor clerks, being conceited and unapt. Then the examination for postal and departmental service comes and goes, and we next hear that the school teachers went out of the test in considerable excitement and anxiety. So the objections are raised and dropped. Now as to the school teachers, they belong, it is true, to an unpopular profession, considered from a political standpoint, but nevertheless, being citizens of a country democratic in form, they have a right to a chance to compete. If successful in that test, they have a right to a chance for six months' probation. If in that practical test in which their errors are checked, their quickness and endurance are noted, they fall behind, they should be dropped. They themselves would fully approve of the right of the fittest to survive. If they are retained in the service, when better men might be found, the fault lies not upon competitive tests but upon the negligent or dishonest officials over them.

PUTTING THE LAW IN THE HANDS OF ITS FRIENDS.

It must be said that the appearance of Postmaster Wallace and of his leading officers before the civil service commission at Indianapolis was not reassuring. We believe it is the fact that he was appointed at the request of his brother, General Lew Wallace, on the ground that the latter "did not want anything for himself," but asked that his brother be made postmaster at Indianapolis, and that this appointment was made not for any fitness for the position, but because of the services which General Wallace had rendered General Harrison at the Chicago convention and elsewhere. Postmaster Wallace's honest statement to the commission, that when he began he knew nothing of the post-office business and that he knew but little now, is a blistering comment upon this method of dealing out public offices. He is esteemed by his fellow-citizens, and he is a man who wishes to do right, and whose feelings no one can hurt without pain. But, having accepted this public position, he must be held to its responsibilities. No one who sat through the investigation can say that Mr. Wallace has had much to do with the management of his office. He has probably been deceived by his subordinates. That, however, does not excuse him. His comparative weakness in the presence of his principal subordinates was clear. There is another fact also which is now plain—neither Mr. Wallace nor these subordinates have any interest in the advancement of civil service reform or in the success of the civil service law. Their declaration that they would enforce the law in letter and spirit are the declarations of men who mean to fulfill no more than the strictest construction of the bond calls for. Mr. Wallace is sixty-three years old. He will never care for nor learn the principles under which the use of public place as spoil must be broken down. He is a strong partisan. The folly of appointing a partisan of his age, ignorant of the post-office business, and expecting him to embrace the principles of the reform law, and administer that law with the impartiality of a judge, is now apparent.

Putting Wheat and Tousey into the office was clearly an attempt to keep vacancies open until an examination could be held. The desperate effort of Assistant Postmaster

Thompson to secure a special examination has no rational explanation except that there are a crowd of favorites to be gotten upon the eligible list to be ready for proposed or unavoidable vacancies, and for the six new carrierships to be filled July 1. If these conclusions are not true, why does not this office exhaust its present eligible list? Postmaster Wallace and his assistant, and all the members of the local board except Mr. Lane, who was not present, declared to the commission that they did not know a single one of those on that list. Then how do they know that they would not make excellent clerks and carriers? A man with fair intentions to the law would give every one of these strangers who had by competition got his name on the eligible list, a chance for a trial before clamoring for a special examination. The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE has been slow to find fault with this office, but this is not the management that General Harrison promised.

MR. BONAPARTE'S STANDARD.

Mr. Bonaparte's simple and admirable statement of what a President, as an honest man, is bound to do, and of the standards by which he is to be judged, indirectly shows why many civil service reform associations that formerly did useful work, to-day seem unable to add to their numbers or to sustain the courage and vigor of their old members. On every side the feeling has never before been so emphatic that the spoils system, as cruel and feudal, must give way, but it is true, with some important exceptions, that this feeling is more aggressive outside the old associations. This is because strength has been diverted and the main issue lost in defending and explaining a chief magistrate and a party, instead of applying to a president, as does Mr. Bonaparte, the straightforward judgment that would be applied to any other man in the ordinary walks of life. What interest have we in comparing the relative capacity of the guillotine in two different administrations? Is not the only question that concerns us whether, at the end of an administration, it has done its perfect work and created a great army of office-holders, paid by the entire people, to be used by the party in power to perpetuate its own power? What matter is it to us if men and newspapers are judging a President by a standard they refused to apply to his predecessor, if they are now chronicling facts they before suppressed or strove to explain away? What do we care whether one man has advanced this reform more than his predecessors, or whether his successor is doing no worse than he did? What right have we to excuse or palliate on the ground that a president has done as well as we have a right to expect, and tacitly grant that it is proper to bound his efforts to do what he ought by his personal ambition or by party interest? Is it not time for us to return to the simpler and purer code that a president is bound by the same moral laws that govern other men in business and social relations? Is it not time to admit that many of the so-called difficulties of his situation would at once disappear if he followed the plain path of rectitude and abided the consequences, good or ill, as the rest of us are bound to do?

We take it for granted that the man who wants to pose as a moral citizen, while he can not resist the emoluments arising from his connection with receivers of stolen goods, has entanglements that tax his brain and nerves, and that his course is apt to be inconsistent and suspicious. Why should it be otherwise in political life? Is it worth our while to quibble over what was the intended purport of promises and pledges when it is plain what a man might do and ought to do? This sort of action delights all our enemies, for it keeps this question within party, or at least personal, lines, it admits a standard gauged by political expediency, and it continues as an "issue" the question of whether the vindication of an opinion of a president is more important than the reform itself. Must we not admit that this reform is of more vital interest than any president or any party?

Mr. Bonaparte's standard is the only one suited to the nineteenth century, our government and the American people. There are interesting examples of leaders of men who have achieved a worthy end by a tortuous and dissembling course, but they had a lifetime as a stage of action. But in this country the man who is president and his party have precisely four years in which to achieve greatness and work out a policy, and he will succeed best who boldly advocates an uncompromising rectitude and calmly awaits the consequences, whether he be a president or a looker-on of a president's operations.

THE SACRIFICE TO THE SPOILS-GOD.

President Harrison has made great sacrifices to the god of spoil. No stronger statement of determination to wholly forsake this god could have been put into language than is found in the platform and in the letter of acceptance upon which General Harrison was elected. Whatever his reasons, we may note that he has, to a startling extent, made propitiatory offerings at this altar. At the dictation of Quay he threw the huge post-office department to Wanamaker. After months of consultation with the Tom Platts of his party, he completed his cabinet without putting a man in it who had ever been known as anything but a spoilsman, and to this he added Tanner, Bell and the unspeakable Clarkson. Virginia was tossed to Mahone, Pennsylvania to Quay, New York to Platt, and other smaller districts to less powerful ravagers. But to the spoils-god all this was mere preparation for the slaughter of something substantial; and the slaughter came. Pearson went down against the protest of the entire reform sentiment of the country. The foreign ministers were dispatched at a blow. Presidential postmasters are going by hundreds. Clarkson brings down his victims at the rate of a thousand a week, while under Tanner the pension boards walk the plank in a body. The railway mail service was for six weeks thrown open to the common pillage of congressmen. Oberly was sacrificed, in spite of the determined effort to save him by a large combination of numbers and influence devoted to the Indian, and marshals, district-attorneys, collectors, messengers, laborers and all manner of officers, innocent and guilty alike, have been led to the common shambles.

The President knows the meaning of language as well as any man. He will not read the platform and letter of acceptance and say that his acts have been in accordance with them. Nor will he say that he has put in charge of offices within the civil service law men who were genuinely friendly to the law as he promised. But he will argue that his deviation was necessary to keep an all powerful god from devouring everything. We may as well look the matter in the face. From present indications, the President, under this fear, will continue his sacrifice until he has turned over something above a hundred thousand offices to his party. He could not possibly go faster than he is now going. What will be his reward? Instead of appeasing the god he has made him ten times angrier than ever. Congressmen hate the President, and there is scarcely a spoilsman in Indiana who does not curse him roundly. The republicans in this state are weaker by ten thousand votes than they were on the day of the inauguration. We believe this to be generally true of all the republican states. The apparent intention is to complete the work quickly and leave a long time before the next presidential election for wounds to heal. There will doubtless be in 1892 a united and enthusiastic party machine resting upon official spoil. Some disappointed office-seekers may forget their grievances and join in with hope for the future. But it should not be forgotten that the turn of the next election will be given by a class of men who will hold any

President or party responsible for failure to perform promises, and that this class is already larger by many thousands than it was 1888. In his fear of the Ingallses, the Mahones, the Platts and the Quays the President may undervalue the strength of this class, but it is time to give the warning.

THE INDIANAPOLIS POST-OFFICE INVESTIGATION.

The civil service commission overhauled the Indianapolis post-office thoroughly June 18. They discovered the astonishing fact that J. C. Wheat and William E. Tousey, both discharged some years ago, had been put back into places which can only be filled from the eligible list, and that the former had been there six weeks and the latter eight. Tousey is an active ward politician. In spite of the protests of the managers of the post-office they will hardly expect it to be believed that this flagrant breach of the law was innocent. Instant dismissal was ordered. Several other matters connected with this office had been complained of in the public prints, notably in the Indianapolis Sentinel. Of these cases Marshall C. Woods and Charles Rouzier were occupying places excepted from examination, and which could be and had been treated as spoil, and with which the commission could not interfere. Bagby and Billy Patterson are in the railway mail service and not under Postmaster Wallace. R. B. Mundelle, dismissed by Postmaster Jones, charged with kicking a special delivery boy, for which he was afterwards fined one dollar, had been reinstated within the one year limit by Postmaster Wallace. The commission went into the merits of the case, and the facts seemed to be that the delivery boys had a frog which they were tossing about the office, and in doing this were getting in the way of the clerks. Mundelle, after repeated warnings, took one by the collar and, aiding his effort with his knee, put the boy out of his working place. He is a clerk of the highest efficiency, and the commission found his reinstatement justifiable.

The carrier Hamlin, appointed substitute by Postmaster Jones, and lately given a full appointment by Postmaster Wallace, was charged with having a court record for seduction. This matter was not within the power of the commission, Hamlin never having been dismissed for cause. Postmaster Wallace told the commission that he had no doubt that the charge against Hamlin was true, but that he did not know of it when he appointed him. He did not explain why he had not instantly dismissed Hamlin upon learning of it, or why he was still keeping him.

The most notable case of the day was the reinstatement by Wallace of Charles F. Moore, to which we called attention last month and asked what was going to be done about it. A private inquiry at the post-office elicited the answer that it was a "put up job" on Moore and that he had been the victim of a conspiracy of democrats to secure his discharge. No public explanation of this kind was made, and the reason seemed altogether incredible, for under Postmaster Jones vacancies were made without the trouble of conspiring. The charge being publicly repeated, the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE employed a detective and took other means to ascertain the facts. To one thus familiar with the facts, it was a curious study to see the officers of the post-office attempt to satisfy the commission that when arrested Moore was only engaged "in a little game of five-cent-ante with friends," and that he was not, and had never been, a gambler. Postmaster Wallace's attempts in this direction were so lame that Assistant-Postmaster Thompson was obliged to take the lead. He boldly repeated the stereotyped story that Moore was a very fine clerk whose place was wanted, who was not, and never had been, a gambler, but who was watched and caught in a "little friendly game of five-cent-ante." Mr. Thompson further stated that Moore finally went to Postmaster Jones and told him that he could not endure to be hounded by politicians and he would therefore resign. A little later both Moore and ex-Postmaster Jones came into the room, and when asked by the commission denied, with open-eyed surprise at the question, any such talk with each other, or any such reason for Moore's resigning; all this to the visible discomfort of Mr. Thompson. Moore made no defense whatever, but said he resigned because he was forced to, having been "caught gambling and arrested."

If Postmaster Wallace had at any time made the investigation which was always his reasonable duty, and which, after the public charge, was his imperative duty, he would have found in a couple of hours that for a period of years Moore had been a frequenter of gambling places and a gambler; that he had once been arrested with thirteen others in Tobe Howe's gambling place, when $700 were put up as security for the appearance of the whole party in court; that for a considerable period he had been having a gambling room next to the post-office, which was known to the police; that every night for five nights this gambling was watched, and finally a warrant against room 23 was issued in ignorance of who was there, and was placed in the hands of Captain Colbert to serve; that, accompanied by a single policeman, he went to the room; that seeing a man whom they knew come away, they gave the usual knock, and in answer to "Who's there?" gave the name of the man they had seen leave; that a man opened the door slightly and was knocked down by the push of the officers against it; that Moore took the cash and put it into his pocket and was prevented from locking up the checks; that a confession of gambling was made on the spot; that the officers found there the usual outfit of a gambling-room, including a poker table with an opening for the "rake-off" for the keeper of the room and twenty packs of cards and four hundred chips, articles which are not found elsewhere, even among those having "a friendly game of five-cent-ante;" that the officers arrested in the room seven persons, including Moore; that the charge against Moore was for keeping a gambling-place and gambling, and against the others for gambling; that Moore put up $40 as security, and afterwards put up straw-bail and withdrew the $40; that the whole crowd pleaded guilty and were fined, Moore being fined $5 and costs, amounting to $19.40, which he has never paid by reason of his straw bail; that he had been warned about six months before, by Postmaster Jones, that he must stop having gambling in his rooms, and had promised to do so; that when he was arrested Postmaster Jones allowed him to resign, but forced him to do so by reason of his above career; that recently half a dozen persons had been to Captain Colbert to ask him to say that the arrest was a "set-up job."

The witnesses to show the above facts were at the call of the commission, but before all these facts were brought out the commission declined to hear other witnesses, solely because they had heard enough to come to the conclusion that Moore's reinstatement was wrong. They publicly announced this finding and directed Postmaster Wallace to sever Moore's connection with the office at once. For this conclusion they had heard abundant evidence.

Mr. Thompson made an amusing attempt to argue that Wheat and Tousey were employed as substitutes, and that for such employment the postmaster had a right to go out on the street and pick up men and keep them for months, but had no right to take substitutes from the eligible list. An appeal to the President is threatened, but he will hardly sustain this view of the law. The work of the commission at Indianapolis can not be too highly commended, and the fearlessness of Mr. Roosevelt, coupled with his long and brilliant experience in dealing with unwilling and crooked executive officers, makes it plain that the President has found a man.

THE DRAG UPON THE REMNANT.

IN the days of slavery the remnant strove to convince the rest that it was a curse. The irresistible power of a moral idea worked. Since then another slave system, the spoils system, has stealthily grown great and menacing, and again the remnant protests. Their progress has been slow but irresistible. It was lately quickened by a great occasion and a great man. Like the solemn tones of a cathedral bell in the midst of a hushed and expectant people, Bishop Potter's warning and appeal made the popular heart vibrate and awoke the conscience of a multitude. He hastened the end of an unrighteous and aristocratic political system. But as in all similar struggles in history there are with us deprecators whose general attitude is that there is no danger and that things will of themselves come out all right.

A clergyman of this city performed this office on memorial day. Those ancient sporadic examples of baseness, Arnold, Lee and Burr, seemed to him a fit offset to the present epidemic of spoils against which Bishop Potter warned us. Barring the usual lapses of "human nature" things political are in his opinion going not only as well as in Washington's day, but he goes on to say:

"I do not argue these questions, however. If a Jeremiah comes with his lamentations, through his tears beholding our perils and our sins indeed, but unable to discern the radiant promise of our times, I would not strive to answer him. Does he say that this is a 'merchandise' generation? that the high ideas which marked and ennobled the birth of the republic have disappeared from the closing period of our first century? Rather than argue I would simply wait. Let the weeks roll on. Let April skies give place to flowery May."

The fact that the Tweed, whisky and star route rings and various election criminals have been brought to justice is an indication to him that Bishop Potter's censures were out of place and his warnings jeremiads. He forgot to mention that those crimes and criminals were not punished by simply waiting and letting the weeks roll on and April skies give place to flowery May. He forgot to recall the men who did the sapping and mining at personal risk and sacrifice. He omitted the fact of how secret and far-reaching and invincible seemed the forces to be overcome, how impregnable were the criminals behind breastworks of good men who protested that nothing was wrong, that the agitation was a device of light-headed or bad hearted men. In short, he omitted all mention of the deprecators of those days who preached the gospel of waiting and letting the weeks roll on, and who anxiously scanned the horizon of the past for signs that the present needed no attention. It seems incredible that a public teacher should rejoice in the destruction of that crop of dragon's teeth and be loath to recognize the new product. But this stubborn reluctance to study the present, this readiness for superficial criticism upon the grave conclusions of another, this alertness to check a noble impulse for reform, and to lull an aroused public conscience, by men intrenched in high personal character, act as a brake upon this progress to-day; it is not spoilsmen fighting for life, but these unconscious and untroubled enemies of our camp. They can not stay the final doom of the spoils system. They can not influence the patriotic men who have felt its malign influence. But they can delay and harry and burden the workers in the field bearing the heat and burden of the day, and they have the physical power to ignore that wise and just command, "Seek ye the truth." No man would feel a greater repugnance than this clergyman for this system could he be forced to follow the filthy trail of the serpent in the story of Mahone's triumph in Virginia, of Quay's succession in Pennsylvania, of Gorman's reduction of Maryland, of a city like New York prostrate under the heel of a robber gang, of the base control of another city by the man known as the "blind white devil of San Francisco." These are random instances of "the dangers that menace free institutions" stated in the republican platform in 1888, and which were in the mind of Bishop Potter.

Why do good men seem to be deliberately blind and deaf to certain present evils? It is not for this paper to judge. It may be the demon of party spirit that occasionally lodges and disports itself in sacred precincts. Whatever the cause, it for a time is more baffling and discouraging than evil itself.

THE civil service commission overhauled the New York custom house and found another place where the civil service law has been steadily cheated. One man got an appointment who did not write his examination paper. There was a system of getting examination questions to which the password "Terry," "Terry," seemed the open sesame. Examinations had been held with the same set of questions three days in succession. The local board had about the character and aims of our city fire committee that wanted to turn democrats out of the fire department. The commission next went to Troy, where they found the civil service law carried out on about the same principle as the tissue ballot system reported to us from the South. Under Cleveland the democrats literally held the fort, and now the republicans were in complete and hostile possession. There was no reliable record of anything, and the entire outfit seemed to be a few old examination papers tied up with a string. The republicans had just held a special examination, in which it had been understood and acted upon that none but republicans, and republicans of a particular faction, need compete. The commission took a hand at a clean sweep. They annulled the special examination and quashed both the democratic and republican lists of eligibles. The postmaster reluctantly admitted that he might appoint a democrat in case he could not find a republican.

THE following is the present list of eligibles of the Indianapolis post-office:

WANTON REMOVALS.

The danger, then, consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this house, before the senate, for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. * * * Can we suppose a President, elected for four years only, dependent upon the popular voice, impeachable by the legislature, little, if at all, distinguished for wealth, personal talents, or influence from the head of the department himself; I say, will he bid defiance to all these considerations, and wantonly dismiss a meritorious and virtuous officer? Such an abuse of power exceeds my conception.—Congressman James Madison, June, 1789.

—June 18, thirty-nine presidential postmasters were appointed; of these sixteen were to fill vacancies caused by removal.

—On the 22d of May, two months and seven days after the railway mail service, by order of President Cleveland, was embraced by the civil service law, sixteen clerks running out of Louisville, Ky., were discharged because they were democrats.

—Out of forty-three presidential postmasters appointed during the week ending with June 6, nineteen were to fill vacancies caused by removal. Out of seventeen appointed June 11, nine succeeded postmasters removed without cause.

—Two hundred and seventy-six dismissals from the railway mail service reached the superintendent of the tenth division at St. Paul in one batch. The first man out had made the best record of any clerk in Dakota. Of the new men, the train conductor found one drunk on the floor of the car surrounded by the debris of his mail.

—The postmaster at Jersey City remained in office until the end of his term, three years, under President Cleveland. President Harrison has removed the democratic successor without cause, who has been in office only one year, and has given the place to a politician.

—Postmaster Clark, of Jacksonville, Florida, has been removed by President Harrison, one year before the end of his term. He has made an excellent record, and was much liked by the people. He retained many republicans in office, notably several colored men.

—"Sol" Hirsch is spoken of as the Tom Platt of Oregon. The President has appointed him as minister to Turkey to succeed Mr. Oscar Straus, who performed his duties in such a manner that missionaries, societies, colleges, and practically the whole missionary influence of the Christian Church in this country interested in Turkey asked for his retention.

—Mrs. Mary L. Clay has been postmaster at Huntsville, Ala., for two years. The President has removed her. The Huntsville Independent, the leading republican newspaper of Alabama, says that, "in the discharge of her duties as postmistress she has been faithful, polite, accommodating and efficient." A special agent made an adverse report, but when Mrs. Clay asked for the charges and the name of the author she obtained neither.

—At Bridgeport, Conn., the republican postmaster served out his term under Cleveland, which lasted a year and eight months. President Harrison has put out the democratic postmaster nineteen months before his time. His appointee, who is the former republican incumbent, addresses a clerk as follows:

"Young man, I have noticed your work, and I can say you do your work admirably, and much better than I expected. In fact, your duties were never better performed, and if you were with us in politics you would not leave this office, at least as long as I have anything to do with it. But as you were not with us last fall, the papers are made out and signed for your successor."

—At New Bedford (Mass.) a republican postmaster held over till 1887, when Carpenter, a democrat, was appointed. A month after the inauguration the latter's removal was announced, on the ground of inefficiency. Wanamaker said that the representations of inefficiency were made by Pay Director Thornton of the navy, April 2, indorsed by Congressman Randall, April 4. No hearing was given, nor were further inquiries made. Mr. Holmes, a member of the Bedford republican city committee, went to Washington seeking an explanation. Wanamaker, hard pushed, suggested that Mr. Holmes make a written protest against the issue of the commission. This was done, and May 7 Wanamaker wrote him as follows:

"I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your esteemed letter, and say that on further consultation with your representative in congress, the department has issued a commission to the postmaster at New Bedford, Mass."

The people of New Bedford of all shades of opinion were satisfied with their postmaster, and desired that he should serve out his term. Thornton was rarely in New Bedford, and his only business with the office was to receive an occasional letter. In a final letter to Wanamaker, Mr. Holmes says:

As a republican who has witnessed this whole transaction, I ought to and do feel humiliated. It is a revelation as to the conduct of the administration of my own party. Its platform and the letter of acceptance of President Harrison distinctly promised that should not be done which I have seen done here with my own eyes. Nor is that even fairly stating it. Not only has an honest and efficient public officer been dismissed from the service on a charge of incompetency, but turned out of office under a cloud and denied even the opportunity of proving the utter falsity of such charge.

The New Bedford office, though an important one, is only one of many. It is improbable that what has been done here would alone have much effect upon the welfare of the party at large, but if the administration is pursuing all over this country the course it has pursued in this locality, the republican party will be defeated in the next election, and deservedly.

—President Cleveland left the Norwich, Conn., postmaster in office sixteen months, making his whole term four years and two months. President Harrison, without any cause whatever, has removed President Cleveland's appointee, whose term had fourteen months to run, who had given satisfaction to the public and who had not made a clean sweep. His successor, within twenty-four hours, dismissed every democratic employe but one. After this an election came on and for the first time in the history of the town the democrats carried it, beating the republicans on every hand with the single exception of the sheriff. Election history of President Cleveland's term is beginning to repeat itself.

—The present administration found at the head of the assay office at Boise City, Idaho, Henry F. Wild. He was not a politician but voted as a republican, and he was an engineer and metallurgist of European and American education, with eight years' practical experience before he took this office. His term was not limited and his removal except for cause was, therefore, unconstitutional. He had conducted the office with remarkable ability and success, relying solely upon business principles, and had in consequence made but one removal among his subordinates. Within three years the deposits increased ninefold, while the expenses were proportionately decreased one and one-half per cent. The governor of Idaho officially complimented the management of the office. President Harrison removed Mr. Wild and appointed Cunningham assayer. The latter "is not by education or experience, even of the most limited kind, acquainted with mining, assaying, metallurgy or any kindred subject." He has made a clean sweep with a single exception. His new chief clerk is one Pride, a local politician, for whom Cunningham had clerked. After Mr. Wild had given up the office on an order from Washington, Secretary Windom wrote him: "Your resignation * * is hereby accepted. * *" Mr. Wild had never resigned. The government's last act appears to be courteous; in fact it is sneaking hypocrisy of a very odious kind. Stirring the waters brings up the head shark. Delegate Du Bois says: "I acted in this matter for the best interests of the party, according to my own judgment, after careful consideration."

—In Bell's zeal "for the good of the service" in Massachusetts, he reinstated one clerk appointed by the democrats and discharged by them for incompetency. In Illinois he discharged a clerk who had been in the service since President Lincoln's time, and who is said to have been worth to the people all that a competent man can become by years of training and experience.

—The Lockport Journal points with pride to the fact that of the thirty federal offices in Niagara county about twenty have already been filled with republicans by the present administration.

RELIGIOUS COMMENT.

—Referring to Bishop Potter, the Chicago Standard (Baptist) says: "What's the use of beating about the bush in this matter? There is a power of truth in these words. The people of the country ought in some way to rescue the President from the power of the politicians. Patronage has got to be altogether bigger than the President, and the purpose, peace and dignity of the latter are in danger of utter obscurity and overthrow."

—Mr. Pearson died without the solace of feeling that those in whose interest he labored appreciated his sacrifice. But he was appreciated. His unselfish labor has not been in vain. The time is coming when he will learn that he fought a good fight and won a durable crown.—Christian Leader.

—Make tenure of office to depend on character and fitness, and no small part of the load will be lifted from the President's shoulders.—The Morning Star (Baptist).

—In the Baltimore Civil Service Reformer for June is an article by the Rev. Wm. Kirkus, a prominent clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church. It shows the connection between religion and politics, and it makes clear that the duty of the Christian minister is to take part officially in the work of purifying our political methods.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given," and, on breach of this condition, "by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord. The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and there professing that he did become his MAN from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord." Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—L. W. Habercorn, a newspaper correspondent, active in the last campaign, has been appointed fifth auditor of the treasury.

—Lincoln H. Beyerle has been made postmaster at Goshen, Ind. He is editor of the Goshen Times.

—Alexander Reed, editor Appleton [Wis.] Post, has been appointed consul at Dublin.

—The President has appointed James B. Stone, editor Detroit Tribune, collector of internal revenue, first Michigan district.

—Albert B. White, one of the proprietors of the Parkersburg State Journal, has been appointed collector of internal revenue for West Virginia.

—Senator Spooner, of Wisconsin, has had his brother, Roger Spooner, made consul at Prague. Salary $3,000.

—Congressman Owen, of Logansport, has been in Washington again. He said that his business was to see that the men who work in the trenches should be "recognized."

—A. K. Sills, of Indiana, has been appointed special swamp land agent. Emoluments $2,500. Sills was a Harrison delegate to the Chicago convention.

—Donald McLean has been appointed the new general appraiser at the port of New York. He is an active politician, and is a leader of the republican party in the twenty-third assembly district. He was a delegate to the last three republican national conventions.

—Charles P. Hitch has been appointed marshal of the southern district of Illinois and John R. Mizer of the northern district of Florida. The latter is chairman of the Florida republican state committee. Both were active Harrison workers at the Chicago convention.

—Special to the Indianapolis Journal: The President says that he intends to recognize and please as many of his personal and party friends in Indiana as possible, and that he will not cease appointing them until the offices are exhausted.

—May 21, Senator Culloin had 70 fourth-class postmasters appointed in Illinois democratic congressional districts, and a large number of examining pension boards.

—It is said that Congressmen Lodge, of Massachusetts, and Cannon, of Illinois, are leading court favorites. They get all they want and promise of more.

—The two senators from Minnesota are at war over the spoils of that state. Each has a distinct set of henchmen among whom he insists they shall be divided. Quay and Wanamaker have also had a most unpleasant contest over the Philadelphia spoils.

—Matthews was elected delegate from Dakota and then that territory was admitted as two states. "Mr. Matthews, despite the fact that he will never occupy the seat of delegate from Dakota, demanded his prerogatives, and making a firm stand, was granted the exclusive right to dictate all the appointments in his territory."

—The Indianapolis Journal says:

"It is not true in fact, either, that the most conspicuous 'workers' are the most effective in their aid to a party. These are in many cases mere hirelings, after all. They may serve conspicuously during a campaign, but they do it for the loaves and fishes in hand. To claim additional remuneration in the form of a fat office is pure insolence; and yet such is often the case. Such friends are the most dangerous of enemies."

—We think the statement is a mistake that President Harrison has appointed his father-in-law to an office. The appointment was to his brother-in-law, John N. Scott, of this city. This, with Frank McKee, his son-in-law's brother, to be deputy collector of customs in Port Townsend, and his brother to be marshal in Tennessee, and his son's father-in-law to a $5,000 Utah position and Lieut. Parker, a nephew-in-law, naval attaché to the Samoan commission in Berlin, and D. W. McClung, a cousin-in-law, to be collector of internal revenue in the first Ohio district, and Isaac Scott, a cousin-in-law, to be naval officer at New Orleans, and Wm. Haines, of Springfield, Ill., a cousin of his son's wife, to be law clerk in the postoffice department, we believe are the sum of his family appointments. There is another brother-in-law here who, as we are told, was offered a place in our postoffice but declined it on the ground that something better ought to be done for him.

—Congressman Dalzell found his recommendation of a postmaster hung up by a telegram from Quay ordering it. Then says Dalzell:

"Mr. Postmaster-General, am I to be consulted with reference to appointments in my district, or is Senator Quay?"

"The Postmaster replied: 'When it comes to that issue I shall in all cases in this district defer to the wishes of Senator Quay.'"

—Other proofs of Quay's overlordship in Pennsylvania are the complete disappearance of Senator Cameron as a spoils distributor, and Quay's success with the Lord Paramount over McManes and Fitler in securing Martin as collector of internal revenue. His war with Ohio, mentioned last month, has been averted by the Lord Paramount making Pennsylvania's henchman, Gilkeson, second comptroller of the treasury.

—Under President Cleveland Congressman Matson, of Indiana, appointed Horace G. Douglass, editor of the Plainfield Progress, postmaster at that town. In 1886 he had embezzled the postoffice funds, and when an inspector appeared, Douglass left town and was not heard of again until last November, when he returned and appeared in court for punishment. May 18 he pleaded guilty. He had charge of Congressman Matson's campaign in Hendricks county for renomination and he says that he used the money in Matson's interest and was given to understand that he would have to furnish money to retain the postoffice. This is a proper addendum to the account of Matson's exploiting his office-holders to secure his renomination given in document No. 2 of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association published in 1886.

--Two Virginia parties, Mahone and anti-Mahone, have been contending in Washington over the spoils of that state, one party visiting the President and then the other. At the time of the anti-Mahone visit, 150 strong, Mahone stood on the corner and jeered. He is undoubtedly victorious, the Lord Paramount having made him practically the ruler of Virginia. The following quotation from an address on American Feudalism shows that he has simply come to his own again:

The state of Virginia was owing a debt. It was not beyond her ability to pay, and it was to be supposed that a large majority of her citizens would have found it honorable to meet an honest obligation. The majority, however, did not, and of these William P. Mahone became the leader. He had been a democrat and had served in the Confederate army. His faction prevailed. The debt of Virginia was "re-adjusted." In other words, the creditors were robbed of part of their just dues. Mahone became a senator of the United States. He caused his faction to drop the name "coalition" and call itself "republican," although there had been since the war a regular republican organization in Virginia. He had the true feudal instinct. His fellow republican congressmen sunk to insignificance beside him, glad of such morsels as he tossed to them. For several years preceding March, 1885, he ordered every federal appointment and removal made in or from Virginia. In 1882 Land Commissioner McFarland sent for a clerk "credited to Virginia," and said to him, "I am sorry to have to say that your place is wanted." To the clerk's question why, the commissioner replied, "I do not know why. You are faithful, competent and satisfactory, and I am willing to give you an endorsement to that effect. But Senator Mahone wants the place for a friend. You will have to surrender it, for I am powerless in this matter."

In 1882 Mahone assessed Virginia place-holders five per cent. This was in addition to Congressman Hubbell's assessment of two per cent. In 1883 it had become unlawful to assess them, and he enrolled them in the "Virginia Campaign Association," and dodged the law by assessing them as members of that institution. Congressman Gorman's postmaster, Brown, of Baltimore, lately classified the political contributors in his postoffice, as "thinking-men," and the non-contributors as "weaker-minded." Mahone had no "weak-minded" place-holders; all "contributed."

In 1883, the old republican party, being in favor of paying honest debts, still held up its head in Norfolk county, and nominated a county ticket. Mahone was not that kind of a republican, and with money raised by assessing federal salaries, he sent a swarm of federal place-holders into Norfolk county, and compassed the defeat of debt-paying republicanism.

In 1884, Commander Evans, who had been in the navy twenty-three years, with twelve years' service at sea, was superintendent of the fifth light-house district. He dismissed a notoriously incompetent negro who had been appointed by Mahone. Manly honesty and business principles were not to be allowed to stand in the way of Mahone, and with brutal indifference the old commander was put on half pay and waiting orders. It is said that in this case the secretary of the navy of the United States hesitated four weeks before obeying Mahone's order. I could go on indefinitely telling how Mahone ruled and required service like a baron of old, but this, from ex-Attorney-General McVeagh, as early as 1882, will be enough: "Look at the awful humiliation through which Mahone and his associates are dragging the state of Virginia. Every citizen must be ashamed of the spectacle. The administration is prostituting the national treasury to enable a certain portion of the people of Virginia to force another portion to repudiate her debt."

--May 17. Senator Cullom has told the President that this revenue district is in his congressional district, with headquarters at Springfield, his home. The President expressed surprise at the information. Cullom feels humiliated and will not surrender his prerogative. He says that the appointment is a violation of precedents and a disregard of senatorial courtesy, and he will prevent it if he can. Farwell says it is a blow between Cullom's eyes.

May 19. Farwell says that he is tired of shilly-shallying.

May 20. The Illinois senators have determined to make common cause for their senatorial prerogative in the Willcox matter. They have recommended Calhoun for the office. They say that there is a principle involved. Cullom says that the appointment is a snub to him.

May 21. Cullom and Farwell formally demand of the President that the commission of Willcox be withheld on the ground that they were not consulted. Cullom says, if refused it will be a challenge. Farwell says the situation is a gauntlet thrown to Cullom by the President.

May 22. The President has decided to stand by Congressman Cannon and will keep Willcox. Senators Farwell and Cullom are very sore. Farwell reports his interview with the President as follows:

"I just told the President in so many words," said Senator Farwell, "that he had treated Senator Cullom very shabbily. The fact of the matter is we thought there would be plenty of time to name our choice for certain offices, as we believed there would be no removals until the end of the fiscal year. We therefore delayed making recommendations, intending to take our time in making up a slate and at the same time giving the President a rest. The first thing we knew Congressman Cannon stepped in and recommended a man for the Springfield collectorship on his own hook, and the President unhesitatingly appointed him without consulting or even advising with Mr. Cullom."

"I call that a shabby trick, and when I called on Mr. Harrison the other day I told him so very plainly. I told him he had better go down into southern Illinois and appoint a postmaster for Chicago."

"Why, you once wrote a letter," I said, "to President Arthur when you were senator from Indiana, demanding that he recognize your right of controlling the patronage in your district. Now I want to know if you propose to recognize those same rights in Illinois's senators while you are the chief executive? I think I rather got the best of him on that proposition, but he wouldn't promise to reconsider his appointment, though."

"Did he absolutely refuse to reconsider it?"

"No; he didn't do that, either, and it's hard to say whether he will or not. You may depend upon it, though, that I will be on the lookout hereafter, and I won't let anything get away if I can help it," and the wily senator winked knowingly in a way that said plainer than words that he could help it and that he would keep his weather eye on the President's actions as long as there is an office in the state of Illinois to be filled.

Senator Farwell says the letter Mr. Harrison wrote to President Arthur on the occasion was a scorcher in its way. "I didn't have a copy of it," said he, "but when I recalled the circumstance the President remembered it and it somewhat staggered him. He didn't expect to have the question brought so near home as that, I guess."

"How about the Chicago offices?"

"Oh, they're all right. I don't think the President will make any more such breaks. I think he will recognize the same rights in me now that he claimed himself from President Arthur several years ago. Of course, one never knows what is going to happen, but I think everything is all right. Senator Cullom will be all right, too, hereafter, if he asserts his rights."

--Congressman Banks received the following:

March 23, 1889.

STATE HOUSE, BOSTON—My Dear General: I wonder if you know what splendid service J. J. McCarthy, of Charlestown, did in your behalf last fall? I happened to be personally familiar with his early efforts, and I am told by those who watched the development of the canvass that he maintained with untiring zeal and admirable judgment his earnest and successful endeavor. He did the governor the same good turn, and the governor appreciates it fully. I sincerely hope he will succeed in his wish to obtain the office he seeks, and I am sure you will lead his hosts of friends in their effort.

Yours faithfully, G. H. CAMPBELL.

To General N. P. Banks.

This he enclosed to the other Massachusetts congressmen with the following:

WALTHAM, MASS., March 25, 1889.

Hon. George F. Hoar and Hon. Henry L. Dawes:

Dear Sirs—It is understood, I know not on what grounds, that there is to be an informal conference of members-elect on the disposition of minor offices in the several congressional districts at the close of the session. I have not taken much interest in such matters, but there is one point to which I wish to ask your attention and one candidate worthy of special attention. Mr. Jeremiah J. McCarthy of Boston is mentioned for the office of collector of internal revenue. There is not in Massachusetts, I think, a more remarkable man. He is 38 years of age and has been trained in the political contests of Massachusetts since his boyhood. As simple as a child in manner, he is astute, courageous and vigilant at all times and under all circumstances. He has personal acquaintance with all active party men who have participated in the contests of the last fifteen or twenty years in Middlesex, Suffolk and Essex counties.

As a working man he has been diligent and provident; saving for himself quite a handsome property, which gives him the confidence of men of wealth and the respect and esteem of laborers of every calling and caste. His standing among his fellow-citizens is on the bed-rock basis of life-long association and confidence. His influence with all classes is by concession rather than contest, and he regains his ground instantly by superior instinct, intelligence and integrity. I observed and felt this in the late very remarkable contest in the fifth congressional district which had been carried by democrats and was regained by republicans in 1884.

In 1888 we had in the fifth district nothing to begin with, and all our resources, except your own magnificent orations, were well nigh exhausted before the contest began. McCarthy enthused everybody with his energy and courage. He carried light in his eyes. I would not say this, though I know its truth, if there were not another and better illustration of his power, upon the testimony of other reliable witnesses. In the last hours of a recent session of the legislature he was enabled by such qualities as I have described, after an important measure had passed both houses, to render an important service to the state. It was an instance of unequalled personal power rarely witnessed, which his excellency the governor and other influential citizens were prompt to recognize and honor.

I inclose a letter, written by one who could not be mistaken in regard to Mr. McCarthy's influence in the case cited, and which recognizes and acknowledges his power.

It is for these reasons that Mr. McCarthy has been generally designated by those who know his qualities and character for the office of collector of internal revenue. It is an important office. But it is not desired for its patronage. It will be an easy and certainly a pleasant duty to secure to the several congressional districts their relative political and personal interests, and infuse a vigorous spirit of proselytism in the political organizations of state and nation. His appointment would be a just recognition of a true American citizen of Irish descent, who from his first participation in political affairs has maintained friendly relations with all classes of Irish citizens, and vigorously supported, without variation or reserve, the measures, principles and nominations of the republican party. Upon these considerations I most earnestly commend his appointment to the favor and support of the congressional delegation of Massachusetts.

I have the honor to remain, gentlemen, most respectfully, N. P. BANKS.

—As we stated last month Defeated Candidate Love, of Missouri, proposed to distribute the spoils of his district upon the following terms:

"Of course it will be understood that there will be some expense attached to this proceeding, and applicants will be expected to contribute to this expense."

To the average mind this seemed the proposition of a rascal, but he was equal to the occasion. He had the government of the United States send to each member of the congressional committee of his district the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 24, 1889.

To ——— :

DEAR SIR: Do you know of your own knowledge, or do you believe on testimony which you are willing to produce, that James Love, late republican candidate for Congress in the third district of Missouri, ever exacted or received a pecuniary or other valuable consideration for services rendered or to be rendered applicants for office, or that he ever in any way made such remuneration a condition upon which his indorsement of applicants could be obtained? In your reply to this will you inclose the answers to the same question of all persons in your vicinity whom you know to have applied to Mr. Love for his indorsement, whether successful or not?

J. S. CLARKSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Clarkson does not publish the evidence brought out, but doubtless he found no one who knew of his own knowledge that Love had "exacted or received" money. Here is the finding of this unique court:

"It gives me pleasure," said Clarkson, "to declare you innocent of any charge affecting your honor, and to restore you to that position of influence in your party to which your services entitle you."

The evidence could not have been unanimous, for the chairman of Love's congressional committee has published a strong protest, in which he charges Love with "disgracing his supporters." He also called a meeting of the committee to express its wish "as between home rule and boss rule." It does not avail anything; Clarkson stands by Love.

—Congressman Quackenbush, of New York, has had Gilbert H. Stevens made postmaster at Shushan. In 1883 Stevens, being under indictment, wrote the following by way of settlement, coupled with the payment of five hundred dollars:

In consequence of my having in the night time of October 10, 1882, broken into and entered the dwelling-house of X. W. Collins, in the village of Shushan, N. Y., in the absence of said Collins, and again having attempted to break and enter said house on the 29th of October in the night time, being at said time intoxicated, and not knowing what I was doing; this conduct having led to stories injurious to and reflecting upon the reputation for virtue of Johanna Powers, who was there employed as a domestic, I write this to certify that so far as I know said Johanna is a virtuous girl, and it is but an act of justice to her that I should say so. Neither myself or others to my knowledge have had criminal intimacy with her, and any statements made by me to the contrary are untrue.

Witness: CHARLES HUGHES.

Dated June 7, 1883.

G. H. STEVENS.

—The President has appointed George P. Fisher of Delaware to be first auditor of the treasury. He was formerly district attorney for the District of Columbia, and of him, June 23, 1876, the New York Tribune said:

The district attorney's office in Washington was for a long while, under Judge Fisher, the chief bulwark of the District ring. There were hatched the conspiracies to convict innocent citizens of felony, the plots to get rid of witnesses, the schemes to take burglars out of jail. Crimes of the most dastardly character were committed under the sheltering eaves of that scandalous establishment. Theft, and riot, and bribery, and perjury received there encouragement and protection.

A gentleman and his wife had been appointed teachers in the Indian School at Yakim, Oregon. The appointments were excellent, and the appointees closed their school at Portsmouth, Virginia, and were on their way to Oregon when their appointments were cancelled by Secretary Noble. This was done at the bidding of Senator Mitchell who wrote to Noble denouncing the plan of sending "carpet baggers" from other states and announcing the fact of the selection of persons for all the places in Oregon and that these parties had been informed of their selection.

If this paper has any readers who do not see the Civil Service Record, published at Boston, and the Civil Service Reformer, published at Baltimore, we urge them to examine those papers. Their common field is the civil service, but their scope and contents are quite different. Both may be had for the sum of $1.50. The Civil Service Record has a circulation of over 4,000, and as the oldest publication of this sort and as the representative of two powerful associations has great influence. The Civil Service Reformer is more local in its scope, but is of such remarkable literary excellence that it may be read with pleasure without reference to its principles, which are of the plain and straightforward sort. The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is the youngest and feeblest of the three, but it is meeting with an unexpected support and sympathy that indicate a deep interest in the cause it advocates. The executive committee of the Buffalo Association voted to appropriate fifty dollars for the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE for subscriptions to persons to be indicated by them on the ground that it was adapted for proselyting and converting, and a subscriber from Scottsburg, New York, writes:

"I am glad that a journal devoted to civil service reform has been started in your state which has been especially cursed by the spoils system, as exemplified equally in the practice of both the republican and democratic parties. Thank God there is reason to believe that a movement is at length inaugurated that will in no long time bring redemption to our entire country from a state of things disgraceful to republican institutions and threatening their very existence."

THE Buffalo civil service reform association has just held its eighth annual meeting. It is encouraging to note the presence of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Ryan and his remarks full of unmistakable sympathy.

In reference to the progress that has been made in extending the scope of civil service reform, I would say that in 1883, when the national civil service law went into effect, what is known as the classified service—and by that I mean that portion of the national service that is subject to civil service rules—included seven executive departments at Washington, eleven custom districts, and twenty-three post-offices, in each of which there were as many as fifty employees. Since that time the classified service has been extended to cover more than 13,000 additional positions, the total number of persons in the national service now affected by civil service rules being 27,597. There have been 44,169 persons examined, of whom 15,821, or 35 per cent., failed, and 28,648, or about 65 per cent., succeeded in passing the examination. Of the latter, 11,236, or a little over 39 per cent. of the successful candidates, received appointments. In New York state the law, which at first only applied to certain state appointments, has been extended so as to include the greater part of those in the cities, exclusive of laborers. The total number under civil service rules amounts to 15,480.

In Massachusetts, laws which were passed about the same time the New York law was passed, also include local service in the cities, and also provide for the registration of laborers. The total number of persons under the civil service reform laws of Massachusetts is about 6,000. * * * * *

Let us take another case. The bureau of printing and engraving in Washington had, like some other departments, suffered sadly from the spoils system. Fortunately for the public service, in 1885 Mr. E. C. Graves was promoted to the position of head of the bureau, where he still remains. Mr. Graves has been for many years connected with the treasury department, and is recognized as being one of the most valuable public officials in Washington. He had been one of the earliest advocates of civil service reform and was a firm believer in the doctrine that the public offices should be conducted for the benefit of the public.

He took the same course pursued by Postmasters James and Pearson, and although civil service reform rules were not yet applied to the office, nevertheless he at once applied them on his own responsibility. Worthless employees were at once discharged, regardless of the influence back of them, and unnecessary offices were abolished. The result speaks for itself. During the three years ending in 1885 it required 1,166 employees to produce 91,754,351 sheets of work at a cost of $3,047,483.75. In the three years ending June 30, 1888, it only required 874 employees to produce 97,348,687 sheets at a cost of $2,506,681.57. The bureau is now placed under civil service rules, and will never again be a political charitable institution. * * * * *

The objection that the questions asked are often farcical is simply untrue. Whenever this charge is heard a demand should always be made that the objector show a copy of the examination paper in which these farcical questions occurred. He can always get one by asking for it. An objection has also been made that the youth who is just out of school, and in consequence has the school training fresh in mind, will pass a much better examination than the man in whom a few years of active experience in the world has caused some of the details of the studies to be forgotten. The statistics show that this is not the case. The average of the successful candidates are in the neighborhood of 30 years of age. * * * * * It seems to me, therefore, that the charge that the civil service reform system tends to create an aristocracy can hardly stand investigation. On the contrary, I believe that the spoils system has actually created a privileged class strongly resembling the feudal lords of the middle ages, whose retainers agreed to serve faithfully both at home and at the wars. As an illustration, permit me to quote a leading senator from one of the western states, who, in avowing his hostility to civil service reform, stated: "There are thousands of men in my state whom I have never seen, who make my cause their own, who defend my words, who would fight for me, who would sacrifice their time and spend their money for me, who would get up at midnight and ride a horse forty miles to set at work influences in my behalf. Well, I am a politician, and I want to give these men of things that we have won." A little analysis of the senator's position presents the fact that according to his theory no person, even of his own party, ought to hold a government office in his state except those who are his own supporters. If this is not the feudal system, where would you find it? And yet they denounce civil service reform as tending toward aristocracy!—From the address of Henry A. Richmond before the Young Men's Association of Buffalo, March 19, 1889.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

"Were the ends of professed spoilsmen attained, he [the President] and we should have no country left, or, at least, no country which an honorable man could own without shame. We can have no truce or parley with these enemies to righteousness; of them every patriot should say, as did the Psalmist: 'Do not I hate them that hate thee? Yea, Lord, I hate them with a perfect hatred.'"—Charles J. Bonaparte.

753 postmasters were appointed in Indiana from March 4 to July 20 inclusive.

SIXTH AUDITOR COULTER'S interpretation of republican promises has been set out in another column. It now appears that Mr. Roosevelt has again shown his steadiness of nerve and purpose by going to the secretary of the treasury and, temporarily, at least, convinced that officer that common honesty is a thing that a party can not well ignore, and Coulter's proceedings have been, for the present, stopped.

ASSISTANT Postmaster Thompson has been running about asking people to recommend Mr. W. A. Van Buren for appointment to the local civil service board. The indications are that Thompson has set out to work republicans into this post-office, and the fact that he wants a man on the local board is an all-sufficient reason why the appointment should not be made. The local board has had enough of politicians; it needs, and needs badly, men who are friendly to the law. It was supposed that one such had been obtained in Mr. Fishback, but there seems to be some hitch in his appointment. The civil service commission should take notice that the local board as at present constituted will never have the confidence of the people. The commission is undoubtedly in earnest in saying that democrats should come forward for examination, but it should set up machinery here that will make people know that they will receive absolutely impartial treatment. The friends of the merit system may well cry out, "when will there be one officer in this post-office who cares for that system, and would like to see it succeed?" This needs but a single illustration. When the commission was here Mr. Thompson, in his begging for a special examination, said that they would soon have to make appointments which would exhaust the present eligible list of carriers in two days. He was speaking in the presence of Postmaster Wallace. The plain deceit, as well as the falsity of their professions of fairness to competitors, is demonstrated by the fact that they refuse to make a single appointment from the eligible list of clerks or carriers until after the August examination. The only conceivable reason is that the list is made up largely of democrats. The proper way to bring the acts of these men into consonance with their oaths would be to refuse any examination until the present eligible list is exhausted.

POSTMASTER WALLACE has in his employ a man named Hamlin, who has been frequently and justly mentioned as possessing a disgraceful court record. Mr. Wallace found him a substitute and promoted him while ignorant of this record. Weeks ago, however, the Sentinel published the facts, and from that moment it would seem there was but the one duty of dismissal. Instead, the postmaster writes a letter to the papers, and says, in effect, that the man is a product of the civil service law. The proper estimate of the postmaster's sincerity can be given by stating that if Hamlin were a democrat he would have been instantly dismissed. As his father is the most active republican political leader and manager in his township, Hamlin is kept, and for no other reason. The civil service law puts no limit upon removals for cause.

It is true that Hamlin came in under the merit system, but inquiry develops that no one certified to his good character, and that such certificates are no longer required. As the matter now stands all kinds of bad characters may get upon the eligible list, and it would not seem that the postmaster need be told that he ought to make inquiries in that direction when selecting men. The requirement was abolished because it was found that the certificates were usually made by influential politicians like Quay, and were looked upon as a menace. The requirement was nevertheless a good one. The mistake was that the civil service commission kept secret the names of the men who signed the certificates. Men who know that they can not act in the dark, and that the public will call them to account, will not sign certificates for the Hamlins.

THE President has appointed D. M. Ransdell, of this city, marshal of the District of Columbia. Ransdell was a soldier in General Harrison's regiment and lost an arm in the service. He was undoubtedly a good soldier. He is affable in manner, and is adroit in politics. He is one of the republican state committee. Once he had no property to speak of, but he has become rich holding office. Out of the emoluments of office he buys houses and lands, and has rich store besides. He belongs with those who no longer attract or even hold votes to the republican party, but who drive away votes. He is one of the Indiana aristocracy of office-holders, and if such an aristocracy is to be fostered he may as well be favored as any other.

TOUSEY, whom the civil service commission ordered dismissed because Postmaster Wallace had improperly reinstated him, is beloved by the boys who run the local machine. He carries one of the loud trumpets, and his fellows mournfully see that if he could not hold a place in our post-office, law or no law, none of them could, and they are very sore in consequence. They go about the streets saying that "no business man in the world would have turned out Tousey, who was experienced in the duties he was performing, and put in a clerk with much less experience." Treating this as an honest argument, it is undoubtedly true that, under the merit system, where the places are obtained by competition, and where the higher places are filled by competitive promotion from lower grades, it will be now and then possible to fill a place with a former employe of the service temporarily better than it can be filled by transfer, or from among the substitutes, or from the eligible list. Such cases will be rare, and they belong to the inseparable small evils that always go with great improvements in system.

Having treated this criticism as though made in good faith, the actual facts may be dealt with. The post-office managers are getting along without filling Tousey's place at all; so much for their protestations that they could not spare him. Let us apply the business man's view to other appointments made in this office. Take the somewhat well known case of Mr. W. O. Patterson, who was made superintendent of mails. In some six weeks he has learned one-half of the Indiana scheme so that he can "throw" it. At this rate, in the course of about two years he will, at public expense, become fairly qualified to perform the duties of the place into which he has been put. There is a man working under Patterson, Mr. Mundelle, who wanted the place. He had had years of experience in this very department, and, in the various schemes that Patterson must learn, Mundelle can "throw" as high as three thousand pieces an hour. He was in other respects also exceptionally well qualified for the place. Now, not only would no business man in the world have chosen Patterson instead of Mundelle, but no appointing officer bent even upon moderate efficiency, would have done so. But, if the appointing power was controlled by "pulls," the choice of Patterson was inevitable, and such was the case.

The business-man test is very useful, and we may carry the study further. In this post-office, when the new postmaster came in, a new head of the registry department was appointed in the person of Dr. Woodard, a dentist, whose appointment could have no possible connection with fitness for his duties, and the only explanation that has been found for it is that he sang in a campaign glee club in 1888. There was also in this case another man who wanted the place. This was Oscar N. Wilmington, who had served four years as a soldier in an Indiana regiment, having enlisted as a private and been discharged as a lieutenant, and who had already had four years of experience in this very registry department, working thirteen hours a day, Sundays and all. He is a republican who was dismissed by Postmaster Jones, and has been very properly reinstated by Postmaster Wallace. Not only is he excellently well qualified to be the head of this department, but his appointment to that place would have been peculiarly appropriate. It will take Dr. Woodard's subordinates, one of whom is Wilmington, a long time to teach him the duties of his place. Again, it must be said, that an appointing officer, looking only to the good of the service, and to every other kind of appropriateness, would have chosen Wilmington, and that, as between the two, no business man in the world would have taken Woodard. We might carry these reflections further, as for instance in the case of Marshall C. Woods, appointed box clerk. With so many experienced men in and out of the office to choose from, no business man anywhere would have selected for this place a man ignorant of its duties. And the appointment of Woods did not even have the spoils excuse of paying him for work in the last campaign; he was paid for those services at the time.

It is to be regretted that these things have to be told, but they are indispensable illustrations to show that the business-man argument is a very unsafe one to use against the merit system around here.

EVERY friend of the President should warn him that he can not safely refuse to correct mistakes; nor can he safely allow the head of an office to so refuse. No explanation whatever is attempted of appointments like those of Vandervoort, Fisher and Bagby. Past experience has shown that, though the government is silent, such appointments are not allowed to be forgotten. Their number may be small, when compared with the whole, and the men themselves unimportant, but it is unthinkable that the President will knowingly and deliberately keep even a small class of such officers. The question constantly arises, what power is controlling the President that he does not dare to purify the service? To these cases we must apparently now add another, that of Harry McFarland, whose appointment to some place in the government printing office at Washington has filled the respectable people of this city with shame and indignation. He has a past not pleasant to touch, but if the facts are necessary to make a protest effectual, either to rid the people's employ of such a man or to make the government carry the deserved responsibility of it, the facts shall be forthcoming.

THE enforcement of the civil service laws has found a new friend in General Sickles, of the New York commission. We say it has found a friend because the mere fact that an officer has sworn to enforce these laws goes for nothing. He may even profess that he is going to perform his duty in letter and spirit, and at the same time be planning to evade it. It is only when he acts that we can tell where he stands. Some time ago the mayors of cities of New York were called together to give an account of their proceedings under the law of that state. The following account from the New York Herald is of interest:

"All cursed in a chorus in the corridors, but put on a contrite countenance and pleaded ignorance of the law before the commission. Mayor Oliver, of Lockport, however, proved a Tartar, and roused the wrath of General Sickles to boiling point before the close of the admonitory session. General Sickles fairly gasped for breath at the mayor's audacity. 'What is this all about, anyhow?' asked Mr. Oliver, after he had answered a few of the questions. 'We want to know whether you propose to carry out the law or not,' replied General Sickles. 'No, I don't,' answered Mayor Oliver, briskly. 'It's no good anyhow; it's a fraud from beginning to end. It only keeps a man from putting in somebody he wants and makes him put in somebody he don't want. We don't want it, we don't need it, and we won't have it unless we are forced to.' 'What's that?' roared General Sickles. 'Don't you know you took an oath to enforce the laws of the state?' 'Not that law,' responded the mayor. 'There ought not to be any such law on the books. It's a nuisance, no matter how you look at it.' 'I don't want your ideas but your intentions in respect to this law,' interrupted General Sickles. 'You have violated the statute giving preference to veterans.' 'They are first-class suckers, and I won't give them a place any way,' broke in Mayor Oliver. In a few minutes which followed this outburst General Sickles laid down the law to the belligerent ruler of Lockport in a manner that fairly frightened the audience which had gathered during the inter-im. Finally, pausing for breath, he concluded: 'If I were not a state officer I would knock you over the head with my crutch, you ignorant, impudent ass.' The crutch passed unpleasantly near the mayor's head as the general waved it in his wrath, and the Lockport brave made his escape hastily, and the meeting adjourned.'

General Sickles is a democrat, and is president of the New York commission, and this incident shows that there is a growing contempt and indignation among the people at large with the political office-holders who trick to get around a law that "keeps a man from putting in somebody he wants, and makes him put in somebody he don't want."

THE late Simon Cameron can not be well spoken of. This paper can not give the space which the facts deserve, but there have been few citizens who have been greater enemies of their country. He was not a statesman, yet he held a state in his grip. The reason that he thus held Pennsylvania for many years was not that the people regarded him as skilled in law-making and in public administration, for he had no special faculty in that direction. He got and kept his hold because he understood how to manipulate primaries and conventions, and how to distribute public offices among minor party managers and workers so as to secure for the price paid the greatest amount of personal service to himself. He had no noble ambition; he simply wanted to control "patronage." By a bargain in convention he gave the votes of Pennsylvania to the nomination of Lincoln and got in return the secretaryship of war. The country was in an agony of struggle, yet, to Cameron, political conventions and army contracts were one, and Mr. Lincoln dismissed him. Neither his disgraceful conduct nor the disgrace of his punishment hurt his power. He ruled Pennsylvania like a feudal chief until he got tired and turned the state over to his son, Don Cameron. He is an example that shows that neither good repute nor evil repute can shake the power of a skilled manipulator who controls a party machine. Don Cameron has for some reason lost the control his father handed down to him, and Pennsylvania is now ruled by Quay, who, if people like to live under modernized feudalism, is a thorough ruler who will see to it that no public office in that state is given to any one who will not work night and day to help Quay's personal fortunes.

THE DISCRIMINATING TEST.

Since our last issue John O. Cravens has been appointed collector of internal revenue for this district. He has under him some fifty government officers. Quoting his own words, he says in an interview in the Indianapolis News [July 10], that to secure an appointment from him a man must show "that he is an unwavering, active republican. The mere fact that a man may have always voted the ticket is not nearly enough. He must have been an active party worker." With such a brazen-faced breaker of party promises it is useless to reason. If he were asked to reconcile his test with President Harrison's dogma, that "fitness, and not party service, should be the sole discriminating test of appointment," he would, doubtless, laugh at the greenness of a question implying that such a declaration was ever intended to be acted upon. But is the President going to allow himself and his words to be openly discredited by a man whom he has put into a profitable place? It can be said that he ought not, but not that he will not. After allowing the congressmen and Clarkson to loot the fourth-class post-offices at the rate of a thousand a week, and taking into account the great number of other changes, it becomes apparent that a clean sweep is intended and is being made as fast as possible, and that, with rare exceptions, the places are being given to party workers, because they are party workers. This means that President Harrison will not keep his own and his party's promises. It means also that he will give a colossal indorsement to a plain violation of the constitution. Where does Collector Cravens get any right to require that his appointees shall have been working republicans? Where does any appointing officer, from the President down, get any right to require that the men whom he selects to work for the whole people, for pay from the whole people, shall be republicans?

This was the test openly laid down by Attorney-General Miller, and referred to by us last month. There is not a line or a syllable in the constitution, nor in any law, that justifies such a discrimination. Such a discrimination is simply the exercise of the despotic power which absolute rulers, like the Czar, exercise to the fullest extent, and which lesser kings and rulers of all grades have always clung to and practiced as much as possible. It can not be admitted for a moment that that power was transplanted to this country by our constitution. The only test that can be admitted to be found in the appointing power vested by the constitution is the business test—the test of fitness for the business to be done, without regard to the beliefs of the appointee. This was Madison's view of the scope of the appointing power, and it is the view that will be adopted and acted upon by the country, and when that happens these men now in the pay of the whole people, but who are giving their whole time to proscribing one-half of the people for political belief from more than one hundred thousand places in which to earn a living, will appear small indeed. It is no answer to say that they are following the practice. A bad custom can not make a law.

THE COMING STRUGGLE BETWEEN FEUDALISM AND DEMOCRACY.

It is republican congressmen who now feel the pressure of the civil service law, and who justly recognize the fact that either the law or their right to give places to their personal supporters must give way. A few have lately been outspoken. Congressman Browne, of Indiana, opposes the law because "it is expensive, * * in its examinations it applies wholly unnecessary tests, * * it is a cumbersome piece of political patchwork. * * When a vacancy occurs the senator or representative * * should nominate a person to be appointed." Congressman Perkins, of Kansas, says that the "entire system of competitive examinations is a farce, and discriminates against the bone and sinew of the west in favor of the college-bred chap of the east." Congressman Cannon, of Illinois, says: "I think it is an infernal nuisance. I have found it to be in my way very materially in many instances, and I would rather like to get it out of my way." Congressman Taylor, of Ohio, opposes it for these reasons: "Where are the republicans who fought the great political battle and won the marvelous victory of 1888? Out in the cold." Congressman Hawk, of Tennessee, opposes it because "it is un-American, and not in harmony with the constitution and the theory on which the United States government is founded." Further, it is "impracticable, * * and this attempt at an office-holding aristocracy must come to an end."

It would be an easy matter to answer all the objections of these gentlemen that go to the merits. The saving by this system in the New York post-office has more, than paid the cost of the machinery of the law for the entire country. The charge that it applies unnecessary tests is not true, and can not be sustained by Congressman Browne. Over and over again it has been shown that college applicants have comparatively poor success, and that the great bulk of successful competitors are from the public schools. The system does not, therefore, discriminate against the west because here are the best public schools. It is not un-American, because it is the most democratic method of distributing public employment that has ever been used—the method of fair, open competition, with the prize to the best man. Finally, the only aristocracy in this country is formed by a system of modern feudalism, which these congressmen have helped to build up, and are now endeavoring to fasten permanently upon the country.

But, in fact, when talking to congressmen, no trouble need be taken to answer their objections. They are not urged in good faith, and the congressmen themselves care nothing about them. The real objection is found in Congressman Cannon's declaration, "I have found it to be in my way," and in Congressman Taylor's declaration, that his henchmen are "out in the cold." This is the root of the whole matter. Congressmen care nothing for efficiency in the service. That is not their discriminating test when making appointments. They work desperately to keep in the Higginses, the Dowlings, the Vandervoorts, the Bagbys and the McFarlands. The only question is, shall they give up putting their personal followers into the pay of the public and let these places be filled on business principles, and shall these congressmen get their nominations from the people or from the fourth class postmasters?

If they do give it up, by force or otherwise, undoubtedly some of them will disappear from public life. They keep themselves in place solely by the efforts of their followers whom they have quartered upon the people, and without this support they must fall. An Indiana congressman, who had served three terms, said that so long as he could choose the fourth-class postmasters of his district he could keep himself in perpetual nomination. Probably it is not worth while to reason with the great bulk of congressmen, and show them that if they gained their places because they represented principles which ought to be followed in legislation they would be much better satisfied with themselves and much more respected by the people. Probably the only argument which will have effect will be the one which produces fear. Doubtless congressmen will attempt to block or repeal the law establishing the merit system. Civil service reformers need not shrink from the contest which that will bring on. There will be but one end to this struggle. The use of public office as spoil to permanently engraft upon our government the principles of despotism and feudalism, and thus put the country irrevocably under the heel of the Mahones, the Gormans, the Quays, the Platts and the Cannons, will not succeed. It is not settled that the republican party has the progressive strength left to break up this evil. It is on its final trial. A repeal of the civil service law would have an effect not unlike the repeal of the Missouri Compromise.

THE WORK OF THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

LAST month was given an extended account of the work of the civil service commission in the New York custom house, and in the Troy and Indianapolis post-offices. Since then the commission has further justified the good opinion of it held by the country. At Grand Rapids they received seven affidavits charging a chief clerk of the railway mail service with having collected or attempted to collect money of government employes contrary to law, as was done in the pension office here. These affidavits, however, were denied, and the commission took the only practicable course of recommending to the postmaster-general to prosecute the chief clerk if prima facie guilty; if not, then to prosecute the seven false swearers. The commission should have authority to call and swear witnesses, so that their investigations may in all cases be thorough and complete.

Collector Geer, of Port Huron, publicly expressed himself that "to the victors belonged the spoils," and then asked for a special examination. The present civil service commission, having ordinary wits, had no trouble in putting two and two together, and refused the examination and blocked Mr. Geer's plan of getting a lot of favorites on the eligible list. He has been, however, temporarily equal to the occasion. First he got permission to increase his force, and then he reduced the pay of his employes so as to take almost the entire force from under the civil service law. He is now in the process of dismissing one man to make room for two of his favorites, and putting them in under the spoils system. Here is President Harrison's opportunity, and his action will be watched with interest. The only honest way to deal with Geer is to turn him out.

The other important investigation made is that of the Milwaukee post-office. The first report of the commission was seriously adverse to the postmaster. Later the commission made a second and fuller report of the same tenor. To these Postmaster Paul has replied in various and vigorous ways. We have carefully read the statements and reports. Mr. Paul held the view that the service should be equalized between the parties. Any effort to carry out this view was unlawful. When he took the office the employes were all republican; now not half are republicans. This does not happen without special assistance. He was forbidden to have any knowledge of the eligible list; yet he had one eligible list in his office, and does not deny that he always had access to all of them. It does not matter that he cut the one from a newspaper; he knew that he had no right to examine it or to take any notice of it. He says that he was permitted by the previous commission to transfer names, for instance, from the eligible list of clerks to the carriers, and these names were to be certified for places as carriers. This could have but the one meaning, that the transfer was always to be made by the local board and in every case from the top of the list; but it seems that the postmaster selected any name that he chose for such transfer. He denies that he compelled the re-marking of a paper, but not that he expressed great dissatisfaction with the marking. What right had he to know anything about examination papers which were then and are now kept secret? It is true that he has just published, with many expletives and repetitions, a general denial of all the statements in the report of the commission, but that is not the way to meet specific cases. A few instances have been given, but the report, signed by every member of the commission, makes the most explicit and damaging findings of the worst sort of trickery. It must be borne in mind that this office has been pretty thoroughly investigated. In July, 1888, the secretary of the commission was sent to investigate, and made an unfavorable report. In September, 1888, the chief examiner was sent to make a full inquiry, and reported gross and repeated violations of the law; and now the whole commission finds to the same effect. Mr. Paul's frankness may be questioned. For instance, he has repeatedly stated that he was not permitted to know the testimony, yet the report of the three commissioners states that Shiddy and Johnson testified in Mr. Paul's presence. These were the main witnesses. It is now reported that Mr. Paul is being supported by a republican congressman. Doubtless the latter is looking to the time when his henchman will succeed Mr. Paul, and he does not want any precedent against manipulating the law.

—Civil Service Commissioner Roosevelt has received a letter signed by the President and other members of the board of officers of the Brookline Civil Service Reform Association, of Brookline, Mass., congratulating him upon his appointment as civil service commissioner and upon the earnestness with which he has taken hold of his duties. The letter concludes as follows:

"The republicans in this town—a thousand in number—are almost unanimously civil service reformers and believe sincerely in a non-partisan civil service, with admission to and continuance in office depending upon ascertained ability. We write this letter because it would appear from the tone of a portion of the public press that some of the 'spoilsmen' of our own party are inclined to evade the pledges of the Chicago platform, and to go backward rather than forward in reforming our public service—and that it may encourage and strengthen you to know that organizations of friends in your own party are noting and commending your good work."

FIRE CHIEF SHAY, at his own request, after thirty-five years of active fire service in New York City, was recently retired on a pension of $2,500 a year because of disabilities received in the service. Ex-Chief Webster, of the Indianapolis fire department, after twenty-nine years of active service, was kicked out against the protests of the chief business men of the city because he had declined to dismiss the dozen democrats in the service at the command of Councilmen Trusler and Connett. Meanwhile personal followers of these councilmen are being appointed instead of experienced substitutes awaiting regular employment, and Trusler is already pondering how to behead the man he put into Webster's place because he has not proved pliant. There is not a fireman in the city but feels that his place depends entirely upon the personal favor of three or four men, nevertheless, he goes on about his duty. Meanwhile we allow Fireman Davis to break his arm to save our property, and Politician Trusler, if so disposed, to dismiss him from the service to pick up a new trade and a living if he can. But for firemen and their families to live by the favor of Trusler, a sort of local Robespierre infinitesimally reduced, is "American, anti-Chinese and democratic," and they should be content and proud of their country and especially of their city.

LAST month was given an instance of a congressman countermanding two excellent appointments to the Indian service, although the appointees had closed their business and were on their way to their duties. The reason for this flagrant instance of despotism was that the person appointed did not live in the state where the Indians and the congressmen were located. This office-baron coolly informed the government that persons had been selected for all the places and notified of their selection. It is now proposed that all government places among the Indians, many of which require the greatest skill and tact, shall be filled from the sparse population of the state where the reservation is. The Indians are helpless, and the spoils system has no mercy for them. As long as we are to have the spoils system, it is fit and becoming that that system, worked by congressmen ferocious for patronage, should prey upon these defenseless wards.

PRESIDENT HARRISON's grandfather, President Harrison, said: "There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press. We have learned, too, from our own as well as the experience of other countries, that golden shackles, by whomsoever or by whatever pretense imposed, are as fatal to it as the iron bonds of despotism. * * * * *

The President has shocked large numbers of citizens by appointing an unusual number of editors of great papers to important positions. It is doubtless true that those papers are muzzled papers from this time forth, but while this manifestation of the feoffing spirit is more conspicuous and offensive, the danger to free institutions is really less than with the practice of giving the country editor the postmastership or some similar position. In this position, under the direction of his congressman, and as his "man," he runs the primaries and conventions; he is absolutely dictator of the political use of his paper, and with his paper and his office, he is unusually wanting in tact if he can not construct a machine with no creaking to ever reach the public ear. The danger in a democratic government of giving the censorship and power of the press into the hands of a great body of place-holders controlled, and holding at the pleasure of a powerful oligarchy, was apparent from a careful report on the federal civil service of Indiana made in 1886. At that time thirty-four editors had already received places, the bulk being postmasters. In the congressional nominations of that year they were prominent objects. In Lowry's district the editor and postmaster worked for his congressman. In Matson's district the editor and postmaster worked for Matson. In Holman's district the collector of internal revenue and editor "set the pins," worked and had his force at work for Holman's re-nomination and election. These congressmen were all bitterly opposed, and could not have ridden down the opposition of their districts without a subsidized press and an aristocracy of office-holders whose existence depended upon their personal service.

The postmaster at Decatur removed his newspaper office into the same building as the post-office, and was secretary of the county committee. A petition was presented for the removal of the editor-postmaster at Mt. Vernon because "he had used his position to dictate the political action of his party associates and to throttle their freedom of action within party lines." The editor-postmaster at Goodland was charged with getting his predecessor removed on a false charge. The editor-postmaster at Cannelton was active in all meetings and caucuses and was a prominent figure in a factional contest. The editor-postmaster at Boonville was active in "setting-up" Warrick county for a congressional nominee. The postmaster at Paoli was described in the state gazetteer as lawyer, postmaster and editor. These editor-postmasters gave their allegiance not to the President, but to their congressmen, and after the defeats of 1886 caused mainly by their disregard of his pledges, they did what they could to further break him down.

And now President Harrison is promised a like experience. He has appointed a newspaper man internal revenue collector, one White, of West Virginia, whose paper says, just before he takes his oath of office:

"He [Mr. White] is as anxious as any republican to get the changes made as speedily as consistent with good service, being a devoted believer in the doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils; and, at the earliest practicable date, every democratic appointee in the office, from the humble and, poorly-paid apple-jack gaugers to the well-paid store keepers and clerks, will be succeeded by Simon-pure all-wool and yard-wide republicans."

This is such coarse disregard not only of the pledges of the republican platform but of General Harrison's own promises, that, as an honorable man, to submit to it must be intolerable.

Whether President Harrison, under the dictation of congressmen, is appointing to office editors of small party papers on a wide scale is not yet known; if he is, it is the most adroit way that has been found of setting up an aristocratic and exclusive government of congressmen, under the guise of democracy.

THE AMERICAN, DEMOCRATIC AND ANTI-CHINESE SYSTEM.

—Public Printer Palmer learned to-day what it is to have control of 2,500 positions, and to have about 10,000 persons, who want to fill them, actively engaged in seeking him. His immense establishment was thronged all morning and afternoon by office seekers, and his desk was heaped up with applications in written form, while he was dizzy listening to verbal statements as to the qualities of applicants.—Indianapolis Journal Dispatch.

—Senator Farwell arrived from New York this morning and found over 2,000 letters stacked up on his office desk. The first thing he did was to send for four stenographers, and by working until midnight he thought he would succeed in getting most of the correspondence off his hands. To-morrow he will start out to fix up a few more places for his constituents.—Chicago Times.

—Senator Farwell, of Illinois, says: "I have never seen or heard anything in my life like this hunger for office. It is something I can not comprehend. I wonder if it has always been so? I am getting along in years, as you see, but if I were younger and thought I should have to face what I have in the last few weeks, I give you my word there is not enough honor, money or anything else to keep me in the United States Senate. There is nothing that a man can think of that he won't say or won't promise to get an office. I was never as sick of anything in my life."

—During his first two months in office Clarkson answered over 100,000 letters and had "not less than 15,000 personal interviews with senators, congressmen and office-seekers." Giving out his fifty odd thousand post-offices by order of congressmen is only part of his work. His great influence with the President leads those wanting other offices to seek his help. Office-seekers follow him home, and keep him up until after midnight.

—Senator Cullom, of Illinois, says: "I have never been so pressed and harassed in my life as I have been since March 4th. If I had to go through all of this again, I almost think that the rewards of political life would scarcely be adequate compensation. You can have no idea of the persistence of these office-seekers, or of the embarrassing complications connected with the quest of one's constituents for place. The mere matter of letters is enough to stagger one. Why, they come by hundreds, and one is constantly occupied in keeping up with the current correspondence. Each letter involves two or three more, as each requires an answer, and an answer generally calls for a visit to the White House, or to the departments; and so the time goes. And, with all this watchfulness and attention to the interests of one's constituents, there remains the grim reflection that, whatever you may do, you will, perhaps, displease more persons than you can please."

—The Washington Star says:

Secretary Windom is probably the most crowded man in the cabinet. Day after day the office-seekers and their friends swarm in upon him, and his room frequently contains forty or more men waiting for a word in his ear. The result has been to delay the natural advance of public business—including the satisfying of the hungry—to a considerable extent, and the secretary is in the habit of telling those who grumble at the slow grinding of the mill that "if they don't give the jury a chance to retire, they will never get a verdict." Saturday was a little too much for the secretary's patience, and he has given intimation that he will hereafter deny himself to all callers on Tuesday of each week until further notice, in order to give proper attention to important matters pending before the department.

—WASHINGTON, June 24.—There was a conference held at the White House to-day, which will have a great deal of influence in future appointments for Indiana, as well as of Indians for federal offices generally. Early this morning Mr. D. M. Ransdell, of Indianapolis, who arrived in this city yesterday, called upon Attorney-General Miller and was closeted with him for about an hour. He then went to the White House, accompanied by Col. W. T. Durbin, of Anderson, and was shortly followed by Mr. Miller. These men, in company with Private Secretary Halford, entered the latter's office and remained in consultation nearly an hour. It is said to-night that the subjects considered were the collectorship or internal revenue and several other minor offices for Indiana, including the pension board of Indianapolis.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

—The Franklin Star says that while United States Marshal Dunlap was in that city yesterday, he asked Postmaster Brown to resign and thereby relieve the strain as to who will be his successor.

—THE Evansville Journal says: "Mr. Smiley Chambers, United States District Attorney, has acted very injudiciously, to say the least, in the Vincennes post-office matter." Then it proceeds to condemn him for his "perfidy and superserviceableness in meddling in a matter that he ought to have allowed to take its course. There was no occasion," it says, "for Chambers to go on sundry pilgrimages to Indianapolis and Washington in order to prejudice the authorities against Adams, from motives of personal spite." The Journal continues:

He should have let bygones be bygones in the interest of party harmony. He had gotten all or more than he himself deserved. He had attained a position to which fifty other Indiana republicans had better claim. There was a great surprise when he was appointed U. S. district attorney.

—Collector Cooper at Philadelphia, formally took possession of his office July 15. A dispatch to the New York Times says:

Later on a number of people called to pay their respects to the new official. Among others were Congressman Smedley Darlington and State Senator Harlan of Chester county, both of whom were closeted with the collector in his private office for quite a while; ex-Surveyor of the Port George Leland, J. F. Weirick, private secretary to Congressman Kelley; Representative Horatio P. Connell, E. C. Knight, Senator George Handy Smith, Mercantile Appraiser Harry Hunter, and a number of lesser lights, all of whom shook the new official warmly by the hand.

Was this a spontaneous congratulatory gathering of the people, or was it the vultures for the prey?

—The anti-Chinese system now seems to be fully applied to Virginia. After a long struggle Mahone, by careful manipulation, assisted by the republican national committee and seemingly by the President, has put his enemies under his feet. He will now rule Virginia for the federal government. Once before the republican party put the state of Virginia into his grip, and no person was appointed or removed without his order. We may expect to see this repeated, and, we believe, with similar disastrous results.

—WASHINGTON, June 27.—Two of the appointments which were agreed upon the other day were announced this afternoon. John O. Cravens is appointed collector of internal revenue for the Sixth Indiana district. It is understood that this appointment was made with the full approval of all parties interested in the distribution of Indiana patronage, and that the same is true of the appointment of Mr. Philip M. Hildebrand to be surveyor of customs of the port of Indianapolis.—Special to Indianapolis Journal.

—Senator Higgins, of Delaware, appointed a postmaster at Bridgeville, Sussex county. He consulted one henchman in that county, but though five-sixths of the citizens, regardless of politics, protested, and the local republican club denounced their over-lord, he is obdurate. Later he gave to the brother-in-law of this henchman the position of commercial agent at Nottingham, England; then he appointed ex-Judge George P. Fisher first auditor of the treasury, and the Morning News (Rep.) says:

"It is unfair and hurtful to the republicans of this state to be exhibited before the country with a vulnerable candidate for a high and responsible financial office," and "that the republican party outside of the state, including the President himself, should be placed on defensive through an error of judgment in Delaware is a mortification which no rebuke can cure, and which must, therefore, be endured in silence."

Then he appointed Horace Greely Knowles, consul at Bordeaux. To make room for this young follower, an old soldier who left one leg on the field of battle, and carries two rebel bullets, is recalled from a post where he had rendered years of faithful service. Of this appointment, the same republican paper says:

"A man ought at least to be able to earn a thousand dollars a year at home, where he is known, before receiving some six thousand or seven thousand dollars a year under the government."

—The following extract is a vivid picture of a familiar scene. The "reportorial" artist is describing the return of the collector of the port and his private secretary to the custom house to attend to the public business, a place with which politics have no more proper concern than with a bank, a school or a hospital:

"Both had run away to get a rest from the demands of the hungry republicans. Both got back to the custom house at about the same time yesterday. There never was such a scene there as that which was before them. District leaders from New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, and scores of lieutenants from up the state, were waiting for them. They choked the iron-railed stone stairway leading to the collector's office. Clumps of the boys were in all the anterooms leading to the collector's office. In the big room where Collector

Magone had his desk, more boys filled the chairs and lounges. The collector and his private secretary were almost paralyzed. Colonel Erhardt fled to the inner office, and Mr. Hunt, resigned and apprehensive, went to his desk right among the hungry. Those in the outside corridors crowded in, and until sundown the demands of the faithful were heard. It was a continued shout for places, and long before the afternoon was over, the collector and his secretary were wilted. The demands were for the places of the democratic messengers, ushers and laborers. For every place there was a score of new applicants. There are just so many places, and as each hour goes by the number of applicants increases, until Collector Erhardt scarcely knows whether he is afoot or on horseback. Just before leaving the custom house he ordered that the corridors and entrances be placarded with this:

"The collector will have to ask the indulgence of those seeking employment for two weeks.

Official business will prevent his granting personal interviews until that time.

Applications may be directed to W. S. Robinson and given to the messenger."

This is a pleasant and creditable way of transacting the public business. It is called the American way, and is described as essential to the preservation of our institutions. Anything else is aristocratic, and belongs to effete monarchies. This is simple, democratic, effective and economical.—Harper's Weekly.

—Mr. Quay's agent, Mr. Andrews, nominally chairman of the republican state committee, has issued a call (without a meeting of the committee), for the Pennsylvania convention to assemble at Harrisburg on August 7. There is really no business to be done. One candidate is to be named—state treasurer; but as he has been designated by the Quay agents, for many weeks past, in the person of Mr. H. K. Boyer, speaker of the lower house of the legislature, the nomination by the convention is superfluous formality.—The American (Rep.).

—The situation there is a terrible commentary on the spoils system (the anti-Chinese, American and democratic system). I nearly got into trouble among the throngs down there on offices intent. It is very unpleasant. June has been very cool, and I ventured to say that perhaps their chilly prospects had affected the weather. It was a risky remark. There never was such a situation in the history of the whole world. There are 4,000 applicants for 150 consulates, and I believe that this proportion will be maintained, if not increased, through all the departments. The President, the members of the cabinet, the heads of bureaus, and the representatives are overrun, and the public business is almost at a stand-still.—Chauncey M. Depew, recent interview.

THE Civil Service Reform Association of Missouri has held its annual meeting, and the eighth annual report was read. It commends the President for his appointment of a civil service commission, and it censures him for the riot of spoils that has displaced 11,000 fourth-class postmasters in less than three months. It is an encouraging sign that civil service reformers are everywhere showing less tendency to conceal and excuse the shortcomings of the presidential office, by whom ever filled.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given," and, on breach of this condition, "by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord. The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and there professing that he did become his MAN from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord." Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—R. A. Haynes, a cousin of Russell Harrison's wife, has been appointed law clerk of the post office department. Salary $2,500.

—Mr. Spalding, a brother-in-law of Private Secretary Halford, has been appointed postmaster at Champaign, Ill.

—John Hughson, Pullman car porter and rescuer of the wife of the President's private secretary at Johnstown, has been appointed as skilled laborer in the treasury, at a compensation of $720 per annum, upon the recommendation of the private secretary.

—A friend of Russell Harrison's business partner has been appointed postal stamp agent at New York, salary $2,500. Visionary people probably expected that Mr. Pearson's plan of promoting one of his hundreds of trained men would be followed.

—Pension Commissioner Tanner has appointed his daughter, just out of school, as his private secretary.

—Indian Commissioner Morgan has appointed his wife as his private secretary. Salary, $1,200 a year.

—Commissioner of Indian Schools Dorchester has had a special office created for the benefit of his wife. Salary, $6 a day.

—The postmaster at Augusta, Me., has been removed to make a place for "Joe" Manley. The sole object for Manley's existence is, and has been for years, the glorification of Secretary Blaine. This is his pay.

—Senator Gorman, who is literally a curse to the state of Maryland, has appointed a postmaster at Laurel, Md. Although a democrat, and although a republican had been named, Gorman claimed the place as his and Wanamaker allowed it. Thus modern feudalism is nourished and grows strong.

—Congressman Smith has appointed Dan Hogan collector of internal revenue for the Cairo, Ill., district.

—Mahone has appointed John G. Watts marshal of the western district of Virginia.

—Quay has appointed Thomas V. Cooper, state senator and ex-chairman of the republican state committee, collector for the port of Philadelphia. Regarding this appointment the American [rep], in a few words, shows the grip of Quay upon the state of Pennsylvania:

"Upon this ground it is that Mr. Cooper is selected. He must be furnished with a place. He will serve Mr. Quay. The President, therefore, is pressed to appoint him. And the President consents. He declines the advice of the citizens of Philadelphia, who have in mind the efficiency of the public service, while he yields to the demand of Mr. Quay, who has in mind his own present schemes and the further operations which are to grow out of them."

—Congressman Cannon has had the salaries of certain democratic clerks in Washington reduced, as follows:

Charles H. Rickets, of Charleston, Ill., from $1,600 to $1,400; T. T. Doran, of Mattoon, Ill., from $1,600 to $1,200; W. Durbin, of Champaign, Ill., from $1,400 to $1,200; Wm. H. Smyzer, of Champaign, Ill., chief of division, from $2,000 to $1,600; Wm. Carmer, of Douglas county, Ill., from $1,400 to $1,200.

It seems that Cannon claims that in 1884 these clerks opposed him, and by reason of the civil service law, he was obliged to modify his order for dismissal to the above.

—Jerry McCarthy, Congressman Banks's nominee for the internal revenue collectorship, and qualified for the office "by a training in the political contests in Massachusetts since his boyhood" and by being "as simple as a child in manner," had the misfortune to find Congressman Lodge's man preferred by the administration.

—WASHINGTON, June 27.—Hon. W. D. Owen, of Logansport, left for his home to-day. Mr. Owen is entirely satisfied with what he has accomplished during his short stay in Washington, and goes away happy.

—Charles H. Litchman, a labor-worker in the last campaign, has been paid by a special agency of the treasury.

—Horace A. Taylor, editor and proprietor of the Hudson [Wis.] Star and Times, and ex-chairman of the state republican committee, has been appointed commissioner of railroads.

—O. T. Porter of Albany, Oregon, editor of a republican paper, has been appointed marshal for the district of Alaska.

—H. M. Cooper, member of the republican state central committee, has been appointed collector of internal revenue for the district of Arkansas.

—John Money, chairman of the Tennessee delegation to the national republican convention of 1888, has been appointed minister resident to Paraguay and Uruguay.

—Clarkson has been doing his work of removing fourth-class postmasters under the orders of congressmen at the rate of one every three minutes.

—Clarkson appointed L. D. Levan postmaster at Wilson, N. Y., although a statement had been filed in the department showing that Levan had been indicted and fined for keeping a disorderly house.

—The postmaster at Hollowell, Me., having been removed on charges, his friends believing the charges to be forged, asked to see them, but were refused by the postoffice department.

—The new assistant district attorney of West Virginia is defending a suit for embezzlement in a former public office. The principal deputy marshal is indicted for bribery, the superintendent of public buildings in Charleston is indicted for bribery, and another federal appointee, Ray, has admitted that he attempted to bribe a member of the legislature.

—Henry E Sharpe has been appointed postmaster at Lead Hill, Ark. He was convicted in the United States Court at Springfield, Ill., of sending obscene matter through the mails. He has come out with a defense as follows:

If any one can prove that during the last seven years my life has not been strictly moral, or that at any time in those seven years I have related smutty jokes, or indulged in any obscene or improper conversation, or that I have gambled, or been intoxicated, or committed any dishonest act, I will give him my horse, sulky, harness, cow, and calf; all of which are unencumbered by any lien whatever.

It appears that within the last seven years he assaulted his wife and threw her down stairs, and has been more than once a prisoner in the Jefferson Market Police Court, New York City.

—The President has appointed Robert Smalls in face of his well-known record and of strong protest, to a federal office in South Carolina. Here is an extract from his record:

Josephus Woodruff, then clerk of the senate, testified that, in consideration of Smalls' vote to support a joint resolution appropriating $200,000 to pay the claim of the Republican Printing Company, he gave Smalls a check for $5,000, payable to cash or bearer. L. W. Zealy, cashier of the South Carolina Bank and Trust Company, testified that Journal A, 437, showed that Smalls indorsed and presented said check on the same day, Jan. 18, 1872, and that it was placed to his credit.

The records of the court will show that for this offense Smalls was tried before a republican judge and a jury, the majority of whom were republicans and of his own race, and was found guilty, sentenced to two years in the penitentiary, and subsequently pardoned by Gov. Hampton.

OPPOSED TO AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

—"My only object—and I think you understand it—is to secure fit men for responsible places without admitting the right of senators and representatives to control appointments for which the President and the secretary, as his presumed adviser, must be responsible. Unless this principle can be practically established, I feel that I can not be useful to you or to the country in my present position."—Secretary Chase to Lincoln.

—In the first place patronage is thoroughly un-American. It is a system handed down to us from the worst days of English politics, and it befits a corrupt monarchy, not an enlightened republic. There is nothing American in a system which fills offices by favoritism, friendship, obligation and influence. The American theory is to give to every man a fair field and no favor; while patronage goes entirely by favor and gives no field at all. The great error hitherto has been in arguing as if the purpose of the change was to improve the public service, when we have had for years a good civil service, so good that it may well be doubted whether any change of system would very greatly improve it. The true and the terrible evil of patronage is in the effect upon politics generally, and upon public life and public men. It takes the power of appointments from the heads of departments who are fit to make them and places it in the hands of senators and congressmen, who in the nature of things can know but little about them. Senators and members of congress are elected to their great offices—for they are great offices of high trust—by the whole people, and their proper duty is to attend to the business of the whole people and not to the wants and importunities of the few.—Congressman Henry Cabot Lodge at Lowell, July 4, 1889.

—I think that at present there are more congressmen who keep in power, not because they can render good service to the country, but because they know how to manipulate fourth-class post-offices; and when you see a congressman from a country district denouncing the civil-service reform law, you may be sure that that man devotes his time to peddling patronage and not his talents and energies to the service of the republic.—Theodore Roosevelt.

WANTON REMOVALS.

The danger, then, consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this house, before the senate, for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. * * * Can we suppose a President, elected for four years only, dependent upon the popular voice, impeachable by the legislature, little, if at all, distinguished for wealth, personal talents, or influence from the head of the department himself; I say, will he bid defiance to all these considerations, and wantonly dismiss a meritorious and virtuous officer? Such an abuse of power exceeds my conception.—Congressman James Madison, June, 1789.

—The sixth auditor of the treasury, Coulter, has removed his deputy and the eleven chiefs of division to make places for republicans. Coulter says "That's what we are here for, and it is about time that the men who did the horn blowing during the last campaign should have something to show for their labor." The places are worth from $2,000 upward.

—Miss Moony, postmaster at Maspeth, L. I., has been removed and the place given to a man named Smith. Practically all the patrons of the office wanted Miss Moony retained, and three hundred, including nearly every voter in the district, petitioned for it, but the local politicians were opposed and the change was made. The papers which brought about the change are kept secret by the department.

—President Cleveland removed Postmaster Hankness of Albert Lea, Minn., for cause upon petition and appointed Mr. Stacy, who has served two years. He was a soldier, is poor and has made a good postmaster, but Congressman Dunnell and apparently the government also cared nothing for these matters and removed Stacy and appointed Hankness.

—The postmaster at Vineland, N. J., was removed on the charge of being short in his accounts. Wannamaker, however, kept all the papers secret. Thereupon a committee of prominent republicans, headed by ex-Mayor Mason, made a thorough investigation and reported: "We have examined Postmaster Brewer's accounts, and find them correct, said accounts showing that the amounts due the government have been sent promptly at the time they became due and payable." Dr. Brewer is, of course, a democrat.

—James P. Smith, postmaster at Lehigh, Pa., has been removed to make place for a republican. The new appointee himself remarked, during his canvass for the office, that "he could see nothing derogatory to Smith," but if there was to be a change, he wanted it.

A GREAT MORAL QUESTION.

THIS paper has hitherto had occasion to notice the humane work of the Indian Rights' Association. Mr Herbert Welsh, whose devotion to that cause needs no public mention, has become convinced that any permanent progress in his peculiar work is blocked by the spoils system. This is the conclusion of most other patriotic citizens who have tried to do practical work in any direction having for its object the honor and well-being of their country. To men having had the opportunities of Mr. Welsh, for accurate knowledge of the practical works of the spoils method, it is its immorality that is the essential evil. It is that its yoke-fellow is always some manifestation of brutality, ingratitude, deceit or treachery that makes the system repugnant to all religious and moral creeds. The feeling is becoming a conviction that clergymen of all churches and moral teachers of all sorts, must not shirk the issue or fall behind in the actual work; it can not longer be put aside as a question of politics, it is a question of morals. It was this that induced Mr. Welsh to consult widely, especially with clergymen of all faiths, whether on the national thanksgiving day a sermon might not be appropriately preached on the evils of the spoils system. The approval of the plan has been remarkably spontaneous and hearty. That to preach this sermon is not to condemn any party, any man or set of men; that it is not in any sense a comparison of any periods, is plain from the following circular, which we print in full:

APPEAL TO THE CLERGY TO PREACH ON CIVIL SERVICE REFORM ON THANKSGIVING DAY, NEXT ENSUING, ADVOCATING IT "SO FAR AS IT INVOLVES FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF RIGHTEOUSNESS."

No public question seems to us of more vital or more pressing importance than that of reform in the civil service. It is distinctively a question of public morality and of the national character and integrity, contemplating the arrest of the corruption which now most plainly threatens that character and the honesty of the government. The chief source of this corruption is the practice of treating the enormous emoluments of the public service in all its ramifications and details, including the smallest places and employments, as the prize of the successful party at an election. This is an abuse and an evil for which no party can be justly held responsible, but which has become a tradition of all parties, and with the rapid increase of the patronage the demoralizing consequences are already startling. It turns the patronage of the government, designed solely for the public convenience, into a vast bribery fund. It breeds general corruption by teaching the citizen to expect payment for discharge of a duty incumbent upon every voter, and it tends to transform an election from a popular verdict upon differing public policies into a desperate struggle for the emoluments of place.

The disastrous effect of this corrupting system not only upon the politics and the public service, but upon the standards of public duty and official conduct, upon the self-respect of the people and a pure public spirit, can not be too seriously stated or too carefully considered. The greatest American statesmen of all parties, the most eminent jurists, the most patriotic and devoted divines, and political students and observers of all countries have pointed out the nature and consequences of this evil, the correction of which is a necessity transcending in importance all merely party aims and political policies of administration. Already public opinion has manifested itself so strongly that admirable national and state laws of limited application have been enacted, and their honest enforcement is conceded to be of the greatest public benefit. But in such a movement nothing should be considered done while anything remains to do. Every patriot in every pursuit or profession, and especially every leader and guide of the public mind, may well assist in the beneficent work.

The moral appeal which shall instruct, inspire, and strengthen public opinion to complete the good work, it seems to us would come from the pulpit with peculiar power. Believing that it is its office to apply eternal principles of religion and morals to human conduct, and to aid nations as well as individuals to walk in the right way, holding that George Mason of Virginia spoke a terrible truth which history confirms, in saying that Providence punishes national sins by national calamities, we appeal to the pulpit to demand of the public conscience that specific and acknowledged evils affecting the highest public welfare shall be redressed by simply, obvious and adequate means. In respectfully suggesting, therefore, that on Thanksgiving day, or such other day as may seem to you fitting, you should devote a sermon to the consideration of this subject, we confidently invite your earnest co-operation in a Christian endeavor to quicken the conscience of the people and to lead the nation to righteousness.

Among those who have already allowed their names to be given as favoring this plan, are:

Bishop Huntington wrote in response to the request made of him:

"The measure you propose for bringing to the attention and the conscience of the people of the country the righteous reform in which you are engaged not only commends itself to my judgment, but it falls in with convictions which have long been vital and strong in my mind. Supreme above all political questions in the nation is the question between right and wrong, integrity and corruption, honor and greediness, in the national character.

Who shall deal with it if not the ministers of Christ, the Master of society and King of men? What have prophets and teachers to do, if not to proclaim the principles of that Master, and so to serve the kingdom of that King?"

The Rt. Rev. Bishop Whitehead, of Pennsylvania, in a recent interview, said:

"I have replied to the circular saying that I would be perfectly willing to exert my influence to have the question of civil service reform brought before the public in the manner suggested. I am very sure that the movement will receive widespread support throughout the country, and very probably the majority of the preachers will elect to take the question as their subject on Thanksgiving day. I can not, of course, lay my commands on ministers of my church to speak on that or any subject, but I shall certainly use my influence as far as possible in furtherance of the movement. Ministers of my church do not preach on Thanksgiving day, but no doubt those of other denominations, the Methodists and Presbyterians, will speak on the question before their congregations.

"It is a matter which may be very fairly treated from the pulpit, as it is entirely of a non-partisan nature, and one which appeals to the good citizenship of every member of the community. We are all of us interested in the question of civil service reform for the reason that our individual as well as our national prosperity depends on the class of men who as office holders carry on the administration of our national affairs. So it is necessary to point out that if righteous-principled and capable men are elected to office, a pure and trustworthy administration may be looked for in return, and that if men of opposite character are placed there, it is not easy to foresee what must be the result. We don't desire that every Tom, Dick and Harry that comes along seeking office should be elected because he has sufficient influence to place him there. The question is one on which the public should be thoroughly informed, and when such men as Bishop Huntington, of central New York, interest themselves in it, it will be sure to obtain very general attention.

"I have not had an opportunity of forming an intelligent opinion as to the particular manner in which the question should be treated, but since the reform leaders promise to distribute a quantity of literature throughout the country, dealing fully with the matter, and that as Thanksgiving day is still some way off, ample time will be afforded everybody to familiarize themselves with the question."

Whether every clergyman in this state or whether a handful preach this sermon, good has already been accomplished by the suggestion, but it would be unfortunate to miss a noble opportunity. And those ministers of the gospel who will investigate an evil that is no less deadly because it loves darkness and privacy, who will have the courage to say that the spoils system is a slave system brutalizing to those in power, and debasing to all who work under it, they will find in unexpected quarters sympathy and approval. We should not allow Mr. Welsh to bear all the burden of the working out of this plan. A very little labor on the part of those who approve might surely be given. The clergymen who will preach a sermon on this topic, the layman who will speak to clergymen of their acquaintance might send their names to this paper that further communication may be had.

Address THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

"Practical men with their eyes open are aware that patronage is a disintegrating force, and the distribution of the offices almost always makes trouble within the party."
New York Tribune.

WE hoped to publish the questions used here in the civil service examination August 6, but we could not get them in time. They will appear next month, with the rules for marking.

DURING the month the administration has continued its process of making a clean sweep at a good pace for summer vacation time, Clarkson now boasting of 15,000 changes in the post-offices. The plainest sign of the blindness of the administration to its own promises and to the greatly increased sentiment of the country against the use of the offices as bribes, is shown in the rehabilitation of Mahone in Virginia. He has no possible hope of carrying that state except by buying it with the enormous booty of the aggregate federal offices which pertain to Virginia. His triumph would be the triumph of the wicked, and every good citizen should hope for his total defeat.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY CHAMBERS has an assistant named Cockrum who declares that the prosecution against Dudley had no foundation in fact. Nothing has commended President Harrison so much to the country as his refusal to have anything to do with Dudley. This refusal was because by an overwhelming and irresistible weight of evidence, it was, and is, clear that Dudley wrote what is known as the "blocks of five" letter, saying, in effect, that money would be furnished to buy voters in Indiana, and advising that those purchased be taken to the polls in fives. No honest citizen can view Dudley with anything but a true citizen's hatred for a professional corruptor of public morals. It is very exasperating to all such to see one of the public prosecutors stand out, brazen-faced, as the defender of such a man. A proper sense of the proprieties in his superiors would lead at once to the relegation of Cockrum to private life.

PRESIDENT HARRISON was in Indianapolis on the occasion of the laying of the corner-stone of the monument to Indiana soldiers. He was received respectfully, but in no sense enthusiastically. The reason is that he has simply been engaged in a business which does not arouse the approval of the people. It is a good sign that it does not. At the centennial celebration in New York he said that "exacting public duties" had prevented him from preparing a suitable speech, and here, the other day, he gave lack of time as the reason why he had not prepared for the occasion. He has been President now for about five months, and during that time the whole world knows that he has had the one occupation of making vacancies by turning men and women out of public offices and putting other persons into their places, and that these other persons have been given the places to reward them for personal or party services. There has been nothing in his career as President to break the monotony of this work, and it is a matter for congratulation the people are not enthusiastic over it.

COLLECTOR CRAVENS, of this district, has made a good start in his work of putting one set of men out of employment and putting in another, without cause; and he is keeping well to his word that no man shall, through him, work for the people, unless "he is an unwavering, active republican" and "an active party worker." It is natural to expect that President Harrison will restrain this officer who pours contempt upon him and his promises in his own home. It certainly can not be believed that a small politician can thus impudently trample upon the promises of the republican platform and letter of acceptance with no damaging result. The republicans should keep in mind that, sooner or later, they will have to face all the facts. In 1886, after President Cleveland had been in office one year, a careful investigation was made to discover how his acts, in Indiana, squared with his promises. The results were put into a report which attracted attention and did its work over the whole country. The same kind of investigation is promised, next year, of the acts of the present administration. This will be eminently fair and, in fact, it is the only consistent course. The report based upon the coming investigation will also do its work. If the facts have not kept pace with the promises, the administration will have to shoulder the burden. And beyond all this, in 1892, there will be a more searching examination of President Harrison's management of the civil service than any president has ever yet had. These things should make the republicans move with caution, but, if history repeats itself, they will, in their turn, regard all this as of no consequence.

THE Indiana Civil Service Reform Association has, since the annual meeting the last of January, had $57 new members, coming from sixty different towns in the state. The high character of the men, the diverse localities from which they come and the varied occupations and professions represented are most encouraging for the future of the Association and for the merit system in this state. Among the accessions are represented the Catholic, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Baptist and Christian clergy, which means that this question is at last being considered in its true phase, as a moral and not as a political question. There is an unusual chance for spreading knowledge of the merit system in Indiana if the Association had funds at its command. Every member of the Association should be provided with some of the popular tracts defending the system of competitive tests, so that if inclined he might have at hand arguments and facts for judicious distribution; further, this is the time to arouse discussion and to get a scrutiny into the practical workings of the spoils system by a series of prizes offered to the various colleges and high-schools of the state. The actual workings of congressional patronage, the inhumanity of the spoils system, the democracy of securing places through competition might, with excellent results, be the subjects of prize essays. Especially should every effort be made to convince the teachers of American history throughout Indiana that, although the text-books may omit all notice of the rise and progress and workings of the spoils system, it has, nevertheless, a place in the history of the country that should not be ignored. To print and circulate the needed pamphlets among the teachers of the state would require a considerable outlay.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is not the paper of any particular person, nor is it "controlled by republicans who voted for General Harrison as a civil service reformer." It belongs to the friends of the merit system in Indiana and throughout the west and over the whole country. It means to advocate that system without any regard to the persons or party whom such advocacy may help or hurt. As has been said before, it has no money-making object; the editorial work upon it is done without charge or compensation except the ample reward of knowing that the greatest question now requiring the attention of the American people is making an advance such as it has never made before, and that the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is aiding in that advance. It is true that the paper is actively controlled by those who voted against the re-election of President Cleveland, who had made his record in the management of the federal civil service, and in favor of the election of General Harrison, who had his record yet to make. He is making it now, and at the proper time he will be judged upon it by all friends of the merit system. When that time comes, the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE will try to judge him fairly. In the meantime, its highest duty is to point out the facts which illustrate the moral and physical rottenness of that enemy of government by the people, the spoils system, the system of using hundreds of thousands of state and federal offices to pay personal and party debts.

AT the request of Postmaster Van Cott the civil service commission has designated the places in the New York post-office which are exempted from examination. These number 30, to about 2,200 employes, while the Indianapolis office has some 16 exempted places to about 100 employes. There is a great deal of humbug and "politics" about the necessity of having exempted places. It is claimed that they are "confidential" places, but the acts of the appointing officer show that this is usually a mere pretense. An inspection of the acts of most appointing officers shows that he fills these "confidential" places purely on the principles of the spoils system. Any officer who is really in favor of the merit system will follow the example of Postmaster Pearson, and will hold these places for the benefit of the rank and file in his office. If Mr. Pearson had a vacancy in the headship of a division, he did not hunt through the city of New York for a man who had done for his party a good deal of campaign work, but he remembered the good of the service and the deserts of the 2,200 men under him, many of whom had had years of experience, and he threw the vacancy open to the subordinate who, upon strict business tests, showed himself best fitted for it.

It is reported that the President has refused the request of the civil service commission that the places of clerks of the census bureau be thrown open to free competition. He has apparently with deliberation rejected another unusual opportunity to advance good government and build up the merit system. That the present commission should ask it is conclusive of its practicability. The reason given by the President that the employment is of limited duration, is another way of saying that in his opinion congressmen, who serve no interest but their own, will make better selections than would be made by competition; and the saying is not true. The other objection of the President is that congress did not intend that these places should be put under the civil service rules. He will not claim to find non-intention anywhere in the law. But it is true that, when it was going through congress, the talk among congressmen, as individuals, was that whichever party was successful in 1888, should have these places as spoil. President Harrison knows of this talk and is apparently governed by it. Nevertheless, it was simply the unofficial talk of a pack of political pirates masquerading under the name of congressmen.

THE Reform Club of New York is spending $1,200 a month and soon expects to spend $3,000 a month disseminating its views in relation to the tariff. This amount of effort is worth the attention of civil service reformers. The merit system is in the field against the spoils system, and the complete overthrow of the latter is absolutely certain as soon as the people understand the facts about both systems. These facts can be spread only as rapidly as the means of doing so will warrant, and for this purpose money is much needed. The friends of the merit system are so well organized that the smallest amount of money can be made to count, and if any one feels that he would like to contribute and have the assurance that his money would be well spent, he need not hesitate. Any one may at any time learn what was done with his contribution. There must be many people in the west who would like to help the merit system, but who are not actively engaged in its behalf. Contributions for the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association should be sent to Noble C. Butler, Indianapolis; and for the use of the National League of Civil Service Reform Associations to William Potts, 35 Liberty street, New York City.

WE publish in full a letter from Mr. Welsh to the Boston Transcript on the treatment of the Indians by the present administration. It must be remembered that

Mr. Welsh understands entirely what he is talking about, and that, as secretary of the Indian Rights Association, he is giving years of time to the welfare of the Indians. He is, therefore, disinterested. The man who ordered the dismissal of the teachers from Virginia was Congressman Mitchell, and he and his likes are allowed to rule in this matter of the Indians. They care nothing for the Indians. They care only for quartering upon the public treasury certain people who will help them most to re-election. Their view of the Indians is like that of the army contractors who furnished shoddy clothing and wormy food to the soldiers when the best effort of every honest man seemed necessary to prevent the overthrow of the nation. The Indians are to them simply a thing from which personal benefit is to be wrung if possible.

THE EXAMINATION.

The examination held here, August 6, for places in this post-office, may be made to mark an era in the progress of the merit system in this state. Almost at the last moment, the civil service commission added Noble C. Butler and William P. Fishback to the local board; the former is the clerk and the latter is the master in chancery of the United States courts for Indiana. These two citizens are well known throughout Indiana as not caring to work republicans or democrats, as such, into or out of minor public offices. They are in favor of the enforcement of the civil service law, and they want to see the merit system embodied in that law put into successful operation. Because the republicans are in power they do not want the democrats, the labor men, the greenbackers, the prohibitionists, or any other non-republicans to stay away from examinations; on the other hand, they want them to come forward and compete as the law provides they may do, and to all such their names are an ample guaranty of fair play. It may be said, also, that their convictions are accompanied by an entire fullness of courage; in homely language, they are not afraid of any one. The recent examination was conducted in accordance with these views and qualifications; and that with the examination of papers required six days of hard work, without compensation. If democrats did not compete and get upon the eligible list it is their own fault, and it will be their own fault if they do not do so in the future.

And now the successful contestants having obtained their respective places on this list by fair competition, the merit system in this post-office has reached a decisive point. When vacancies occur and three names are certified to Postmaster Wallace from which to make his selection, are the selections to be decided by "pulls" and a dozen other back-door influences, or will the man who has honorably won the highest place be given his earned reward, unless there is a good business reason for taking the next lower? This, of course, depends upon the postmaster. If he performs his sworn duty he will not dismiss a man without good cause, and he will not hunt for causes nor call things causes against one set of men and not against another. He will, when making selections to fill vacancies, put out of his mind all questions of politics, or friendship, or social, or other outside influences, and will sacredly respect the rights which those on the eligible list have obtained, and will give freely the best of reasons if the highest man is not appointed. The public is an interested spectator and will watch the action of the postmaster in every case with keen interest and with ready criticism for any unfairness. Messrs. Fishback and Butler are entitled to the thanks of the public for days of hard, disinterested work without compensation, and for having consented to be the means of breaking down the tradition that the local board must be appointed to please the head of the office and from those under his control. It is fair to say, however, that Mr. Butler was appointed and consented to serve after the special solicitation of Postmaster Wallace.

THE MAJORITY AND THE SPOILS SYSTEM.

Senator Hoar writes to the Civil Service Record for August as follows:

I think you do not allow for the fact that a very large majority of the American people are not yet convinced of the soundness of the principle which lies at the bottom of what is called civil service reform. They think that it is better to have the party in power appoint men who have shown activity and zeal in its service to executive positions, to hold the party responsible for them, and that in that way we shall get, on the whole, a more honest, zealous, and efficient service than by selecting public agents in any other way.

We deny the last statement. The American people have never believed that it was better to have the party in power fill the offices with men who have shown activity and zeal in the service of that party. The majority did not believe this during the first forty years when it was not done; nor did they believe it when Andrew Jackson did it; nor did they believe it while all the presidents since Andrew Jackson have done it; nor do they believe it while the Clarksons and Wanamakers of the administration are attempting to do it to-day. There has never been a time when the average American citizen, and the great majority are the average, has not condemned the spoils system, as applied by Jackson and his successors. To say anything else is to say that the American citizen's intelligence became so dulled that he lost his grasp of sound principles of government after seeing those principles practiced for forty years. We are ready for the question, why do the people allow the practice of giving out the offices as rewards to party workers to continue? Why do the Russian people allow the crimes, described by George Kennan, committed by the organization which calls itself the Russian government, to continue? Does any one believe that a majority of the Russian people are in favor of such continuance? Or why do the people of Continental Europe permit themselves to be burdened to the utmost of their endurance by standing armies? Does any one believe that the majority, with an untrammelled choice, would not at once sweep away the whole system? These things continue because the government machines so skilfully unite and handle the minority that the majority are kept under; and it is often only after years of agitation and protest, and sometimes rebellion, that a small part of improvements which a people believe in can be obtained.

In exactly the same manner the people of the United States are kept to a spoils system which they condemn. We speak with deliberation; the number who are in favor of using the 142,000 offices of the United States to give to active party workers, possibly to a new set every four years, is confined to the party machines and to those who are looking forward to an office. They do not comprise one-sixtieth of the people.

Why, then, does the practice continue? Certainly, there is no lack of promises; a glance at the platforms and letters of acceptance upon which Cleveland and Harrison were elected, shows that. These documents were bawled from one end of the country to the other. But the election over, the president installed, the party machine lays its grip upon him. In walk the Gormans, the Vests, the Voorheeses, the Quays, the Mahones, the Hiscocks, and the Ingallses and scare the president off the platform upon which he was elected and upon which he is bound by every principle of honor to stand. Then the Platts, the Hattons, and a small crowd of congressmen who can not possibly maintain their hold upon public life without spoils to distribute, set up a cry that the present is the only genuine American - democratic - anti-Chinese system, and that the effects will be baneful if congressmen are not allowed to continue to pay those who manage primaries for them, out of the public treasury. Then people like Senator Hoar, who are in favor of the merit system, come forward and say that the great majority of the people like these political bosses and want, for instance, Ingalls to arrange it so that those who ride fifty miles exclusively to help his personal fortunes, shall be paid for this service by a salary out of the public treasury. This is the circle in which we are now traveling.

It is true that, while the American people want some escape from the looting system under which they are now governed, they are not entirely clear as to the best escape. It is only a question of time, however. The merit system, which, in clerical positions, puts public employment up to be competed for and to be gained by the most deserving, wherever it becomes known, makes its way as the fairest and most democratic method of distributing public work that has ever been discovered. As Senator Hoar says, the majority are not yet in favor of it; but the sole reason is that they are not familiar with it. With the final success of this will go the gathering of the smaller offices, like the fourth-class post-offices, into divisions where appointment and tenure shall be governed by the same principles that govern them in every other business. The men who now live upon the spoil of office will then have to go out into the world and earn their living upon the merit system there.

THE TREASURY DOOR SWINGS BACK.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE has already noticed the maliciousness akin to devilishness with which republican and democratic administrations attempted to break down the late Postmaster Pearson, carrying this to the extent of allowing a bill of three dollars for repairing desks, only after an exhaustive struggle, and of delaying for four months filling orders for blanks, of which millions were used in a year. The Christian Union thus sets it out:

"We give on another page an inside view of the pathetic experience of a man in the employ of the United States Government, whose only fault was his fidelity to the people whom he had been appointed to serve, and who was obstructed at every point of his service because of his loyalty. He was refused proper supplies; was given insufficient and imperfect material for his work; was denied sufficient force for his work; was treated habitually as a suspect; was compelled in frequent instances to pay out of his none too large salary the money which was morally due from the department. Finally, when eight years of this sort of treatment—half of it under a republican, half of it under a democratic administration—had brought him to a sick bed that proved his bed of death, he was dropped from the service altogether to make room for a professional politician, whose appeal for means to do the postal work of a great city will probably not fall on ears as inattentive. And Mr. Pearson's whole fault was, we repeat, that he would devote his energies and those of his subordinates to the service of the public in the department which had been intrusted to him, and would not allow either his own or their energies to be diverted from that service to building up a political machine and paying for political services that either had been rendered him or were expected by him in the future. We leave the story to carry its own moral; moralizing on it would be an insult to the intelligence and conscience of our readers."

It was a fitting end of this treatment that Mr. Pearson should be turned out of his place, without thanks, or gratitude, or appreciation from his superiors. Mr. Van Cott is put into his place at the dictation of Platt, and instantly the energies of the administration are quickened. A commission is sent to look through Postmaster Van Cott's office and see what he needs, and its report is made. There is no complaint now of lack of appropriations, but, at once, Postmaster-General Wanamaker allows an additional $78,000, and directs the employment of 102 new men. If these 102 new men and this money had been allowed to Mr. Pearson, his men would not have complained of overwork, the labor element would not have interfered, and President Harrison would not have had the excuse of refusing to keep him because he overworked his men.

TYPICAL OPPOSITION.

The Central Labor Union of Buffalo was recently addressed by Mr. Loomis and Mr. Shepard of the Buffalo Civil Service Reform Association. As is always the case where the democracy and the practicability of the merit system are explained, great interest was aroused and many questions were asked, and the discussion was carried into the other labor organizations throughout the city. The equal chance for all is the principle which makes the merit system appeal to the judgment and gain the approval of men who compete in the general labor market. The only surprising thing is that labor organizations do not demand that the government labor market shall be taken out of the field of favoritism and "pulls" and brought within the general labor field. A marked accompaniment to this interest in Buffalo was a long discussion in the public prints, especially between Mr. Loomis and the Buffalo Evening News. This is the first instance we have seen of a paper attempting to go at length into an argument against the merit system; and the attempt is a very lame one. The arguments of the News are statements that it is the "Mongolian system." That it is "the un-American, Chinese competitive system," and is the twin sister of the "un-American, Australian system of balloting." That it is "emasculating the civil service." That the interference "of non-partisan nonsense" with the civil service impairs party organization. That the examination questions are not "practical." That Mr. Loomis is "Mandarin Loo Mis," and so on. The facts to support these statements were entirely wanting.

Very unwillingly, it was obliged to yield to the demand of Mr. Loomis, and publish the questions used in the April examination for positions on the Buffalo police force, which each applicant had had an opportunity to study for a week previous to his examination, and which were:

1. When may a patrolman leave his post? 2. When and under what circumstances may a patrolman absent himself from duty? 3. What is a felony? 4. What is the duty of a patrolman in regard to houses of disorder and ill fame? 5. Is petit larceny to be regarded as a felony? 6. When is a patrolman empowered to arrest without a warrant? 7. To whom may a patrolman communicate police information or information respecting orders? 8. State three different reasons for which a patrolman may be reprimanded or dismissed from the force. 9. What is a patrolman's duty when requested by an accuser to arrest another person? 10. May a patrolman enter a dwelling-house in pursuit of an offender, and, if so, under what conditions?

To these questions the News opposed the following mighty argument:

"It is certainly a proper thing to instruct a patrolman in regard to his duties, though the more business-like method would be to do so after he has been appointed."

Apparently not satisfied with this argument, the News goes on:

"Now if Mr. Loomis really wishes to put the matter fairly, let him take the examination papers for places in the federal department."

To this Mr. Loomis replies that he knows of no federal questions of the kind mentioned by the News, and suggests that the News publish those upon which it has based its statements. This the News does not do and never will.

THE NEW INDIAN COMMISSIONER.

Indian Commissioner Morgan's talk has a very healthy sound. He says:

"I have never been an active politician, have never solicited or held public office until now. In company with others I asked for the retention of Mr. Oberly as commissioner of Indian affairs."

Having entered upon his duties he proceeded to re-appoint Indian agents who recommended very largely for his approval their present subordinates. He says:

"These approvals are made with the distinct understanding (1) that the parties named are thoroughly competent to fill the positions for which they are nominated, and that they will be zealous and faithful in the performance of their duties; (2) that their tenure of office is permanent so long as they remain competent and efficient; and (3) that the office reserves the right to remove—for cause only—any employe upon sufficient evidence of unfitness for the position held."

He has also re-issued a circular prepared by Commissioner Oberly:

"No superintendent or other school employe shall be suspended by an agent without authority first obtained from the commissioner, except when, in his opinion, the moral welfare or the discipline of the school imperatively demand the immediate suspension of an employe, in which case the agent may suspend such employe and select a competent person to temporarily perform his duties. Every such suspension must be immediately reported by the agent to the commissioner, with a specific statement of his reasons for the action."

Inquiring into the fitness of the present farmers, he says:

It is not the desire of this office to make any unnecessary changes in the force of farmers, nor to unnecessarily disturb those who are competent and faithful. On the other hand, the quality of service rendered is a paramount consideration, and the good of the Indians must be regarded as outweighing any personal interests in favor of the farmers,

He also states that he will appoint no person as a teacher in the Indian schools who would not be able to secure a similar position in the best white schools where he resides.

THE National League of Civil Service Reform Associations will hold its annual meeting in Philadelphia October 1st and 2d. There is a prospect of a large meeting, larger than was ever before held by the League. It is to be hoped that Indiana will have a large representation taken from different sections of the state.

MR. WILLIAM POTTS, secretary of the National League, has compiled the decisions and opinions on the construction of the civil service laws of the United States and of New York, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. The compilation is printed by James B. Lyon, of Albany, and is valuable to students of the subject and to all officers in any manner connected with the administration of civil service laws.

THE Indianapolis Journal says "the appointment of ex-Governor Warmoth as collector at New Orleans probably indicates his purpose to engage again in active politics, and that means republican activity in Louisiana."

If, as the Journal also says, Warmoth is very wealthy, why does he need the bribe of an office to stimulate his flagging energies?

POSTMASTER PAUL of Milwaukee sent in his resignation, and Postmaster-General Wanamaker accepted it, after telling Paul that the administration had determined to remove him. This is a clear snub to republican Congressman Van Schaick, who was backing Paul on the ground that to investigate this post-office without this congressman's permission was an infringement of "prerogative."

POSTMASTER-GENERAL WANAMAKER says that he is tired to death of receiving delegations favoring this or that man for postmaster, and that he is anxious to get down to real business and improve the service. In about six months he has changed about one-fourth of the employes under him. At this rate he will be ready for real business in about a year and a half. His real business for his remaining two years will then consist in trying to keep his new hands as far as possible from wrecking the public business.

—The attorney-general has decided that when three names are certified to an appointing officer, and one is a soldier, the soldier must be appointed, other things being equal. But he also decided that the appointing officer may still judge of the relative capacity and personal fitness of the soldier. Ordinarily a person is entitled to but three certifications, but the President has just approved a rule that each name on the eligible list shall be certified three times exclusive of certifications with the names of soldiers entitled to a preference.

WE have a large class of political leaders, great and small, in Indiana who, under the name of rotation in office, believe in seizing every place of public employment into which they can work a partisan, exactly as the barbarians seized the lands of the Romans and the Gauls. These leaders never tire of eulogizing Thomas Jefferson. He lived a good while ago, and they evidently believe him a safe man to talk about. Their attention is earnestly called to an extract in another column from Jefferson's letter to Madison regarding the four-year-law, which he characterizes as "the late mischievous law, vacating every four years nearly all the executive offices of the government."

SENATOR BLAIR, of New Hampshire, says:

"Civil service reform, forsooth! It is a humbug. Has the government business been advanced since the application of this principle for the filling of offices? Have we heard of any great improvements which have taken place in the direction of public affairs since this competitive system was inaugurated? I defy any one to show me one single instance where benefit has resulted. The law should be blotted from the statute books."

This is a fair instance of the argument by which the opponents of the merit system think they demolish it. Senator Blair had better examine the history of the New York post-office for the last twelve years, or the bureau of engraving and printing while under E. O. Graves, or the Indianapolis post-office while Aquilla Jones was surreptitiously following the system dear to the Blairs.

L. D. LE VAN was appointed postmaster at Wilson, New York. It then appeared that he had been convicted of keeping a disorderly house, and he accordingly was removed. It turns out that the only foundation for the charge was card-playing in his shop when he was not present, and that the charge was brought in spite by one of the players. It is also a fact that Mr. Le Van is a man of good standing in Wilson, and was a creditable appointment. It also turns out that this very mean trick was played upon him by republicans of the Crowley faction, who wanted offices for themselves, and who hunted up the court records and carried the story to Washington as a genuine proof of Mr. Le Van's real character. This is a fine illustration of the anti-Chinese system, and we commend it to the clergymen who will discuss the spoils system on Thanksgiving Day.

THE Boston Herald says that the result of President Harrison's management of the civil service "is to be the perpetuation of the spoils system. * * * President Harrison has settled it. He has fixed his own policy to be that of proscription of all his opponents in office. He has made it impossible for his opponents to have a policy more liberal on their side."

It is well that this hedging for the democrats is begun early. They will have plenty of time to ponder the matter. They will have to decide whether they can get back into office with the understanding that they are to perpetuate the spoils system. An affirmative decision will indicate a belief that the people will ratify the displacement of over 140,000 office-holders by new hands every four years at the dictation of men like Quay, Gorman, Mahone, Vest, Hiscock, Voorhees, Platt and so on.

WANTON REMOVALS.

The danger, then, consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this house, before the senate, for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. * * * Can we suppose a President, elected for four years only, dependent upon the popular voice, impeachable by the legislature, little, if at all, distinguished for wealth, personal talents, or influence from the head of the department himself; I say, will he bid defiance to all these considerations, and wantonly dismiss a meritorious and virtuous officer? Such an abuse of power exceeds my conception. —Congressman James Madison, June, 1789.

—August 17, the President appointed thirty-nine postmasters. One was at the end of a term, twenty-five were upon removal, and thirteen upon resignation, voluntary or forced.

—In the first five months of his term President Harrison has made 13,000 changes in fourth-class postmasters, against 4,000 made by Cleveland in the corresponding time. Harrison has also made 1,059 presidential appointments to President Cleveland's 854.

—Five hundred and sixty-three new postmasters have been appointed in Iowa since Clarkson was made assistant postmaster general, and he publishes their names in his paper, the Des Moines Register. There can be no complaint of the shortness of this measure of his contempt of those who expected his party promises to be kept.

—H. C. Smith, a colored lawyer, by competition secured a place on the eligible list at Nashville, Tenn., and July 22, 1884, was appointed clerk in the office of the sixth auditor of the treasury. He was forced to resign July 14, this year, by Auditor Coulter, the man who said that the horn-blowers should have the places. In answer to Smith, Coulter said: "We want your place. You see the old soldiers are clamoring for places, and we can't put them off any longer."

—Postmaster James A. McKenna, of Long Island City (N. Y.), has been removed after having been in office twenty-eight months. A petition signed by 221 republicans and a large number of others was presented for his retention, and one signed by 410 republicans and all the clergy of the city was ready for presentation. The board of aldermen passed a resolution to the same effect, and the banks and business men generally were opposed to his removal. He had been an unusually good officer, as the facts connected with his office show. No cause for removal was assigned; an inexperienced politician has taken his place.

—President Harrison's postmaster, Godfrey, at New Albany, discharged all of the letter carriers with these words:

"Gentlemen, there are no charges against your official conduct. You have done your work well, performed to my entire satisfaction every duty required. You are gentlemen, and I wish you well and hope you will have success in life; but you know, boys, you are democrats."

To this the Indianapolis News says:

"The New Albany post-office is not under the civil service law, and hence no law was violated by this barbarous deed, but the instincts of fair play, the promptings of common sense, considerations for the public service, and the whole spreading spirit of the time are affronted by such a ruthless act. It is a plea for the extension of the civil service such as President Harrison said he would favor."

THE AMERICAN-DEMOCRATIC ANTI-CHINESE-SYSTEM.

—There are 49 applicants for the collectorship of customs at El Paso, Texas.

—Alderman Gove, of Boston, says: "A candidate's qualifications should be those stated by Zach Chandler—first, is he competent for the place? and, second, is he a d—d good republican?"

—Some fifty republican leaders selected Higgins out of seventeen candidates for postmaster at Fort Wayne and by resolution informed the President. Then some seventy old soldiers met and nominated Dougall. Then some fifty old soldiers met and indorsed Higgins. And thus the "good of the service" is being wrought out.

—The American anti-Chinese system in Brooklyn: It was the duty of Politician Butler to visit the navy yard, find out the vacancies that may be filled, report them to chairman Birkett of the republican general committee, who then made the appointments by selecting persons from the various ward associations. Politician Watkins carried the list of the elect, but, wishing to get in a caulker from his own ward, he asked Butler not to tell Birkett of a vacancy. Butler demurred, and they came to blows, but without decisive result.

—In 1884, Blaine carried Michigan by 3,308, the republicans electing five congressmen and the democrats six. The democrats distributed spoils until 1886, and the republicans then carried the state by 7,432, electing six congressmen and the democrats five. Don Dickenson then gave the democrats the balance of the federal spoils and, in 1888, the republicans carried the state by 22,918, electing nine congressmen to the democrats two.

—Hugh Cullom was in the employ of the city of New York, at two dollars a day, and, as he stated to his grand army post, was twice "assessed" and paid, but the third assessment he refused to pay, and was discharged. He was unable to get work elsewhere, and committed suicide. The New York Times justly says that under the merit system of hiring laborers in force in Massachusetts, Cullom would not have been discharged, and the city of New York would not have been the agent of driving him to kill himself.

—Supervisor George Green of the twenty-second ward, Brooklyn, is insane. The reason given is that "during the last six months he has had his first experience at providing places for the hundreds of men in his ward who placed him in public life. Since Harrison was elected Mr. Green has had no rest. Day and night the place-hunters have flocked to his office or his house, importuning him for his assistance. He was the member of the executive committee of the republican general committee from his ward, and so had to attend meetings almost nightly. A month ago he broke down. It was reported that he had gone away, but he really was kept in close confinement at his home. His physicians held a consultation yesterday and decided that he must go away for six months or he will become violently insane."

Nevertheless the twenty-second ward association does not propose to lose its grip. It "met on Thursday night, and after considering Mr. Green's condition, appointed John Sutton, Henry Bristow, and Major Thomas Bell a committee to look out for the interests of the ward in patronage matters until Mr. Green's successor can be elected."

—Mr. William Barnes of the Albany Journal came over to see the President before he left here for Deer Park, this morning. Mr. Barnes was anxious to settle the muddle which has arisen in the division of federal patronage for Albany. He has succeeded in settling the post-office contest, and it is announced to-night that Col. Werner has been agreed upon as postmaster, and that his appointment will be made early next week. Up to the present time the Barnes and Draper factions have been unable to reach an agreement in the matter of the surveyorship for the Albany district. Mr. Draper is backing for the place his law partner, Alden Chester, while Mr. Barnes desires to secure the position for John M. Bailey, ex-member of congress, ex-collector of internal revenue, and ex consul. The Draper people think that Bailey has enough "exes" before his name, and they say that it is time that some other man had a chance at the patronage trough. It is thought that Chester stands the better chance for appointment. Mr. Clarkson is anxious to get the Syracuse post-office out of the way, but he has not been able to settle the matter yet. The present incumbent is Editor Northrup of the Syracuse Courier. He has a warm personal friend in the person of Congressman Belden, and as his term does not expire for more than a year Mr. Belden does not seem to be in a hurry to recommend his successor. Senator Hiscock wants Mr. Carroll E. Smith of the Journal appointed, and he wants the change made at once. Mr. Clarkson would like to oblige the senator, but as the republican representative is generally recognized where there is one, he finds it difficult to furnish a reason for the appointment of Mr. Smith without Mr. Belden's recommendation. Mr. Smith will be appointed eventually, in all probability, but it is not probable that Senator Hiscock will be able to bring about the change just yet.—Dispatch to New York Times, Aug. 18.

—Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote to a friend as follows:

SALEM, March 5, 1849.

I am informed that there is to be a strong effort among the politicians here to remove me from office, and that my successor is already marked out. I do not think that this ought to be done; for I was not appointed to office as a reward for political services, nor have I acted as a politician since. A large portion of the local democratic party look coldly on me, for not having used the influence of my position to obtain the removal of whigs—which I might have done, but which I in no case did. Neither was my appointment made at the expense of a whig; for my predecessor was appointed by Tyler in his latter days, and called himself a democrat. Nor can any charge of inattention to duty, or other official misconduct, be brought against me; or, if so, I could easily refute it. There is, therefore, no ground for disturbing me, except on the most truer party system. All this, however, will be of little avail with the slang-whangers—the vote disturbers—the Jack Cades who assume to decide upon these matters, after a political triumph.

SALEM, June 8, 1849.

I am turned out of office!

There is no use in lamentation. It now remains to consider what I shall do next. The emoluments of the office have been so moderate that I have not been able to do anything more than support my family, and pay some few debts that I have contracted. If you could do anything in the way of procuring me some stated literary employment, in connection with a newspaper, or as corrector of the press to some printing establishment, etc., it could not come at a better time. Perhaps Epes Sargent, who is a friend of mine, would know of something. I shall not stand upon my dignity; that must take care of itself. Perhaps there may be some subordinate office connected with the Boston Athenæum. Do not think anything too humble to be mentioned to me.

ANSWERING A FOOL ACCORDING TO HIS FOLLY.

Theodore Roosevelt says in the New York Herald:

"The other day I was passing by one of the large Washington hotels and overheard a prominent politician, a member of congress, declaiming in stentorian tones against the civil service law and winding up the speech with the frantic interrogation to his hearers as to what they thought of asking a letter carrier how many rings there were to Saturn. I do not believe in betting and realize thoroughly that a bet is the fool's argument. Nevertheless, there are occasions when it is necessary to 'answer a fool according to his folly,' and I deemed this to be one of them. I could not resist speaking and saying that I had unavoidably overheard what was being said and that I was willing to wager $100 to $10 at that moment that neither the speaker nor any one else could give an instance where a letter carrier had been asked such a question as that about the rings of Saturn. At first the orator vociferously insisted that his statement was perfectly true, though he declined to back it up by betting, even when the odds were raised to twenty to one. Finally he stated that he had said what he did on the authority of a friend whom he knew was well informed, and then further admitted that it was not a letter carrier, perhaps, after all.

"I had almost precisely the same experience when I was last in Indianapolis, where one rather loud-mouthed gentleman insisted that the candidates at the recent examination for the railway mail service had been asked the distance from the earth to Mars. He was only reduced to silence by the same final argument of a bet at any odds he chose to make. These two instances are simply examples of the reckless and persistent untruths that are continually uttered about the civil service examinations."

ANTI-AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

—"It [the four years tenure] saps the constitutional and salutary functions of the President, and introduces a principle of intrigue and corruption which will soon leaven the mass not only of senators, but of citizens. It is more baneful than the attempt, which failed in the beginning of the government, to make all officers irremovable but with the consent of the senate. This places, every four years, all appointments under their power, and even obliges them to act on any one nomination. It will keep in constant excitement all the hungry cormorants of office; render them, as well as those in place, sycophants to their senators; engage these in eternal intrigue to turn out one and put in another, in cabals to swap work, and make of them (i. e., the senators) what all executive directories become, mere sinks of corruption and faction."—Thomas Jefferson to James Madison.

—"My brief experience at Washington has led me often to utter the wish, with an emphasis I do not often use, that I might be forever relieved of any connection with the distribution of public patronage. I covet for myself the free and unpurchased support of my fellow-citizens, and long to be able to give my time and energy solely to those public affairs that legitimately relate to the honorable trusts which you have committed to me."—Senator Benjamin Harrison.

—"The public will never be made to believe that the appointment of a relative is made on the ground of merit alone, uninfluenced by family views; nor can they ever see with approbation offices, the disposal of which they entrust to their presidents for public purposes, divided out as family property."—Thomas Jefferson.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given," and, on breach of this condition, "by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord. The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and there professing that he did become his MAN from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord." Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—Congressman Posey, of the first Indiana district, has appointed Stokes Bennett postmaster at Evansville. Bennett was chairman of the republican county committee.

—E. J. Marsh, editor of the Portland Commercial, has been made postmaster at Portland, Ind., in place of Lourie, removed.

—William Monaghan, chairman of the republican state committee of Ohio, has been appointed consul to Chatham, Ontario.

—Editor Goss, of the Barnstable Patriot, has been made collector of that port.

—Editor John Mahen, of the Muscatine Journal, has been made postmaster at that place.

—Delegate Rentfro, a Harrison man at the last national convention, has been appointed collector of customs at Galveston.

—Charles Hedges has been appointed chief of the postal division of the sixth auditor's office. Salary $2,000 a year. He was the agent of the Associated Press at Indianapolis during the campaign of 1888, and is charged, on good authority, with having used his position unfairly to help the republicans.

—Marion Strong, a negro who can neither read nor write, has been appointed postmaster at Delmar, Alabama.

—It is said that Congressman Gest has appointed such a postmaster at Plymouth, Ill., that it "has already caused a revolt of 150 staunch republicans."

—Congressman Sawyer is reported to have said that he had been offered $1,000 for his influence in behalf of a candidate for the Batavia (N. Y.) post office.

—Sixth-Auditor Coulter, of Ohio, is reported by the Dayton Journal (rep.) as saying:

"I have a list of all the democrats in my office, and every one of them must go before the Ohio election comes off, civil service or no civil service."

—John R. Lynch, colored, fourth auditor of the treasury, has been to Mississippi to preside over a political meeting, and W. B. Gibb, the new postmaster of Jackson, acted as secretary of it.

—The President wanted to appoint W. P. Nixon, editor of the Inter-Ocean, collector of customs at Chicago, but, to his regret, he felt that he could not ignore the congressional recommendations of State Senator Campbell.

—Congressman Cheadle, of Indiana, appointed Frybarger postmaster at Noblesville. The latter did not live in Noblesville, and Cheadle's henchmen in that place rebelled. He, therefore, set aside Frybarger and has appointed Nathan Royer.

—Congressman Delano, of New York, has been hard at work changing post-offices. He says: "There are 190 fourth-class post-offices in my district, and 140 of them are now run by republicans. The others pay so little that there is no demand for a change. I am pretty well satisfied with the administration."

—The postoffice department was to-day notified of the nomination by Congressman Van Schaick of W. A. Nowell to be postmaster at Wilwaukee, vice Paul, resigned. Owing to the absence from the city of President Harrison and Postmaster-General Wanamaker no action will be taken in the case for several days. There is not the slightest doubt, however, of Mr. Nowell's appointment.—Washington Dispatch, August 6.

—Judge Settle, of North Carolina, has a twenty-seven thousand dollar "pull," as follows:

Thomas Settle, son of Judge Settle, solicitor; Tyro Glenn, brother-in-law of Judge Settle, United States marshal; Douglas Settle, son of Judge Settle, cadet at West Point; B. C. Sharpe, son-in-law of Judge Settle, general storekeeper; Oliver H. Docker, brother-in-law of Judge Settle, consul general at Rio de Janeiro; Mrs. Hellen, sister-in-law of Judge Settle, stamp clerk at Winston.

—Congressman Hall (Rep.) of Minnesota denounces the civil service law as "un-American," and says "to the victor belong the spoils," and "the sooner we get rid of the civil service sham the better for all concerned, and any proposition looking to the accomplishment of such an end will receive my hearty support."

—"I have been treated with the utmost courtesy by Mr. Harrison and the heads of the departments. In almost every instance my requests have been complied with, and I have secured more patronage for my district than it ever possessed before. Not only is this the case in my own district, but in other districts, not represented by republicans, my advice in the matter of appointments has been followed almost without exception. What do I think of the civil service law? At the risk of being called a southern republican spoilsman I consider it a transparent fraud. Young men in my district—and it is a district prolific in bright and brainy young fellows—have to travel over two hundred miles to attend a civil service examination. Several have been on the so called eligible list for several years, and will be on it I suppose till the 'last syllable of recorded time' without holding office. I consider the heads of departments just as competent to select their subordinates as a civil service mugwumpian commission. I shall vote for an absolute and unconditional repeal of the law."—Congressman Ewart, of North Carolina.

—Congressman Henderson, of Illinois, removed the postmaster at Woodhull and put his man into the place. The Grand Army post of that town thus recognizes and denounces the power of this office baron:

"WHEREAS, Congressman Thos. J. Henderson, of the Seventh Illinois District, has rejected the application of a worthy and competent soldier for the position of postmaster at Woodhull, Ill., who had the indorsement of the members of this post and other ex-soldiers of the community, * * * and has caused the appointment of a man who was neither a soldier nor the son of a soldier, and no more deserving than many other equally good and capable republicans of this community. * * *

"WHEREAS, To make room for this civilian, he has caused the removal from office of Comrade J. A. Widney of this post, who has been an efficient postmaster, and who, in the administration of the office, has given general satisfaction, etc.

"Resolved, That in the name of 200 patrons of the Woodhull postoffice, including the soldiers, we do most earnestly, not as soldiers only, but as citizens, protest against such action of our congressman, which seems to us to be an unjust discrimination in favor of a civilian."

—The distractions caused in Pennsylvania by the distribution of the federal "spoils,"—or rather the effort to distribute them—are noticed in many directions. The Philadelphia and Allegheny quarrels have been scarcely more earnest than those in several other counties. Thus, in Berks there is a general revolt against the dictation of a Mr. High, who professes to represent the President's authority in that bailiwick; and in Lehigh county a strong protest has been made against two individuals who claim the right to say who shall and who shall not be appointed. In Lancaster county the naming of a collector of internal revenue is "accorded" to Senator Cameron, and he would like to get the job off his hands, but the disputes among his friends over a half-dozen aspirants are so vehement that he hesitates to designate any one. At Reading, a postmaster is to be named, in order to turn a democrat out, but the fight is so bitter that no decision has yet been reached, and factional feeling is rampant. And there are a dozen or so quarrels over smaller post-offices in the close and doubtful seventh congressional district, where the republican member-elect finds the "patronage" a wearing and distracting burden, and may well doubt whether its disposal has not made him more enemies than friends.

Similar instances abound from one end of the state to the other. They illustrate how much injury was done the republican cause, in Pennsylvania, when the President took the amazing step of delivering it over to the control and bestowal of Mr. Quay. That step signified a low level of political action, and it is on a low level indeed that federal affairs in Pennsylvania now stand.—The American, August 17.

—About the first of the month Congressman Brower, a republican of North Carolina, gave out that he would be a candidate for speaker of the house, and that he would be supported by some fellow-members from the south. This would prevent the republicans from organizing the house, and was a startling proposal. Brower gravely asserted that this duty was forced upon him by the fear that otherwise the internal revenue laws would not be repealed. Through his friends, however, he adroitly lets the real reason be known, as follows:

"Mr. Brower makes no concealment of the fact that his ground of complaint against the administration is that he has been ignored in the distribution of federal patronage in his state. There are two internal revenue districts in North Carolina, parts of which are included in his congressional district. He had candidates for both of these offices. All of his recommendations to the collectors themselves were disregarded, and now he says that the deputies appointed by the new collectors are not only opposed to him, but are endeavoring to organize a movement in his congressional district to defeat his renomination. They are, it appears, working for another federal appointee of the Harrison administration."

Now comes the President of the United States, holding in his hand 142,000 offices, the duties of which are paid for by the people, and uses some of them with the following effect, shown by this from the Boston Post of August 5:

BROWER IN HIGH SPIRITS.

Congressman Brower, the revolting North Carolina republican, was in high spirits last night. His slate for the presidential post-offices in his district, announced in the Post of Saturday, was accepted by the President just as it was presented to him by Postmaster-General Wanamaker, and the appointments were announced. Judge Settle's widow is set aside for one of Mr. Brower's friends at Greensboro, and the leading republican worker at Reidsville has to give way to another personal friend of Mr. Brower. At Salem and Winston, also, Mr. Brower's candidates are preferred. In every case the democratic postmaster was removed without fault or cause, except that he stood in the way of a republican deal. What the effect will be upon Mr. Brower's canvass for the speakership remains to be seen, but it is more than likely that, having found "kicking" so profitable, he will continue it for a time at least, with a view of getting something more.

And by this from the Indianapolis Journal:

END OF THE "REVOLT."

WASHINGTON, August 13.—The bottom has dropped out of Congressman John M. Brower's little boom for the speakership, and it is likely that his candidacy will not be heard of again. Mr. Brower's object has been to secure recognition in the appointment of postmasters at Greensboro, Winston and Reidsville, N. C. Within a few days his wishes have been satisfied, and his friends say he is now out of the race for presiding officer of the house.

Thus a modern baron brought the Lord Paramount to time.

HERBERT WELSH ON HOME RULE IN THE INDIAN SERVICE.

From the Boston Transcript.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I rejoice to find that the friends of the Indians in Boston have spoken on the subject of the so-called "home rule" policy of appointment for Indian reservations, and that the press of the city has given such publicity to their protests. I believe that no more dangerous system of appointment could be adopted, and I trust that you will give me the opportunity to point out the danger of this new method by a single illustration.

Mr. Oberly, the ex-Indian commissioner, recently appointed, upon the basis of information obtained from a recognized authority on education, a gentleman and his wife as teachers in the Umatilla School, Oregon. Let it be noted that these persons were republicans. They closed their affairs in Virginia, whence they came, bought their tickets for their distant home across the continent and started on their way, relying upon the good faith of the authorities who had given them their commission. An indignant protest was sent from politicians in Oregon against this violation of the home rule plank in the republican platform, accompanied with the demand that "earpet-baggers" should not be sent into the state. It was claimed by these gentlemen that already Oregonians had been chosen for posts in this school, and that, moreover, they had been notified by the politicians of the state that they were so selected. Upon this protest Secretary Noble cancelled these appointments and virtually admitted the right of these gentlemen to usurp the powers committed to the President by the constitution.

I know of no persons so far who have been appointed to Indian agencies, under the present administration, excepting in accordance with this home rule principle. I know that many Indian agents at least have been so appointed. Let it be clearly understood that this policy discriminates not only against citizens who are not of the Republican party, but discriminates by its very nature against those Republicans who of all others should be appointed to positions on Indian reservations. Experienced, trained and tried men, by the confession of Secretary Noble himself, will be thrown out under this system, and men in many instances selected by territorial politicians will be accepted. Already under this system an agent was appointed at a western agency whose reputation among the Indians and among competent judges of our own people was bad. So obnoxious was this man to the Indians over whom he served that they have come on to Washington to protest against his retention.

An experienced and successful republican who had served seven years at the Rosebud Agency, Dak., was suggested for reappointment at that place by Bishop Hare and myself. His merits were fully admitted by Secretary Noble, but his son, a young and inexperienced man, and whom we have good reason to believe is not suited for such a post, received the appointment upon the ground that he had been seven years a resident of Dakota.

This policy is a distinct announcement upon the part of the administration that it waives the right to select as agents and employes for the civilization of the Indians from the great mass of virtue, intelligence and training in the United States, and that it will adopt the policy of choosing such employes only from a very limited class of people, who by the force of circumstances, are in many instances avowedly hostile to the Indians.

The appointment of a republican school teacher, a man trained and equipped for his work, an abolitionist of former days, who was recommended by such men as Edward Everett Hale and Lyman Abbott, was directed by Commissioner Oberly, as superintendent of the Indian boarding-school at the San Carlos agency, but up to date failed to receive his appointment, presumably for the reason that the Indian school force in Arizona must be selected from Arizona itself, where naturally, and from the force of circumstances, the popular prejudice against the Indians is intense, and where, from the fact that the population is largely engaged in the mining and cattle industries, the number of trained teachers to select from must be at a minimum.

I ask whether this theory, so-called home rule, as applied to the Indian service upon the reservations, is not the reductio ad absurdum of the spoils theory of appointment? And will not these members of the republican party who believe in the application of wisdom and justice to the solution of this problem enter their protest against the continuance of such a theory as this in the management of Indian affairs?

Respectfully,

HERBERT WELSH.

THE THANKSGIVING DAY SERMON.

The People's Cause, published at 330 Pearl street, New York, contains in its August number many replies from clergymen approving the suggestion of Mr. Herbert Welsh that the Thanksgiving sermons this year should be to set forth the moral objections to the spoils system.

This paper is permitted to publish the following:

Believing, as I do, that there is a moral side to this great question of civil service reform, and that it deserves the serious consideration and attention of the American people, it seems to me entirely appropriate as a theme for a national thanksgiving discourse. On Thanksgiving Day matters that concern the present welfare of the people should be discussed and generally are discussed by the pulpit. I therefore heartily approve of the suggestion.

THE ELIGIBLE LIST.

At the examination, held August 6th, for positions in the Indianapolis post-office, out of 130 examined for places as carriers 68 passed; out of 60 examined for places as clerks 37 passed.

The following is the eligible list as it now stands in this office. Those marked with a star were examined in February. A successful contestant retains his place on the list one year. When Postmaster Wallace has a vacancy to fill the local board certifies to him the highest three names and from these he must make his choice. The two not chosen are entitled to two more certifications, but if not then chosen they are no longer on the list. Nothing but the soundest business reason warrants a postmaster in omitting to take the men as they stand on the list. The next regular examination occurs in February, 1890.

POLITICAL DICERS.

Congressman Hall [Rep.], of Minnesota—The sooner we get rid of the civil service sham the better.

Congressman Ewart [Rep.], of North Carolina—I shall vote for an absolute and unconditional repeal of the law.

Congressman Blair [Rep.], of New Hampshire—Civil service reform, forsooth. It is a humbug.

Congressman Ingalls [Rep.], of Kansas—I want to give the men who make my cause their own some of the things we have won.

Congressman Houk [Rep.], of Tennessee—If alive when Congress meets will introduce a bill to repeal it.

Congressman Shearman [Rep.], of New York—To the victors belong the spoils.

Congressman Evans [Rep.], of Tennessee—The civil service law is a humbug.

Congressman Cannon [Rep.], of Illinois—I think it is an infernal nuisance.

Congressman Browne [Rep.], of Indiana—It is a cumbersome piece of political patchwork.

Congressman Perkins [Rep.], of Kansas—The entire system is a farce.

Congressman Taylor [Rep.], of Ohio—The republicans who won the victory in 1888 are out in the cold.

AUGUST 29.—The Pennsylvania Republican Association met in Washington, and Mr. S. R. Stratton, president of the association, spoke as follows:

"The reason why I have referred to our party machinery at all is because I am constantly reminded on the street and elsewhere of the fact that 'we have met the enemy and we are theirs,' that the spoils of victory are in the hands of the enemy to an alarming extent, that the still sow drinks the official swill, and that these still sows are a part and parcel of the democratic herd, bequeathed as a legacy to the republican party by his late eminent highness Grover the first and last. This pork is fat enough to kill, and it ought to be disposed of while the political knife is sharp and the water hot, so as to give place to a few of the lean and hungry republican shoats who have been rooting and digging for the last four years in hopes to get a whack at Uncle Sam's crib before the corn is all gone."

August 28.—The federation of republican clubs of the third Maryland congressional district gave vent to its pent up feelings as follows:

"Resolved, That we, as republicans, pledge ourselves not to support any one for office, either national, state, or city, who is in favor of the present odious civil service or its application in the distribution of public patronage, whereby the majority of appointments are awarded to young men fresh from schools and colleges, while active, intelligent, educated and deserving men of our own party are barred out on account of age or have failed to answer foolish questions not pertinent to the service in which they are seeking employment. We believe that the present civil service law is a relic of European governments, is injurious to party success, and not at all appropriate to a republican form of government, and therefore should be repealed."

Later the Tippecanoe Club of Baltimore thus joined in the cry:

"WHEREAS, Injustice is done to many good and worthy citizens of this state and county by the existence of a law known as the civil service law.

"WHEREAS, Such a law is known to debar men in the prime of life, although capable, from holding office in the service of the government.

"WHEREAS, Questions not pertaining to the qualifications necessary to fill government positions are asked by the civil service examiners, and we doubt if the civil service commissioners could pass the examination now required for a one-thousand-dollar clerkship,

"Resolved, By Tippecanoe Republican Club of Baltimore, that civil service, as now administered, is farcical and a fraud on the people. We believe the party or people aspiring for political honors and advocating civil service will be relegated to private life at all coming elections. The law was conceived by the democratic party during the prosperity of the republican party. We believe it was concocted through jealousy, and not for the benefit of the American citizen who wields the power of the ballot.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to our representatives in congress, and that we urge them to do their utmost to repeal the civil service law."

In Philadelphia, Tuesday evening, Mr. Quay's agent, Martin, who was lately appointed collector of internal revenue, and who has since rapidly organized his office as a partisan machine, appeared as a new assailant of the reformed system. He offered, at the annual meeting of the Anti-Cobden Club, a republican organization, a resolution instructing the club's delegates to the state convention of republican clubs, which will meet in Pittsburg on the 24th instant, to urge the adoption by the convention of a resolution demanding the repeal of the civil service law. The resolution was adopted, and the ball is thus set in motion for a systematic attack upon the law by the united strength of the Pennsylvania republican clubs.—The American [Rep.], September 14.

The latest resolution is from the republican "boys" of the sixth assembly district of New York City, with the original orthography:

"Resolved, That we express through the press our opposition to civil service as it now exists, opposing to the benefit of the political opponents of the republican party."

Let it be once understood that no republican who desires a clerical appointment is to be considered in the distribution of federal clerkships, and the party will disintegrate at once. Not that the ordinary voter is a republican or democrat for office only, but because human nature is so organized that the rewards for party service stimulate to action.—Dayton Journal [Rep.].

Our mugwump contemporaries have been plunged into grief by Assistant Postmaster-General Clarkson's statement that he has scalped 15,000 democratic postmasters up to date. Nevertheless we do not see that their woe has any restraining effect upon the energetic Clarkson. He is too busily engaged in enforcing the wholesome policy of reform.—Philadelphia Press [Rep.].

It (civil service reform) is a sort of reform that nobody is crying for, and if the common people could be given a chance to vote on it in any State in the Union—or in the Union as a whole—it would be snowed under so deeply it would never be heard of again. The people are tired of the sham.—Harrisburg Telegraph [Rep.].

Pennsylvania and Iowa republicans have already refrained from endorsing civil service reform. The fearful abuse that the Pendleton law received at the hands of the Cleveland administration and the asinine performances of young Teddy Roosevelt have filled republicans with disgust. Civil service reform can not command the support of a corporal's guard of republicans in New York, as well as in Pennsylvania and Iowa.—Albany Journal [Rep.].

Fifteen thousand fourth-class postmasters have been removed to date, and Mr. Clarkson remains in Washington with his coat off and his shirt-sleeves rolled up. Go it, Clarkson! Out with the whole 55,000 by Jan. 1. The people voted a change of postmasters last fall. Secure competent men and good republicans; and you can't turn out the democrats too rapidly.—Albany Journal [Rep.].

If Commissioner Roosevelt keeps up that sort of talk much longer, there is danger that he will make somebody believe he means it. He is very much in the position of the frontiersman who aimed his gun to kill if it was a deer and miss if it was a calf. It is all right to make the mugwumps believe him just as Cleveland did; but if he causes the working republicans to put much faith in his pretensions, he may cause the administration to see that it has picked up the poker by the hot end, and something must be dropped.—Binghamton Republican [Rep.].

The Cincinnati Commercial Gazette (Rep.) says, "We are glad to hear it" of a statement that President Harrison is turning out postmasters fifty times as fast as did President Jackson.

The whole thing is a snare and a sham. It is, in theory, obnoxious to the American people. It has in no manner resulted in bettering the government service. Neither political party is honest about its enforcement. The republicans were for it when the democrats were in power. They are not for it now, but the democrats are.—Washington Post [Frank Hatton's paper].

Neither political party cares a continental about this humbug, civil service reform. The genius of our institutions is opposed to the whole scheme, and some day people will find this out. Heretofore the mugwumps have had everything their own way. It is characteristic of the American people, when there is a fad or furor, to take things for granted. Whether through indifference, or laziness, or cowardice, they don't investigate. But the time comes when they consider the reason of things, and when fakirs and imposters are subjected to the inquisition of public scrutiny. The Lymans and Curtises and Schurzcs will not always have full sway for their civil service tomfoolery.—Evansville [Ind.] Journal [Rep.].

It is suspected that during the lifetime of the fifty-first congress there will arise a man to lead, and enough men to follow, to repeal the law (the civil service law) which protects the enemy and hampers the administration.—Burlington Hawkeye [Rep.].

So there will be one bureau (the census bureau) to which competent persons can apply for employment without having to pass an examination on the rings of Saturn, the age of Julius Caesar, or the distance of the moon from the earth.—Iowa State Register [Clarkson's paper].

This is the case exactly. Humbug is the one word that describes it, and repeal is the one practical remedy for it. Not only this, but it is and has been from the start an unpopular humbug. It was brought out by such nice people, and was so nicely stuffed and painted that it had some standing for a while in the circles reserved for professional philanthropists and statesmen, but there has never been a day when ten per cent. of the voters of the country would have approved it at the polls, and it has now become such a bald and rickety affair that it only needs a leader with the courage of his convictions, like Senator Blair, to pass an act in congress which will send it to the scrap-heap. And when it is there, good citizens will wonder how it ever came about that they allowed themselves to be wheedled and bullied into tolerating it so long.—Manchester [N. H.] Mirror [Rep.].

ARE THESE DICERS' OATHS?

Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing, and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions, without practically creating a life tenure of office.—Republican National Platform, 1872.

Under the constitution the President and heads of departments are to make nominations for office; the senate is to advise and consent to appointments, and the house of representatives is to accuse and prosecute faithless officers. The best interest of the public service demands that these distinctions be respected; that senators and representatives who may be judges and accusers should not dictate appointments to office. The invariable rule in appointments should have reference to the honesty, fidelity, and capacity of the appointees, giving to the party in power those places where harmony and vigor of administration require its policy to be represented, but permitting all others to be filled by persons selected with sole reference to the efficiency of the public service, and the right of all citizens to share in the honor of rendering faithful service to the country.—Republican National Platform, 1876.

The republican party, adhering to the principles affirmed by its last national convention of respect for the constitutional rules governing appointments to office, adopts the declaration of President Hayes that the reform of the civil service should be thorough, radical and complete. To this end it demands the co-operation of the legislative with the executive departments of the government, and that congress shall so legislate that fitness, ascertained by proper practical tests, shall admit to the public service.—Republican National Platform, 1880.

The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the objects of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.—Republican National Platform, 1884.

The men who abandoned the republican party in 1884 and continue to adhere to the democratic party have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance, of freedom and purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs, or because their candidate has broken his. We therefore repeat our declaration of 1884, to wit: "The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under the republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectually avoided."—Republican National Platform, 1888.

That we are heartily in favor of such a reform of the civil service as shall make appointments to public office dependent upon fitness and character, and allow removals for cause only.—New Jersey and Maryland Republican Platforms, 1871.

We rejoice at the brightening prospects of a thorough reform of the civil service. For the President's efforts and pledges in this matter, we tender him our cordial thanks, and therein we pledge him an enthusiastic unwavering support.—Connecticut Republican Platform, 1872.

We are in favor of the adoption of a thorough system of civil service reform, and we indorse heartily the action of President Grant in selecting commissioners under the action of the recent so-called civil service act.—Ohio Republican Platform, 1871.

That we indorse * * his recommendations of * * civil service reform, and prompt execution of the power conferred by congress to inaugurate this reform.—Georgia Republican Platform, 1872.

The republican party * * is the only party that questioned the dogma that "to the victors belong the spoils of the vanquished," and endeavored to introduce reforms of in the civil service, so that honesty, capacity, and faithful attention to official duties might be a better recommendation to office than partisan service, and whose President has proclaimed this new rule of action to the nation.—Illinois Republican Platform, 1872.

The administration of President Grant, as illustrated by his * * efforts to reform the civil service and purify the same * * [entitle] it to the confidence and support of every patriot.—Minnesota Republican Platform, 1872.

It [the administration] has inaugurated and made zealous endeavors to secure a practical and efficient civil service reform.—Missouri Republican Platform, 1872.

We are heartily in favor of such a reformation in the civil service that good character and ability shall be the chief recommendations to office, and not political service rendered or to be rendered.—New Jersey Republican Platform, 1872.

That the success of the present national administration in * * reforming and improving the civil service * * has been such as to command the approbation of the great majority of the American people, and justly entitle it the confidence and commendation of every true republican.—New Hampshire Republican Platform, 1872.

That the civil service ought to be reformed. * * And in his [the President's] efforts to reform the civil service we recognize a laudable desire to promote its efficiency and purity.—New York Republican Platform, 1872.

We favor * * civil service reform as proposed by the President.—West Virginia Republican Platform, 1872.

That good administration and freedom from temptation to official dishonesty can be best secured by such an organization of the civil service as shall insure a competent body of civil officers, who shall be undisturbed by the changes and temptations of active politics.—Connecticut Republican Platform, 1874.

In conducting the civil service, officers should be selected because of their qualification, integrity and moral character, and the patronage of the government should be so disposed in the matter of faithfulness and economy that it shall not be brought in conflict with the freedom of elections.—Indiana Republican Platform, 1876.

The republicans of Ohio re-affirm their unfaltering confidence in Rutherford B. Hayes as a statesman, patriot and republican, and cordially approve and support his efforts for the * * establishment of its civil service upon a basis of purity and efficiency.—Ohio Republican Platform, 1877.

That the work of reforming and improving the civil service, which the republican party has undertaken, and to which it alone stands committed, ought to be persistently and resolutely carried forward. We fully indorse the utterances of the Cincinnati platform, and of the letter of acceptance of President Hayes on this subject, that nominations to office ought to be made upon the sole responsibility of the executive department, without the dictation or control of members of congress; that honesty, capacity and fidelity constitute the only claim and qualification for office; that partisan service should not be expected or desired from public officers, who should give their whole service to the government and the people, and that the term of office should depend upon untarnished personal character and the satisfactory performance of official duties, and not upon political changes; and we cordially sustain and approve the policy and action of the President in conducting his administration in fulfillment of his distinct pledge upon these principles. Recognizing that the work of correcting the abuses that have crept into the civil service is only begun, and that much remains to be accomplished in Massachusetts as well as elsewhere, in order to show convincingly that the principle of civil service reform is accepted as an enduring principle, and not a temporary method of administration, we call upon all departments of the government to give the President their cordial and effective support in making the reform thorough, radical and complete. That the order promulgated by the President for the purpose of restraining the executive officers of the government from exercising an undue and improper influence upon the action of the people in the selection of candidates for office, and in the management of political affairs, it is in accordance with the principle and practices established by the founders of the government. We heartily endorse the order as the first and most important step toward a practical reform of the civil service, and we assure the President of our cordial support in its enforcement.—Massachusetts Republican Platform, 1877.

No official or office-holder should be subject to political or partisan assessment, or to interference in any way with his political rights or action, and plain laws should forbid and punish all attempts to make or enforce such assessments or to control or to abridge in any respect the absolute freedom in political action which in this country belongs to all voters alike. In connection with this subject we recur with satisfaction to that portion of the letter of acceptance of Mr. Hayes wherein he declares that the founders of our government meant that the officer should be secure in his tenure as long as his personal character remained untarnished and the performance of his duty satisfactory. In furtherance of this view we commend as worthy of consideration legislation making officers secure in a limited fixed tenure, and subject to removal only as officers under state laws are removable in this state, and charges to be regularly and openly preferred and adjudged.—New York Republican Platform, 1877.

We demand a just and wholesome reform of the civil service as against the democratic "spoils" system.—Delaware Republican Platform, 1882.

Such a practical reform of the civil service as shall relieve the executive from the pressure of hordes of office-seekers as shall, by providing some intelligent method for appointments to office, enable our representatives in this branch of the national congress to turn their attention to matters of national concern.—Illinois Republican Platform, 1882.

The California republican platform, 1884, demands civil service reform.

The republican party inaugurated civil service reform and enacted the present civil service law. It will faithfully maintain it and cheerfully aid in any needed amendments to give it full force.—Iowa Republican Platform, 1884.

The Minnesota republican platform, 1884, rejoices at the improvements in the civil service under the present law, as now administered, and insists on its continuance in the nation and its extension to the states and cities.

We give to the civil service act passed by a republican congress our hearty and continued approval, and in accordance with our last national platform we demand the extension of the principles of that act to all the business offices of the government, and the repeal of the four-years' tenure law.—Massachusetts Republican Platform, 1885.

We condemn the hypocrisy of the democratic party in pledging itself, before election, to civil service reform, and after election denouncing, through its press and its leaders, the civil service act as unconstitutional, while the national administration removes tried and faithful public servants and replaces them with persons whose only recommendation is active, and in some instances, disreputable political work. We denounce the hypocritical pretenses under which faithful republican officers are removed on the plea of offensive partisanship, while such men as Higgins, Thomas, Throop, Chase, Pillsbury, Aquilla Jones, and others, some of whose names appear upon the prison records of the country, and whose recommendation is political partisanship, are appointed in their places. While removing elsewhere on the ground of offensive partisanship republicans who edit newspapers, the national administration continues in a high judicial office in the city of New York a prominent democratic appointee who publicly announced himself as having assumed, since his appointment, the control of an avowedly partisan journal. We believe it is the duty of the republican majority of the senate to oppose the confirmation of any person appointed in violation of the letter and spirit of the civil service act.—New York Republican Platform, 1885.

We favor a thorough and honest enforcement of the civil service law, and the extension of its principles to the state administration whenever it can be made practicable, to the end that the corruption and flagrant abuses that exist in the mismanagement of our public institutions may be done away with, and they be liberated from partisan control.—Indiana Republican Platform, 1886.

It [the democratic administration] promised civil service reform, but has made that phrase odious by not only removing but attempting to blacken the characters of thousands of our best citizens, many of them old soldiers, who have been removed from official positions upon the cowardly subterfuge of "offensive partisanship."—Ohio Republican Platform, 1886.

No purpose [with the democratic party] to promote a practical civil service reform. * * While conspicuous among the many short-comings of this administration are numberless appointees who have proved faithless and incompetent; the postal service disorganized, and its efficiency impaired, and the public business in other departments delayed and obstructed. * * The principle of the national and state civil service reform laws has our hearty approval. These laws should be executed in the spirit in which they were enacted and accepted by the people, and be advanced and made permanent.—New York Republican Platform, 1887.

That we unequivocally condemn the use of patronage to promote personal political ends, and require that all offices bestowed within the party shall be upon the sole basis of fitness. That competent and faithful officers should not be removed except for cause. That the non-elective minor offices should be filled in accordance with rules established by law. That the ascertained popular will shall be faithfully carried out in state and national conventions and by those holding office by the favor of the party. That public office constitutes a high trust to be administered solely for the people whose interests shall be paramount to those of persons and parties, and that it should be invariably conducted with the same efficiency, economy and integrity as are expected in the execution of private trusts.—Pennsylvania Republican Platform, 1882.

We commend every effort to inaugurate thorough and correct civil service reform in all the departments of the national and state administrations.—Pennsylvania Republican Platform, 1883.

We commend every effort to sustain and promote thorough civil service reform in all departments of the national and state governments.—Pennsylvania Republican Platform, 1884.

We at the same time invite public attention to the acts of the present democratic national and state administrations; to the unjust war of the former upon offensive partisans; to the hypocritical avoidance of pledges touching the civil service; to its star-chamber proceedings against republicans, for whose removal no public reason can be given.—Pennsylvania Republican Platform, 1885.

We arraign the democratic party and the present national administration for the general imbecility in dealing with all great national questions. The only energy they have exhibited has been in the displacement of experienced officers without cause and in direct violation of their civil service pledges. The national administration seems to have no policy beyond expediency and no principle beyond the establishment of its succession.—Pennsylvania Republican Platform, 1887.

We as a party, as rapidly as practicable, enacted legislation looking to a pure business administration of government and a system of civil service in deference to a strong recognized public sentiment against abuses of the spoils system. A democratic President was elected largely on the issue of civil service reform, upon pledges which guaranteed an immediate remedy of existing abuses. These pledges have been notoriously violated, removals from office have been made without cause in a more sweeping manner than at any other period in our history of American political parties, and federal patronage has been boldly and constantly used for partisan purposes.—Pennsylvania Republican Platform, 1888.

THE annual meeting of the National League of Civil Service Reform Associations will take place as announced, in Philadelphia, October 1 and 2. Any member of the Indiana Association if present is entitled to take part in the meeting.

THE new postmaster at Albany, N. Y., Gen. Warner, is a friend of the civil service law; and, as he is also no coward, the law will be enforced. We are glad to see even one friend of the law put at the head of an office.

By the courtesy of the civil service commission the questions used in the examination for clerks and carriers, held here August 6, together with the rules upon which the answers were marked, are published in this number. Now is the time to single out the questions calling for the distance of Mars from the sun.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE may with propriety call attention to the history of the dismissal of Mr. Webster from the head of the fire department, published in its April number. The coming city election is the proper time to consider such matters and give them their due weight. There is no question as to where the responsibility for this outrage upon the taxpayers and upon a faithful officer belongs.

IN view of the wild talk now being indulged in by prominent republican leaders and papers against the civil service law, we have thought it best to publish a reminder in the shape of some portion of the promises made in platforms of that party. It would be interesting if some enterprising reporter would ask Ingalls, for instance, the exact status of these promises which being in national platforms, are, prima facie, binding upon him. He is a ready and willing talker, and curious people would be glad to know his opinion.

COLLECTOR CRAVENS, who said that before any one should work for the people under him, he must not only have always voted the republican ticket, but he must have been an active party worker, writes to the papers to say that, up to August 23, he had found work for forty-four men. This means that he had turned forty-four men out of employment for no reason but to make places for forty-four active republican party workers. Will President Harrison say that the party platform and his letter of acceptance have in this case been carried out? If they have not, will he punish Cravens? The latter has some eight or ten more places.

THE St. Louis Republic knows how to fight the battle of good administration. It is rendering a valuable service to the country in putting its hand heavily upon the exact evils with which administration is now corrupted. The practices in Missouri growing out of the infamous rule of letting defeated or elected candidates for congress distribute offices may be cited as an example. The facts connected with these practices the Republic brings out with merciless precision. There is the greatest need for a paper to do the same work in Virginia.

It is stated that the late Commissioner of Pensions Tanner asked a passing visitor "if he wanted to see the wheels go round." Thereupon he proceeded to the details of an official decapitation. Such devilish enjoyment in inflicting suffering seemed hardly credible, but later reports appear to confirm the account. Now his own decapitation has come, and though deserved, it is painful to think of the pain and disappointment he has brought upon himself and his family. His salary was $5,000, his pension $864, his daughter as clerk got $1,800; his allowances for coachman, horses, and the like, were estimated at about $1,200 more. Yet this man could exult in wilfully depriving a clerk of a chance for a living.

A FEW days since Secretary Windom had to appoint a chief of the miscellaneous division of his office. The appointment lay between the acting chief, who would thereby be promoted, and an outsider. The sole objection to the acting chief was that he "had lost his political identity." That means that he had attended to his duties instead of neglecting them to become a party worker in Iowa, where his home was. He was simply competent and had earned promotion from the ranks as a soldier earns it, by doing his work well. Secretary Windom is reported to have said: "This is a republican administration, and, all things being equal, we want active republicans to fill the offices." He appointed S. N. Hartshorn, who had "been a local leader in Ohio politics, and had been of great service to Major McKinley in conventions and campaigns."

GENERAL JOHN POPE has emerged from the involuntary oblivion into which General Lee sent him twenty-seven years ago, to make, in the last North American Review, the original suggestion that congressmen in their respective territories should be allowed to appoint the federal office-holders. He also lays down the principle that the successful issue of a method of administration in a foreign country is conclusive proof that that plan would not work here. It must be true, then, that the main principles of the constitution, having been taken from the English constitution, ought to be expunged. It might be well for General Pope to read something of modern administrative literature. He would learn that in Massachusetts and New York there is a competitive system in highly successful operation, and that such a system has become firmly rooted in the federal service.

FRANK HATTON, a pretended republican and-ex office-holder, and now editor of the Washington Post, has been occupying himself lately with trying to induce his party and the President and cabinet to break the long list of their pledges for the reform of the civil service; but especially has he devoted himself to the abuse of Mr. Roosevelt. Hatton's last exploit was to print a fac-simile of the civil service commissioner's handwriting and inquire to what clerkship he would succeed had he to pass an examination. Mr. Roosevelt has not applied for any position as policeman, or tea inspector, or engineer, or gardener, or boiler inspector, or foremanship of sewers, or stenographer, or copyist, or clerk, or carrier. If he had, he would expect to subject himself to a test for the position desired. What he has undertaken is the test of answering spoilsmen like Frank Hatton, of holding up the law to a lot of bullying congressmen, and of looking into the acts of certain public officials, who are trying secretly to break the law and their official oaths. It is the general opinion that he is passing an excellent examination and will be marked high.

NAVAL OFFICER BURT.

The removal of Naval Officer Burt is such as to very nearly indicate that the President means to insult the reform sentiment of the country and the men who originated and have struggled to maintain the reform system. Col. Burt has been twenty years in the public service. He was formerly in the naval office in New York, and was removed by President Arthur to make room for a politician, but was restored by President Cleveland. He has always been a friend of the merit system, and employed that system before it was embodied in the civil service law. His office was a perpetual and complete proof that the system was the best that has yet been devised to govern the employment of public servants. He, like Pearson and Graves, was its fearless and outspoken friend against all comers. Beyond this, Col. Burt was a trained officer, skilled in the complicated duties of his office, with executive ability of a high order, entirely conscientious in the performance of his duty, and knowing no party in connection with his office. How he voted we do not know. He had a right to vote as he wanted to, and the people had a right to his services.

Now, before the end of his term, he is dismissed by President Harrison, and the first information he receives of his dismissal is when he reads it in the morning paper. His efficiency and honesty challenge criticism. In what other employment in the world would a man with twenty years faithful service behind him be treated like a delinquent or a public enemy? The manner of his dismissal looks like the gratification of a petty spite against the men who do not choose to bow their necks to Platt.

Three officers, Pearson, Graves, and Burt, had won a national reputation by the success with which they applied the merit system. All of these, President Harrison has now forced out of place and he has succeeded them with men who knew nothing of the working of the law and who have never been known as its friends. He was in not the least governed by business principles; the new men will not in years be as good as the old. These changes were made because men of the stripe of Platt, the worst public enemies this country has, ordered it. It is an additional proof that President Harrison is working along certain set lines. He has undoubtedly given heads of offices within the civil service law to understand that the law must be enforced. Beyond this he evidently expects to control the country through sub-distributors of the hundred thousand unclassified offices. If a state produces a dozen office-barons, as in Missouri, he will unite with them, but where one man like Platt in New York, Quay in Pennsylvania, or Mahone in Virginia has got his heel on the necks of all the rest, President Harrison will boldly and before all the country unite with him to the end that by a joint use of the public offices, they may control elections. It was supposed that the republicans had learned their lesson and would never again try to rule the country by bosses. To see the resurrection by President Harrison of men like Platt, Warmouth and Mahone is a surprising and humiliating spectacle.

THE ATTEMPT TO SUBJUGATE VIRGINIA TO MAHONE.

The present Mahone movement in Virginia can not be too carefully studied, nor can the causes which keep it going be too carefully marked. During his term as a senator, Mahone was a nonentity, except that he developed a ravenous and vindictive appetite for spoil. He ruled the distribution of offices in Virginia. Other republican leaders did not like to be ruled, and a strong opposition developed, led by Wise, Post, Brady, Carver, Groner, and others. The quarrel was carried to the Chicago convention, where Mahone was beaten. Since President Harrison was inaugurated each faction has importuned him in turn, and when his opponents went Mahone stood on the corner and jeered. Later an attempt was made to bring about a compromise, and Quay, Clarkson and Dudley, of the national committee, managed the negotiations. This was a crowd congenial to Mahone, and over their signatures they announced that peace had been made. The five-thousand dollar Norfolk collectorship was given to James D. Brady, a very active Mahone opponent, and he "heartily concurred" in the peace. Mahone held his state convention, and never was a convention held that more servilely waited to learn the will of one man and then do it. Mahone had himself nominated for governor. John M. Langston, a negro, who was a republican candidate for congress in 1888, and whom Mahone caused to be defeated, has published a letter announcing his surrender. His reward will appear later. Perhaps Mahone will have the House seat him. Beyond those actually bought, the compromise seems not to have reached, and some could not be bought. C. A. Heermans, having been offered a district attorneyship, wrote:

"From the public prints and from private sources I learn that this appointment and its confirmation was and is at the sufferance of William Mahone.

"There is an irrepressible conflict in the republican party of Virginia that must be settled before I accept office under such conditions, nor should any patriotic republican accept such at the expense of his manhood. Home rule vs. centralized power, the people vs. bossism, liberty vs. tyranny—these are questions not only of vital importance to the republican party of Virginia, but to the whole people. Whenever a party so far forgets itself as to sacrifice its principles for a mess of pottage—whenever it sacrifices the will of the people to a personal tyrant—whenever it surrenders the rights of the people to one man, then it becomes the duty of the masses to rebuke the men who forget they are servants and assume the role of masters.”

The Valley Virginian, the leading republican paper of Virginia, also says:

“We do not question the sincerity of the New York Tribune in its appeal to the republicans of Virginia to support Mahone. Were its premise correct there would be some force in its appeal. But when it assumes that he represents “civil liberty,” and that in the “preliminaries to the present convention he made concessions,” our able cotemporary is resting under a delusion. Mahone represents nothing but the most odious phase of machine politics—of boss despotism. His concessions are on the surface. In the practical work of the preliminaries the old vindictive methods were used more relentlessly than ever before. For this reason those who did not believe in those methods refrained from participating in the primaries or the convention, reserving to themselves the right to be felt where the machine can not work—at the ballot box.

“We would suggest to the republican press of the north to keep their hands out of this contest in Virginia. They know nothing about the internal workings of Mahone’s machine. If they did they would not have a word of protest to enter against those republicans who do not mean to be governed by it. It is a fight against the most cruel and relentless political despotism ever known in this country. It is a struggle to emancipate the party from the clutch of the most unreasonable and selfish leader that was ever entrusted with power. It is a contest to break the force of an influence, which, if successful, will wreck the republican party of the country—an influence that has been condemned by the republican voters of the nation whenever called to pass upon it—an influence that came near breaking up the Chicago convention in 1880; which nerved the arm of a lunatic to slay a president—which defeated the republican party in 1884, and which was repudiated by the party in the nomination of Harrison, as well as by the republicans of New York and Pennsylvania in 1882.”

The success of Mahone at the coming election means the subjugation of Virginia to him and the delivery of another state into the grip of a boss. President Harrison has turned over to Mahone the Virginia “patronage.” The whole scheme is a piece of political morality worthy of Italy in the middle ages.

THE PUBLICITY OF THE ELIGIBLE LISTS.

Ex-Commissioner Oberly has published the opinion that making the eligible lists public is the end of the competitive system. This is a strange conclusion. Under the rule of secret eligible lists, the Baltimore post-office, within forty miles of the office of the civil service commission, and employing several hundred men, got out all but less than twenty-five and got democrats into their places. When Postmaster Brown succeeded Postmaster Veasy, he turned out some two hundred of these democrats and put a like number of other democrats into their places. The Baltimore custom house performed a similar feat. In Philadelphia Harrity turned the old employes out of the post-office by hundreds, and not only were democrats worked into their places, but the rule of ward apportionment and giving places to ward workers worked smoothly. In Indianapolis for four years democrats only were appointed, until just before the expiration of the late postmaster’s term when two or three republicans were put in. The advantages of a secret list have found a late illustration in the Milwaukee post-office. We hazard the statement that the offices where the eligible list has been kept from the knowledge of the appointing officer are exceedingly rare.

The appointing officer and the party managers knew how the list stood, but the people did not know. The pressure that Mr. Oberly so so fears did its secret and effectual work unchecked by public opinion. As an influential Indianapolis politician who had one son in the post office and wanted to get a second into his place remarked, “We watched the list until the second could be certified and then had the first one resign and the second one appointed in his place.”

Now the eligible list is printed in all the papers. Anything like a public competition has for thousands of years been a matter of public interest, and it is so in this case. Every appointment made is noted in the public press together with his position on the list. Doubtless “pressure” tries its hand, but public opinion will not permit it to avail. It will not be long before no appointing officer will dare to commit an injustice. Instead of being a damage to the competitive feature, making the lists public is the most beneficial step that has ever been taken in the administration of the law. It will bring members of all parties to the competition, and will drive out favoritism in making appointments. Still more publicity is needed. The examination papers should be open to public inspection, and the practice of requiring certificates of character ought to be resumed, but the names of the persons who certify should be accessible to the public.

IN the summer of 1888 Corporal Tanner stopped at Indianapolis on his way to take part in a campaign in some state farther west. He made a speech here, and so impressed the republican managers with his value as a campaign speaker that they urged every argument to induce him to remain in Indiana. Tanner steadily refused under plea of his prior engagement, and it was not until General Harrison personally requested it that he consented to remain. He made many speeches in the state. There is no doubt but that Tanner rendered President Harrison a real service in aiding to unite the soldiers against President Cleveland. President Harrison understood this and paid Tanner for it with the pension office. He was utterly unfitted for the place. This must have impressed itself upon any one taking the proper steps to find out about a man whose appointment to office is contemplated. He has had to be forced out, and he must therefore have done serious damage. President Harrison is entitled to the melancholy credit of compelling Tanner to leave after his remaining had become a scandal. The irrepressible inquiry again comes up, How long are the offices to be used to pay personal and party debts?

THE Indianapolis Journal of August 15, has an interesting notice of the Dean Pump Works of this city. These works were founded and built up to their present large size by five brothers, themselves skilled workmen. The proprietors take great pride in their workmen. One of them, pointing to a long line of men said: “Nearly every man there owns the house he lives in.” Then the Journal goes on:

“There is a system of advancement in the Dean establishment. A boy who comes in to learn the trade, is given every opportunity to do so, and his success lies in his own hands. If he is capable and can keep up with the procession there is advancement for him. If he is not capable he is dropped.”

It is hard to see why rotation in offices should not be applied to these works, and why if the democrats carry the coming city election the Deans should not weed out all the republicans and put none but democrats on guard, and why Markey and one or two other south-side democrats should not control this patronage.

Collector Cravens, with the fifty odd gaugers, weighers and clerks under him, has about completed a similar work and it is impossible to say, if it is good for the internal revenue office it would be bad for the Dean establishment.

The reinstated republican railway mail clerks are reported as saying that the incompetence of the democratic incumbents is the cause of the complaints of the inefficiency of the service, and that they should “go.” If this is true, these republican clerks are using the same tricks to force men out of the service because of political opinions that were used against them. If we follow the line of argument of the Boston Herald, the fact that fellow-workmen four years ago by underhanded methods forced republicans out in large numbers, would make it impossible for them to do otherwise with the democrats; all the same, such talk comes with bad grace from men who could themselves never have got back into the service except with some congressman’s collar about their necks, had there not been a steady protest against their political proscription. The deranged condition of the mail service in certain sections of the country is because there has not yet been time to rally from the recent republican loot and to recover the efficiency it had gained since the preceding democratic loot. Congressmen injected their untrained men in great numbers into the service, and former employes were reinstated, good and bad, regardless of their records. Democratic incumbents were dismissed in the same manner. There are incompetent men in the service, doubtless, but they are not confined to one party.

CONGRESSMAN FLOOD of the Elmira [N. Y.] district, and Corporal Tanner had a serious difference regarding the spoil of the pension board, and Corporal Tanner felt obliged to describe that Congressman's mental equipment as follows:

"When Congressman Flood first came into my office my impression of him was that if his brains were blown through a crane's bill into a mosquito's eye the mosquito wouldn't wink. Flood got two of his friends appointed on the medical board, and I don't suppose he is a bit thankful."

Mr. Flood is reported to have visited Deer Park and threatened the President with his resignation if the commissioner were not dismissed. Flood appears to be a doughty chieftain with a firm grasp on the spoil in his domain. Boss Platt and Principal Henchman J. Sloat Fassett undertook to name the postmaster for Elmira, but Flood, when the President hesitated, threatened to resign if he were not permitted to name his own postmaster. Then he proceeded to appoint his brother to the place.

THE first experiment of the administration in using the offices to affect southern elections was in the third Louisiana district. It has come to a disastrous and therefore for the country a happy end. The democrats elected the congressman by 5,000 majority; this was nearly double their previous majority.

THE administration has removed Sharpe, the postmaster at Lead Hill, Ark., and Congressman Quackenbush's man, Stevens, postmaster at Shushan, N. Y., whose careers we noted in July. This would seem to indicate that the balance of the list will be reached—Bagby, McFarlane, Vandervoort, and so on.

WANTON REMOVALS.

The danger, then, consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this house, before the senate, for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. * * * Can we suppose a President, elected for four years only, dependent upon the popular voice, impeachable by the legislature, little, if at all, distinguished for wealth, personal talents, or influence from the head of the department himself; I say, will he bid defiance to all these considerations, and wantonly dismiss a meritorious and virtuous officer? Such an abuse of power exceeds my conception. —Congressman James Madison, June, 1789.

—SEPTEMBER 2.—Corporal Tanner removed fifty-nine democratic medical examiners and appointed republicans.

—August 31 twenty-seven presidential postmasters were appointed; of these, seventeen were removed, presumably because they were democrats.

—The New York Cotton Exchange have petitioned the President to take a business view of the matter and to retain the competent consul, F. F. Dufals, at Havre.

—The President has removed Postmaster W. R. Curran, of Hoboken, whose four years would have expired Aug. 1, 1890. There seems to have been no reason whatever for the removal except to make place for a republican politician. His office ranked high and had shown great improvement under him. There was no complaint. His place had been fought over for months by three factions, and when at last these became harmonized the spoil was thrown to them.

—Three separate petitions, from the shipmasters who visit the port of Rio de Janeiro, from the American residents and from the merchants who have trade relations with the United States, were sent to the President asking for the retention of Consul-General Armstrong, but he was removed. The Rio News, published at Rio de Janeiro, says:

"Were such a thing to be done in private life, it would be condemned in unmeasured terms; but when done by a partisan government in whose eyes good service and efficiency, the risk of life and health, all count for nothing, and in whose creed the public offices of the nation are looked upon as the legitimate spoils of a party, it must forsooth be permitted without a murmur. We have read much in some of our exchanges of the religious character of the President and of the high purposes of his government; if this one act is a fair sample of these, then perhaps something less pretentious will do just as well."

—Clarkson appeared in the matter of the Cannelton, Indiana, post-office as a very brazen and awkward prevaricator. He made a similar unfortunate appearance when he attempted to explain the dismissal of Mr. McKenna, postmaster at Long Island City, noted last month. According to the New York Tribune dispatch he stated that one or two anonymous letters protesting against the removal had been received, but nothing that could be traced to a definite source. Charles Benner, a republican and corporation attorney, April 4 and June 19, sent letters to the President protesting, and received acknowledgments from the President's private secretary stating they had been handed to the postmaster-general. The letter of June 19 contained a petition for McKenna's retention, signed by 221 republicans, 59 democrats, 16 independents, 90 whose politics were not stated, and 5 prohibitionists. The letter also stated that other petitions were in circulation. June 11, Bishop Southgate, June 13, Mr. Cooper, rector of the Church of the Redeemer, and June 26, Mr. Geddes, pastor of the Presbyterian church, wrote letters protesting against the removal of this faithful public servant. Meanwhile it is asked that Richenstein's appointment be reconsidered on the ground of unfitness, and petitions bearing over 1,500 signatures have been drawn up asking Mr. McKenna's retention.

—P. C. MacCourt, of the liquidating division in the New York custom house, received notice of his dismissal by Secretary Windom, no cause being stated. He thereupon appealed to the President in the following letter:

"As an Irish-American citizen—the race to which you owe your election in this city and state—I appeal to you as the executive of the nation to protect me under the civil service law from arbitrary dismissal by your secretary of the treasury. Yesterday Mr. Windom sent me a printed form dismissing me from the treasury department, I being classified under the civil service, and therefore, I submit, not to be dismissed without cause.

"I have been for four years an employe of the United States government, two of these years doing clerical work at $70 per month in the assessment division, revenue department, for which my republican friends doing clerical work, received double the salary. In this office there were twenty-six clerks, I being the one democratic appointee, and during the two years not one of those twenty-five republicans was removed under Mr. Cleveland's administration.

"I therefore appeal to you, Mr. President, as the head executive of the government, to protect me in my rights, and to request your secretary to have me placed on the roll of this custom house, where I have been in the liquidating division for the last nine months, and refer to my record as to how I have discharged my duty."

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

"Large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering generals to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers. * * The condition of holding the lands thus given was that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given," and, on breach of this condition, "by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting his lord in battle," the lands reverted to the lord. The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sat before him, and there professing that he did become his MAN from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord." Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—Congressman Hawk [Tenn.] still breathes threatenings against the civil service law, and he says, if alive when congress meets, he will introduce a bill to repeal it.

—They don't want to remove anybody in some of the departments for purely political reasons. I have no time for this pandering to a lot of political dudes and mugwumps. Thank goodness, we have none of that breed down our way. —Congressman Darlington [Penn.].

—We are pretty well satisfied with the administration. Take New York in comparison with the other states and we have not much to complain of as to appointments. The presidential post offices come slow, but matters appear all right. I have in my district not a fourth-class postoffice worth $200 a year—not an office that anyone wants—that had not been filled under Mr. Cleveland's administration. The first fourth-class post-office filled in my district was filled on July 30th. On July 30th of this year every one of these offices I had a candidate for—all above $200 per year—was filled. I believe in civil service reform within the party and not out of it. In other words, "to the victors belong the spoils." In making appointments, however, such victors should be chosen as are most competent to fill the offices.—Congressman Shearman [N. Y.].

—"It (the civil service law) is a humbug. It ought to be materially modified or repealed. I couldn't pass a civil service examination to-day. It is wrong in principle. I don't want anyone to tell whom I may employ in my business. When I hire a man I want to see his face. I don't care whether or not he knows the distance from Mars to the sun. I want to know if he can do the work I want done. The way to find out is to put him at it, and if he can't do it put him aside."—Congressman Evans [Tenn.].

—Congressman Thompson (O.) says that Ohio republicans in the departments at Washington must go home and vote. The state committee has a full list, and all who fail will be "remembered."

—Senator Plumb says that there have been four times as many changes made in the post-offices in Kansas by President Harrison as were made by President Cleveland in the same length of time, and that in his congressional district there is not a democratic postmaster left.

—What may be seen in the state at large may be met with in less degree in our own county. The bright young man who attempts to get a foothold in political life without selling himself body and soul to the political boss finds his way exceedingly difficult and well nigh inaccessible.—The Kennett Advance [Rep., Chester Co., Pa.].

—DEER PARK, MD., Aug. 28.—Clarkson spent the day with the President. Congressman Owen called. Thirty postmasters were appointed.

—WASHINGTON, Sept. 14.—Representative Cheadle was on the train which carried the President to Deer Park this morning. Mr. Cheadle is expected to return here the first of next week. It is probable that he is working for some offices for constituents, who, he says, have not been taken care of as he would like.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

—In 1888 Joseph D. Upton was the republican candidate for congress in the sixth Missouri district, and was, of course, defeated. In the gradual development of our American feudalism, however, defeated and successful candidates have come to share the spoil. In the exercise of his "prerogative" as congressman, Van Schaick calls it, Defeated Candidate Upton has been dividing the offices in his district among his henchmen. He has 234 post-offices alone. He has proceeded in a business-like way, as the following affidavits show. They were taken in Henry county, Mo., August 28, 1889, and the affiants seem to be entirely reliable and financially responsible. This is secondary evidence, but under all the circumstances it commands belief:

Personally appeared before me, James D. Lindsay, a notary public in and for said Henry county, J. L. Shelton, who, being duly sworn under his oath says: That he is personally acquainted with James H. Trollinger, now postmaster at Palo Pinto, in Benton county, Mo.; that on or about the 20th day of July, 1889, he had a conversation at Windsor, Mo., with the said James H. Trollinger, in which said Trollinger told this affiant the manner in which he obtained the post-office at Palo Pinto, saying that he, Trollinger, had not thought of applying for such post-office until some man at Warsaw, Mo., suggested that he might as well get the post office as anybody, and that he ought to circulate a petition; the said Trollinger did circulate a petition and got about forty names thereon; that one H. W. Fristoe, one of his opponents for such post-office, had a petition with over one hundred names thereon; that he, said Trollinger, sent his petition to the post-office department, and heard nothing from it for some time; that afterwards he received a letter telling him to be at Warsaw, Mo., on a certain day; that he went on the day named, and then and there met fifteen or twenty other applicants for post-offices; that he, said Trollinger, was there asked how much the post-office at Palo Pinto paid; that he replied it paid from $60 to $80 per annum; that thereupon the man who had made the inquiry told him, said Trollinger, to pay $6 now; that the said Trollinger then and there paid $6; that the applicant for the post office at Warsaw gave $25, and that all the applicants for post-offices paid something, he, the said Trollinger, saying to affiant that the amounts thus paid "made a big roll; a heap too big to pay expenses;" that said Trollinger further told affiant that the money thus paid was for Joseph B. Upton, and further said that for a long time he, said Trollinger, thought his $6 was gone, but that after awhile his commission came, but that he expected he would have to pay some more hereafter.

Before me, a notary public, in and for Henry county aforesaid, came A. C. Clark, who, being duly sworn, under his oath says: That he is acquainted with James H. Trollinger, now postmaster at Palo Pinto, in Benton County, Mo.; that on or about the 22d day of July, 1889, he had a conversation with said Trollinger, in which said Trollinger told this affiant how he obtained the postmastership at Palo Pinto; he, the said Trollinger, saying that he obtained the appointment as postmaster at Palo Pinto through the influence of Joseph B. Upton; that he paid $6 for the office, and knew that the said Upton got the money; and that the other applicants for post-offices in Benton county paid in proportion to the proceeds of the offices they applied for, and that this money so paid was to pay Upton's expenses to Washington City. And further, deponent says that he resides near the city of Windsor, and in Henry county, Missouri, and that the conversation above narrated occurred at said city of Windsor, and further deponent saith not.

Before me, James D. Lindsay, a notary public for said Henry county, came George J. Shelton, personally known to me, who, being first duly sworn, under his oath says: That he resides at the city of Windsor, in the county aforesaid; that he is acquainted with James H. Trollinger, now postmaster at Palo Pinto, in Benton county, Mo.; that on or about the 22d day of July, 1889, he had a conversation with said Trollinger at the city of Windsor, in which said Trollinger told affiant then and there how he obtained the postmastership at Palo Pinto; he, said Trollinger, saying that the appointment cost him $6; that Joseph B. Upton notified him, the applicant for the Warsaw post-office, and others, to meet him (Upton) at Warsaw, Benton county, Missouri, on a certain day; that Upton assessed them all according to the amount of salary attached to the offices; that the Warsaw post-office applicant paid $25, and further affiant saith not.

—June 24.—Sixth Auditor Coulter informed Chiefs of Division Hardson, Cunningham, Peetrey, Dougherty, Ellis, Farron, Howell, Leach and Johnson, that their resignations were desired. Then Coulter declared that the horn-blowers of the last campaign must have places, and that every one of the democrats in his office must go before the Ohio election, civil service or no civil service. The next is the following:

WASHINGTON, July 24.—Civil Service Commissioner Roosevelt said to-day that charges have been brought against both the pension office and the sixth auditor's office that men have been discharged because they were democrats.

The horn-blowers took charge as follows:

WASHINGTON, August 31.—An unusual scene has been enacted in the sixth auditor's office this week. The money order branch of the office is badly in arrears with its work, and in order to bring it up to date and close the business of the fiscal year, Sixth Auditor

Coulter ordered the entire force of the office to drop everything else during this week and lend a hand with this business. Last night the entire force, about 440 clerks, save those who are absent on leave, were at the office from six to nine o'clock.

—The corruption and attempted corruption of the franchise by means of post-office and other "spoils" go on in all directions. We have the word of a trustworthy local newspaper in Chester county—a county, by the way which joins to the distinction of exceptional intelligence and prosperity the less creditable one of being dominated by cast-iron partisanship—that at three post-offices of some importance in the southern section of the county, there are seventeen anxious and hopeful applicants for the place of postmaster, all of the seventeen being fed on hope by the congressman of the district, pending a political contest in which he is interested. At West Grove five applicants are thus "on the string," and at Oxford and Kennett Square six each. Primarily the scandal and the shame of this business lies at the door of the postmaster-general and the President, who put the "patronage" in the congressman's hands.—The American [Rep.], Aug. 24.

—The President appointed Theodore B. Willis naval officer of the port of New York, Ernest Nathan collector of internal revenue of the Brooklyn district, and George W. Lyon surveyor of the port. Of these appointments the New York Tribune says: "The appointments of Mr. Lyon and Mr. Willis, which directly affect this city, are excellent, and the selection of Mr. Willis as naval officer will be especially gratifying to the republicans of Brooklyn, who, under his direction as chairman of the campaign committee, did such capital work for the cause led by Gen. Harrison a year ago. Mr. Nathan has also established his claims to special consideration at the hands of his party."

—The St. Louis Republic states that Clarkson removed Peter Keith, an old soldier, the democratic postmaster at Strawberry Point, Ia., and appointed Keith's predecessor, a man seventy years old, who has always taken a great interest in working up subscriptions for Clarkson's paper, having obtained recently 132 subscriptions. There were two old soldiers candidates for the place when Keith's term expired. The Clayton county veterans passed resolutions denouncing Clarkson's action, and a protest was sent to Wanamaker.

—Birkett whose office as distributor of places in the Brooklyn navy yard was described last month, says, "there will be a clean sweep no matter what anybody else says. Our boys will all get what they want." Birkett a few days since saw the secretary of the navy in New York and took him sharply to task because Congressman Wallace has appointed 200 of his henchmen to places in the yard. This is a tremendous infringement on Birkett's prerogative as chairman of the republican general committee.

—Henry Rokestraw was appointed postmaster at Cheraw, S. C. He went to a neighboring town, and became intoxicated and disorderly, was arrested and fined ten dollars and sent to jail because he could not pay. Wanamaker was telegraphed that his recently-appointed postmaster at Cheraw was in the guard-house drunk, and what should be done about it. No reply was received.

—The republicans of Eureka Springs, Ark., held a mass meeting recently to denounce the appointment of T. W. True as postmaster at that place. They put the responsibility of the appointment upon that notorious republican Powell Clayton, and stated that he "has prostituted his high privilege as dispenser of federal patronage, and has thereby ruined republican success in this state."

—Orders have been prepared by Secretary Tracy for repairing, at the Norfolk navy yard, the war vessels Brooklyn, Alliance, Pensacola and Amphitrite. This looks like the old and corrupt trick of putting a large number of men under pay, and thus purchasing their votes at Mahone's approaching election.

—The husband of J. Ellen Foster has been appointed general agent of the department of justice. Another debt paid out of the common treasury. Salary, $2,500.

—At a critical moment during the Chicago convention an actor named Pope from St. Louis, recited Sheridan's Ride. He has since received the consulship at Toronto.

—E. A. Dimmick has been made consul at Barbadoes. His wife is a niece of Gail Hamilton, the relative and eulogist of Mr. Blaine.

—Robert A. Mosely, Jr., has been appointed collector of internal revenue of the Alabama district. He is chairman of the republican state committee.

—Louis Weinsteil has been appointed collector of the fourth Iowa district. He is editor of the Burlington Hawkeye.

—Quay's henchman, Comptroller Gilkeson, who, it will be remembered, nearly brought on war between Quay and Sherman, has requested the resignation of W. P. Montague, head of a division. Of him the Boston Post says:

"Mr. Montague, who was one of yesterday's victims, is an accomplished young lawyer from Chelsea, Mass., who is so far from being a partisan that he never served on a political committee in his life. Comptroller Butler had great confidence in Mr. Montague, and relied much upon his assistance in preparing the data for some of his most important decisions. Mr. Montague is a democrat of the best type, and a decided civil service reformer."

THE THANKSGIVING SERMON.

The Indianapolis Journal recently said:

"Herbert Welsh, the civil service enthusiast, who has addressed a circular to the ministers of the country, asking them to preach next Thanksgiving Day on the subject of civil service reform, is said to be meeting with indifferent success, so far as may be judged by responses received. This disinclination of the clergy to join in Mr. Welsh's scheme by no means indicates a lack of sympathy with the reform in question, but does indicate a belief that there are other topics of more importance demanding attention of the pulpit. To uphold civil service reform ideas is not necessarily a proof of virtue, nor opposition to it a sin, and while so many unquestionable virtues remain to be taught, and so many sins to be denounced, it really seems that the pulpit has enough to do without taking up matters of political policy. The teachings that make men honest citizens insure the proper conduct of the civil service without special religious instruction in that line."

Those who have seen the long list of distinguished clergymen of all denominations who have responded need not be told that the Journal has been misled as to the interest manifested, but the apparent effort to belittle the importance of this question and to put it outside moral issues is the more surprising for only last November the Journal said: "They must be accomplished if our civil service is to be saved from becoming the mere prey of spoilsmen and a perpetual source of corruption and danger to the government.

Whether the discussion of this question pertains to morals may be judged when the republican national platform in 1872 characterized the spoils system as "fatally demoralizing." And again in 1884 and 1888 demanded that all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectually avoided."

Were any further evidence needed, Abraham Lincoln, schooled to a nation's peril, gave warning that "if ever this free people, this government itself, is ever utterly demoralized, it will come from this wriggle and struggle for office." It has been only of late years that the facts to show the baseness of the spoils system have been accessible to the public. The details of this despotism were for years smothered. Papers were subsidized, social and business relations were threatened, and the victims were trained to silence. If cruelty, treachery, meanness and lying are immoral, then a system that can not exist without them is also immoral, and is a question appropriate for pulpit discussion. It is undoubtedly true that many conscientious clergymen will not feel called upon to follow Mr. Welsh's suggestion. They do not yet fully realize what is involved in the placing of thousands of favorites into public places. When men and women are proscribed from public employment in a free country in the nineteenth century because of political opinions, when offices are given as bribes, when the air is thick with details of broken promises and treachery, when, by unlawful and disgraceful assistance, an unscrupulous man like Mahone is given Virginia, Quay, Pennsylvania, and Platt, New York, it is time for those charged with the oversight of the spiritual and moral well-being of others to protest against the corrupting power of political patronage.

We are permitted to print the following letter from Rev. R. V. Hunter, pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian church of this city:

"I am in full sympathy with your idea of a non-partisan sermon to be preached on the coming Thanksgiving. I believe that it should be preached for many reasons. The people need a fair presentation of national issues, and this they can not get from partisan papers or speakers. The best citizen is the one who loves his country more than party. There are evils in all parties. There is, likewise good in all parties. What we need is to know the good and to applaud it. Likewise to know the evil and condemn it. Anything that will contribute to better government, to more enlightened political conscience, will be in place on that day."

B.—The marks on penmanship will be determined by legibility, neatness and general appearance, and by correctness and uniformity in the formation of words, letters, and punctuation marks in the second exercise of the third subject—writing from plain copy—and in the exercise of the fourth subject—letter-writing.

THIRD SUBJECT—COPYING.

First Exercise—Writing from Dictation.

N. B.—Spelling, use of capitals, punctuation, and all omissions and mistakes will be taken into consideration in marking the exercises of this subject.

One of the examiners will dictate an exercise of not less than ten lines so distinctly that all the persons being examined can hear him. The passage will first be read for information, and then be dictated in phrases of five or six words, at the rate of from fifteen to twenty-five words per minute. If from any cause the competitor miss a word, he should not pause, but leave a blank space and go on with the next words he hears. Three minutes will be allowed after the dictation for punctuation and correction. The following was dictated:

"The secretary shall make minutes of the proceedings of the commission and record them in a book to be kept for that purpose and to be entitled 'Record of Proceedings.' He shall have charge of the secretary's division of the commission, and shall have custody of and be responsible for the safe-keeping of the books, records, papers, and other property thereof. He shall enter upon the registers of eligibles the names of persons eligible to places in the classified departmental service, and, by direction of the commission, upon proper requisition therefor, make certification thereof. He shall perform such other duties as the commission may direct."

Second Exercise—Writing from Plain Copy.

N. B.—Spelling, use of capitals, punctuation, and all omissions and mistakes will be taken into consideration in marking the exercises of this subject.

Copy the following precisely, punctuating and capitalizing as in the copy:

The grade of each competitor shall be expressed by the whole number nearest the general average attained by him, and the grade of each eligible shall be noted upon the register of eligibles in connection with his name. When two or more eligibles are of the same grade, preference in certification shall be determined by the order in which their application papers were filed.

No person who has passed an examination shall while eligible on the register supplied by such examination, be re-examined, unless he shall furnish evidence satisfactory to the commission that at the time of his examination he was, because of illness or for other good cause, incapable of doing himself justice in said examination.

FOURTH SUBJECT—LETTER WRITING.

N. B.—This exercise is designed chiefly to test the competitor's skill in simple English composition, knowledge of the rules of punctuation, and conception of the proper form of a letter.

In marking the letter, its errors in form and address, in spelling, capitals, punctuation, syntax and style, and its adherence to the subject will be considered. The handwriting in this exercise will help to determine the rating on "penmanship," which is the second subject, but will not be taken into consideration in ascertaining the "marks" of the letter.

Write a letter giving a brief account of your education, including the names and locations of the schools attended by you, and a description of the course of study pursued by you.

The competitor must avoid allusion to his political or religious opinions or affiliations. The letter must contain not less than 125 words, must be addressed as follows: "To the United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.," and must be dated at the place where the examination is held. The examination number, and not the name of the competitor, must be used for a signature to the letter.

Any exercise in this subject (letter-writing excepted) which does not present a definite number of points, so that it may be marked under definite rules, will be marked in the discretion of the examiners upon the following considerations: (1) Whether the answer covers the question; (2) whether it is accurate; (3) whether it is unambiguous; (4) as to the degree of information and capacity it exhibits. In the discretion of the examiners.

GEOGRAPHY, HISTORY, AND GOVERNMENT.

In marking these subjects, each answer shall be marked, in the discretion of the examiners, according to its value on a scale of 100.

When the question requires in the answer a specified number of states, countries, persons, places, locations, or things, the quotient arising from the division of 100 by the number of states, countries, etc., required shall be the credit to be given for each state, country, etc., correctly named; if a greater number is given in the answer than is required, the additional number of states, countries, etc., shall be added to the number required by the question, and the quotient arising from the division of 100 by the number thus obtained shall be the credit to be given for each state, country, etc., correctly named.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

1. Any error not covered by the foregoing rules will be marked in the discretion of the examiners.

2. The examiners, having satisfactory evidence that an answer has been borrowed or otherwise improperly obtained, the question will be marked 0, and the examination papers, with the evidence, referred to the commission.

3. The examination papers of every competitor must be marked by the board of examiners, and each examiner shall initial every paper marked by him. Should a review by another examiner be necessary, he shall also initial every paper reviewed by him. Each examiner who marks a subject shall mark and initial with pencil or ink of different color than that of the pencil or ink used by any other examiner marking the same subject.

4. All errors noted must be indicated by underlining or otherwise. The charge for each error must, when practicable, be noted on the margin of the sheet.

5. In finding the average of the marks on any subject by dividing the sum of the credits by the number of questions, the unanswered questions must be counted in obtaining the divisor.

Address THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE, Indianapolis, Indiana.

The question of the civil service involves every other question in our politics. With a proper administration of the government service there would be fewer disturbing questions. The present system of giving office as a reward for unscrupulous political work exaggerates every evil and increases every cause of disturbance. If the government is to be administered on the blocks-of-five plan, it is idle to expect that any real reform can be accomplished in any direction. If we do not change our civil service methods we will have a thoroughly established despotism of, by and for the worst rascals in the country.—St. Louis Republic [Dem.].

NEARLY the entire space of this paper has been given this month to the proceedings of the annual meeting of the National League. The address of Mr. Curtis, being from him, does not need any praise; but it seems to understate the value of certain acts of President Harrison, and the effect is to leave the present administration without any credit regarding civil service reform. We can not concur in this general conclusion. For instance, the appointment of the present civil service commission was an act of tremendous importance, and displayed not only a purpose to have the law enforced, but entire knowledge of the way to go about it. The civil service commission is the backbone of the merit system so far as that system has been applied to the civil service. The appointment of the present commission, and especially of Mr. Roosevelt, has given that system an exceedingly rigid backbone. The effect is seen on all hands, as, for instance, in the Indianapolis post-office. We have now what has always been needed, a commission that can not be cowed by the threats of congressmen whose hurts and outcries are the best evidence of its efficiency. The recent outbreaks against the law are conclusive proofs that a new and serious barrier to working in henchmen in spite of the law has been encountered. The appointment here and there of the head of an office who earnestly favors the merit system can not be compared in importance to the selection of an "admirable civil service commission." The one affects but one office, the other all the offices in the classified service, and acts both as a prod and as a brake upon the President himself.

MR. BONAPARTE'S paper upon "Civil Service Reform as a Moral Question" has about it a nobility of sentiment and a clearness and ability of statement entirely worthy of its author. The discussion is comparatively new, but he may be said to have reduced the question to a demonstration. His declaration, "that to promise or confer public office as a bait or reward for personal or party service is always and everywhere immoral; that it is a breach of trust and a form of bribery," is an everlasting truth. It has not guided government in the past, but it will be believed and adopted by the American people, and on this truth the spoils system will be broken to pieces.

THE Indianapolis city election was held October 1, and resulted in the complete defeat of the republicans. The election had no national significance, whatever, except as the occasional mysterious appearance of a Washington office-holder aroused criticism sufficient to show that that method of manipulating elections can no longer be safely tried. One important lesson was taught. The removal of Mr. Webster from his place as chief of the fire department some months ago by the republicans because he would not dismiss the dozen or so of democrats in that department hurt them more than a single act often hurts a party. Literally, hundreds of republicans kept that outrage in mind until election day and cast their votes to punish the party that did it. It was a salutary lesson and shows great progress in the breaking up of the spoils system in this community. There were other causes, as, for instance, the grip of the gas company upon the city, and the pardon of Coy by the republican machine, and its apparent desire to see him re-elected to the city council.

GENERAL M. D. MANSON was collector of the Terre Haute district in this state. He had served his country honorably in Mexico and during the rebellion. He is highly respected as a citizen, and as a public officer his efficiency and fairness have never been questioned. If the principles of civil service reform were to be applied to any executive appointment, this would seem to have been the one. But President Harrison wrote the following letter:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, }
WASHINGTON, Sept. 4, 1889.

DEAR GENERAL—When I was at Indianapolis I endeavored to have a conference with you, but the demands upon your time and mine seemed to prevent you from responding to my request.

Mr. Ransdell informed me that you had said to him that you would address me a letter relieving me of a possible embarrassment connected with a change in the collector's office held by you, and I have been expecting to hear from you. I do not wish to make any official request or suggestion to you, but a change can not much longer be deferred, and my desire has been that it might be made in a way as agreeable to you as possible. This is the object of this personal note. Please inform me of your purpose.

Very respectfully yours,

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

As a consequence General Manson resigned. The President appears at his littlest in this transaction, and few presidents have done littler things. He is the president of sixty millions of people, and yet he carries about in his mind, on the most solemn occasion, the edging of an efficient officer out of his place. He writes a letter that makes his best friends in Indiana ashamed, and to add to this, appears at his elbow that efficient agent of slyness, "Dan" Ransdell!

THE President has appointed J. P. Throop, of Paoli, in place of General Manson. The Indianapolis Journal's dispatch says:

"Mr. Throop was indorsed for the position by such well-known republicans of the state as Representative Posey, the state officers, District Attorney Chambers, Third Auditor Hart, B. Wilson Smith and Messrs. Durbin, Dudley, Huston, Ransdell, Heilman, Irwin, Brackston, Mowry, the DePauws and Harry Adams, and his appointment is considered by republicans here as an excellent one. He is described as "a republican hustler from way back."

Throop had been chairman of his party's county committee thirteen years. The Indiana official class selected a man fitted by training and inclination for the effort to perpetuate their power by the system of official bribes and punishments. No country, civilized or uncivilized, can show a finer instance of a government of court favorites, by court favorites, and for court favorites.

Jeremiah O'Donnell entered the government service as store-keeper October 4, just one week prior to his arrest for jury-bribing. He was recommended by such well-known men as Senator C. B. Farwell, Coroner H. L. Hertz, State Senator John Monahan, James L. Monaghan, representative from the fifth district; Billy Lorimer, John P. Cavanagh, Joseph E. Bidwill, J. B. Taylor, Representative J. W. Kroll, P. J. Corboy, and Senator Garrity from the fifth district.

Collector Stone said yesterday that he had not heard of the man or seen him until he came to work a week ago last Friday. "He had the necessary papers from prominent republicans," said Mr. Stone, "and desired that his bond be made out immediately so as not to keep his bondsmen waiting."

When Senator Farwell was called upon yesterday he remembered the name O'Donnell very well. "I believe," he said, "I've got his papers here. But I did not suspect that the O'Donnell whom I recommended was the fellow arrested for bribery. I am surprised beyond measure. Such a crime I think is about as bad as murder. You know how such appointments are made. The fellows down in Lawler's district brought in his appointment. There were so many good names attached to it that I sent it to Collector Stone without looking into it."

This is a fair illustration of the way federal appointments are made. It is hard to see how any president can witness the thousands of such cases which pass under his eye and not feel the enormity of his own dereliction in permitting such a pros titution of the trust which the people have committed to him. The duty to bring about a revolution in this whole matter and recover and exercise his constitutional authority, it would seem must cry out upon him day and night.

Following back the thread, collector Stone has a man put upon him of whom he knows nothing: he is ordered by Senator Farwell to give the man a place and obeys. Farwell knows nothing of the man except that he came from the "fellows" in Lawler's district. The "fellows" in return will keep an eye out toward Farwell's continuance in office; such is the bribe and such is the service. Meantime, the cant that an officer "who is responsible for his office, should have the selection of his subordinates," goes on.

At the dinner of the Bay State Club in Boston, October 12, President Eliot, of Harvard University, said:

"Have we not seen the public service degenerating more and more, and treated more and more as private property under successive republican administrations—the last of the series being the worst of all in this respect? [Great applause.] And have we not seen the single democratic administration of the twenty-eight years past the best of all American administrations during that period in this respect? [Tremendous applause.] No intelligent man will place any reliance upon the professions of a party when its public performances incessantly contradict them. [Applause.] We must rely upon the public acts of the men who represent the respective parties. Can any civil service reformer hesitate for a moment between the administrations of Cleveland and of Harrison on that issue? [Applause.] One honestly promoted the reform, and the other has betrayed it."

A man who talks like that in face of the repeatedly published and undisputed facts is not to be reasoned with. Such partisan idolatry is only to be contrasted with the motherly prejudice with which Senator Hoar gathers the republican party under his wing.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM AS A MORAL QUESTION.*

On May 16, 1887, a well-known gentleman, who then delivered by request a very interesting address at the annual meeting of the Civil Service Reform Association of Maryland, criticised with some severity the sentiments of a writer in the last preceding number of the Civil Service Reformer. "To this . . . writer," he said, "the principle of civil service reform may seem to be one of high morality: it has not to the majority of the people of this country appeared to be that so much as to be a principle of wise and intelligent administration." The writer thus censured happened to be myself, and I take advantage of your courteous invitation to defend the view thus justly ascribed to me. I do this not because the merit of my own opinion is a matter of any public interest, but because the question involved seems to me of great and practical importance. When I admit my belief that "the principle of civil service reform" is "one of high morality," I mean that all men who have sufficiently reflected and are sufficiently informed to entertain an intelligent opinion must and do think alike on the subject; that no one who has any claim at all to public attention really doubts that "the principle of civil service reform" is just and beneficent: if he says that he doubts this, he tells an untruth; if he violates this "principle" in official conduct, he does so, just as he may commit theft or adultery, knowing that he does wrong.

I concede that there may be room for honest and enlightened difference of opinion as to the practical application of the principle; the merits of competitive examinations or fixity of official tenure are subjects of fair debate; we may approve of requiring stated reasons for removal or abolishing four-year terms without thereby pronouncing ignorant or insincere every one who thinks otherwise; but these questions of policy have nothing to do with the principle of civil service reform. An honorable and patriotic man may reasonably doubt (as many doubt) whether the Australian ballot system is suited to American institutions, but a man who promotes or excuses any form of cheating at elections is simply a scoundrel; a good citizen may justifiably question (as many question) whether prohibition is either expedient or practicable, but one who regards with complacency or indifference the evils of intemperance must be an enemy to mankind. So one or another means to secure an efficient public service may or may not commend itself to every one's judgment, but I, at least, can not imagine a good man who has thought on the subject, and who knows enough about it to think to any purpose, and who yet fails to see that to promise or confer public office as a bait or reward for personal or party service is always and everywhere immoral; that it is a breach of trust and a form of bribery.

Some confusion of ideas as to this may, perhaps, be due to an argument often used by reformers. Unquestionably, no one in his senses would think of managing his own business as the people's business is still managed in great part, and was managed universally before the reform legislation of recent years. A man who filled up his store or factory with workmen chosen because they agreed with him as to the tariff or state's rights, and changed whenever their places were needed for more effective political workers, would probably get into a strait-jacket even before he got into bankruptcy. But to a moralist there would be a vast difference between his behavior and similar conduct on the part of a president or governor or mayor. After all, he would be but doing as he chose with his own; unless he endangered the rights of his creditors or the comfort of his family, the worst to be said of him would be that he was a fool for his pains. If, during his absence, however, his trusted manager or foreman were to deal thus with his interests, the most charitable critic would recognize in the latter something worse than a fool. His conduct might not be a crime, while the larceny or embezzlement of his employer's goods would be; but this is only because for so unlikely a form of moral obliquity no law has made provision; it would be equally abhorrent to right-thinking men, equally dangerous to society. And this is precisely the conduct of every public officer who creates a vacancy or makes an appointment for personal or partisan gain. A president who deprives the country of an upright and competent postmaster or naval officer to meet the views or advance the ends of selfish and unscrupulous political intriguers is no less blameworthy than one who should give them the public moneys; he may be, indeed, less keenly conscious of his guilt, if he has lived long years in a moral atmosphere poisoned by the malaria of "spoils" politics, but while he has any conscience or honor left he will feel ashamed of what he does.

The question is equally clear if regarded in another aspect. All thoughtful and patriotic men agree that bribery, more or less direct and more or less open, in connection with elections is a great and growing evil, although it is no less evident that this evil can be much more readily recognized and denounced than remedied. But it is a perfectly legitimate and logical outcome of the spoils system in politics, and can not be consistently condemned by any one who approves of using appointments to influence political action or reward partisan service. Whether a "worker" is paid by a check or by a sinecure—whether a man's vote is bought for five dollars or for the chance to dawdle a fortnight at street sweeping, can make no difference as to the right or wrong of the matter; or rather, while the man bribed is equally guilty, whatever the form of his reward, it is surely more odious and more noxious to bribe with what is the people's than with what is one's own, to purchase suffrages or influence at the taxpayers' cost, than to pay for these out of the corrupter's pocket.

It will be readily understood that, in my view, to establish the principle of civil service reform, or, in other words, to thoroughly eradicate from our politics the doctrine that offices are spoils, is a work which interests good citizens almost beyond any other. Compare it, for example, with the movement for tariff reform, with which it is often classed. I entertain certain very definite views as to the relative merits of free trade and protection, and I believe that every one who thinks otherwise is mistaken; but I must, in common sense and candor, recognize the fact that many intelligent and conscientious men, of whom some have devoted far more time and thought to the subject than I have, do think otherwise. Motives on either side, are, indeed, freely impugned in discussion, and, no doubt, many protectionists have a more or less conscious bias from self-interest, while free traders sometimes approach the subject rather as students than as statesmen; but, after all, the question is one regarding which the purest and wisest men here and elsewhere have not agreed, and do not agree, and while this is true, it is not a moral question, as I use the words. I shall always vote against a party professing my views as to the tariff if I believe that in so doing I shall, on the whole, promote the cause of honest government and pure politics.

In saying this, I do not overlook the fact that moral considerations affect the expediency of tariff reform. The most earnest protectionist, if sensible and candid, will admit that a tariff not solely for revenue is a prolific source of corruption and intrigue in the national legislature, and that this constitutes a strong argument for free trade. But this argument may not be to all minds decisive; protective imposts are in theory laid for the public good, and a conscientious man may uphold them, as many do, without denying their liability to grave abuse. There is the same distinction between approving them and approving the spoils system that there is between licensing saloons and licensing brothels: the former may be often nests of vice and crime, but they are not, whilst the latter are, mala in se.

In dealing with questions really political, charity and forbearance in argument, a readiness to accommodate differences by compromise, and the pursuit of practical good at the expense of theory or sentiment, mark the worthy citizen of a free state. He assumes his adversary's sincerity, and expects from him the same consideration; he recognizes in those against whom he contends, not his enemies, aiming to injure his and their common country, but his and its friends, seeking its welfare as earnestly as he does, though not, to his mind, so wisely. But when there arises, as I believe there has arisen here, a true question of morals; when the task allotted to friends of good government is not to convince mistaken fellow-citizens of their error, but to shame or frighten faithless public servants into doing what these know to be their duty and to rouse a sluggish or careless people to a sense of wrong and danger; when, in strictness of speech, there is need, not for argument, since no one truly disputes what we maintain, but for an effective appeal to public opinion against insolent persistence in wrong-doing, then our bearing should fit the season. We can make no bargain with iniquity; we ask, and ask only, that public trustees shall do their duty; not the half, or any other fraction, but the whole of their duty; not that they do it here and there, or now and then, but that they do it everywhere and always, and we can and will be satisfied with no less. To tell us, in extenuation of this unfit appointment or that unjust removal, that elsewhere the guilty officer has done what he ought to have done here is no more to the point than obedience to the eighth commandment would justify a breach of the seventh. And in dealing with such an officer, we must see to it that he knows what we think of him. Believe me, such as he are not to be gained over to righteousness by soft words or tender silence or diplomacy in any form. They will never love us, do what we may; but they will and do shrink from hearing us tell them what in truth they are. No spoilsman, however hardened, is really indifferent when he hears, "You are faithless to your trust and false to your oath of office; your motives are unworthy, your excuses mere sophistry; and, however much you may stupefy your conscience or deceive your neighbors, you know in your heart that you are not an honest man."

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

[An address before the National Civil Service Reform League, at the annual meeting in Philadelphia, October 1, 1889.]

Since our last annual meeting, the second party change in the administration of the national government since the formation of the league has occurred. Seven months of the new administration have passed, and as friends of civil service reform our questions to-day are obvious and simple. What was the declaration of the successful party upon the subject of reform? What were the pledges of its candidates? Have those pledges been fulfilled, and what are the prospects of reform? Four years ago, in speaking of President Cleveland, then recently elected and inaugurated, I said that he "was not committed to the prosecution of reform as the candidate of a party which seriously desired it or promised it." Certainly, I can not say this of President Harrison. The promises of the successful party last year were as ardent as they were detailed and absolute. They left nothing unexpressed. The pure purpose of reform was depicted in the platform with a touch as glowing as that of the poet in his epitaph upon a highly respectable lady:

"Yea, Venus, Pallas, Diana, and the graces, Compared with her should all have lost their places."

The irrepressible platform pledged the party to many things, but to nothing with such reduplicated and reiterated zeal as to reform in the civil service; and, having done this in the most precise and positive words, it pledged the party with especial fervor to keep its pledges. Indeed such was the frenzy of fidelity that less excited friends of the good cause were fain to say:

"Choose a firm cloud before it fall, and in it Catch, ere she change, the Cynthia of this minute."

To the ardor of the platform the protestations of the President, as a candidate, fitly and fully respond. He declared that it would be his sincere purpose, if elected, to advance reform. He said that fitness and not party service should be the essential test in appointment, that fidelity and efficiency should be the only sure tenure of office, and that only the interest of the public service should suggest removals from office. The significance of these words is unmistakable. Naturally and fairly interpreted, they forecast an executive action absolutely incompatible with the practice known as the spoils system. The country had precisely the same assurance from the successful party of a policy of honest reform in the civil service that it had of an administration favorable to the policy of protection; and, that no doubt might arise from political differences between the executive and the legislative branches of the government, the result of the election showed that the executive and the legislature would be in entire political accord.

When a great representative body of American citizens voluntarily and solemnly proclaim that they hold certain views upon the tariff, or upon the system of public pensions, or upon the internal revenue, which they invite their fellow-citizens to support by voting for their candidates, they can not be supposed to trifle with popular government and with their own honor by deliberately hanging out false lights. In a republic where the government is administered by party, if the party pledges of an authorized convention prove to be tricks and lies, the party justly forfeits public confidence, and every member of it is vicariously dishonored. When its authorized representatives, in order to secure for the party the control of the administration, declare that the spirit and purpose of civil service reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and that all laws at variance with the object of existing reform should be repealed, there is no doubt of the meaning of the words nor of the impression which they are meant to convey. The declaration is a voluntary, definite, and solemn engagement with the country; and those who, in consequence of such an engagement, are entrusted with the administration of the government are bound in honor to fulfill it or to show adequate reason for their inability to discharge their obligations. If they sneer at declarations which by their acceptance of office have become their own as absurd, if they chuckle over violations of their own pledges, if they choose to figure officially as statesmen forsworn, they do not discredit or injure the cause to which they eagerly professed fidelity, nor do they show it to be unwise, untimely, or impracticable. The discredit, the shame, the dishonor, fall elsewhere than upon the cause of reform.

THE PROMISE.

President Harrison thus entered upon his administration as the choice of a party which expressly claims the honor of beginning reform in the civil service, and has vehemently promised to complete it. Not content with requiring that the existing law should be extended to all grades of the service to which it is applicable, the party went entirely beyond these grades, and affirmed that "the spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments." This, however, was not a pledge to any extraordinary action. It was merely a declaration that, if the party were successful at the polls, the administration would do its plain constitutional duty; for such it is. Whether the convention had said anything upon the question or had remained silent, the executive duty would have been the same. For the executive is morally bound, as Mr. Bonaparte, president of the Reform Association of Maryland, said in his admirable annual address last May, to discharge all his duties upon acknowledged principles of equity and regard for the public interest and economy.

It is the duty of every administration, in obedience to such principles, not to remove honest and efficient public servants whose duties are in no sense political, but which remain the same whatever public policy the country may have approved at the election. The reason is not that they have any vested right in office, but that the country has the right to the most efficient and devoted official service, which is impracticable when office is regarded, not as a public trust, but as party spoils. Nobody is so foolish as to assert the right of any public agent to his place. There are always equally honest and capable and fit persons who, with the same experience, might be as serviceable and efficient. The simple and conclusive argument against change is not vested right: it is that there is no good reason affecting the public interest which in the case of satisfactory officers requires change. Arbitrary removal for causes not connected with the service is as pernicious to public as it is to private business. To make such removals, therefore, is contrary to public policy, which the administration is morally bound to respect.

But more than this. Mr. Madison, who was a wise interpreter of the Constitution which he largely moulded, said that an executive who should make such removals ought to be impeached. The assistant postmaster-general is reported to have stated that about fifteen thousand fourth class postmasters, more than one-quarter of the whole number of such officers, were displaced during the first five months of this administration. But the change in every instance, when not due to death or resignation, or to some reason connected with the service, is, according to Mr. Madison, an unconstitutional act. If a postmaster has been removed because of his religious belief, or his philosophical or scientific theories, or his views of a tariff, or of the question of the seal fisheries in the Behring Sea, or of a sub-treasury, or a United States bank, his removal has been not only a violation of the deliberate and repeated pledges of the party of administration and of the executive, but it is an act which, in the case of a great business company, would lead to the dismissal of the agent who had abused his power, and in the case of a President, Mr. Madison says, should subject him to impeachment.

Undoubtedly, the President has the power of removal. That was the decision of the first great constitutional debate in congress. But, like all executive power, it may be abused and exercised in an unconstitutional spirit. Removal, made arbitrarily or from an unworthy motive, can not be justified by the mere fact that the power of removal exists. In the last angry days of the slavery controversy, when Mr. Douglass argued that the people of a territory, meaning a majority of male white adults, had the right to establish slavery if they should choose to do so, the conclusive answer was that they had no moral right to choose to do a wrong, for a wrong slavery was adjudged to be by the common conscience of mankind. All power is to be exercised reasonably, not arbitrarily, and in case of the President it is to be exercised in accordance with the constitutional intention and with the announcement previously made to the country of the principles by which, and in the spirit in which, it will be exercised, and which the country has approved.

How, then, have the pledges of the successful party and candidate been fulfilled? Have fidelity and efficiency proved to be the sure tenure of office? Has fitness and not party service been the essential test in determining appointments? Has the interest of the public service alone dictated removals from office? Has the great pledge of the platform that the spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive appointments been honorably fulfilled? Or have such appointments generally been made precisely as they would have been made had there been no platform promises, no pledges of the candidate, and no public interest in civil service reform?

It is not an answer to these questions, it is only an evasion of them, to say that reform is not favored by a majority of the people. The only way in which the views of a majority of the people can be known is by the result of an election. If the election of last year showed that the country was in favor of protection, it showed, by precisely the same demonstration, that it is in favor of civil service reform. If there be any relation between party platforms, the pledges of candidates, and the results of an election, the country in electing Mr. Harrison declared for civil service reform. For, if an election can not be held to be a popular approval of the platform and the personal pledges of candidates, who shall decide how much of them, and in what sense and degree any of them, have been approved? In any event, whatever doubt may rest upon the views of the majority of the people in regard to reform, there can be no doubt of the views and purposes and pledges of one citizen. There may be some question of the extent and degree of the sympathy of others. But, if the simplest statement which the English language permits, if the plainest engagement to pursue a certain course of conduct, if the most solemn pledges uttered before God and the country have any meaning, there is no doubt whatever of the opinions and intentions upon this subject of the President of the United States.

Nor is it any answer to the questions to say that the President can not outrun public opinion nor proceed faster than his party will permit. When a party has made no distinct or intelligible declaration upon a question involving his action, the President may plausibly plead that his party has not declared its views, and that he must conform his conduct to a course which he believes the party would support. But when his party, in the act of nominating him, distinctly states its views and prescribes the rule of his action, he can no longer offer that plea. It is open to another, but not to him. His party engages to support him. His duty is to follow the course which his party proclaims, which he prefers, and which the country by his election, has approved. He can not plead that the party chiefs, secretaries, senators, representatives, local leaders, newspapers and committees are cruelly coercing him to violate the party promise and his own pledge, without conceding that the party platform was a trick, and that the party sought power under false pretences. Still less can an honorable president offer this plea when his party in nominating him has prescribed his course, because, when the same plea was urged for a president whose party had purposely made no such definite declaration, it was denounced as a futile and desperate excuse for sham and fraud, for monstrous hypocrisy and contemptible chicanery.

Our question, however, is not whether one president violates pledges more or less frequently than another. Still less is it a question of the comparative sagacity of the friends of reform in their party action. We meet not to explain or justify such action, not to defame or exalt any administration, but, as friends of reform, and unmindful of party sympathies, to measure fairly and accurately the situation. Our question is whether the great pledge of the party of administration, that the spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive appointments, has been fulfilled. If the pledge has been kept, our meeting must be one of unmixed congratulation. If it has been reasonably fulfilled, we must all rejoice. If the administration party, by the conduct of its executive, cabinet, senators, representatives and recognized leaders, by the general tone of its press and of its adherents, proves that the platform was a just statement of the actual reform spirit and purpose of the party, there is not an honest friend of reform who will not gladly confess any error of judgment in political action, while he intones triumphantly the Gloria in excelsis.

THE ANSWER.

What then is the answer? What is the spirit of the party and the conduct of the executive? The answer, of course, involves great detail, and can be only generally indicated. Let us look at the signs of party feeling.

A few weeks ago, a hilarious administration party organ at the capital of New York, one of the most influential and representative party journals, exclaimed: "Fifteen thousand fourth-class postmasters have been removed to date, and Mr. Clarkson remains in Washington with his coat off and his shirt sleeves rolled up. Go it, Clarkson! Out with the whole fifty-five thousand by January 1st." It adds, with natural enthusiasm, that civil service reform can not command the support of a corporal's guard of republicans in New York. In Missouri, the chief party organ thinks Mr. Clarkson's labors, although laudable, yet rather deliberate in the direction of true reform, and is confident that, "when the dog days are over and cool weather sets in, Colonel Clarkson will greatly accelerate his speed." The leading rural organ in the state of Indiana asserts plainly, "Neither political party cares a continental about this humbug civil service reform." In New Hampshire, the chief administration organ, arraigning reform as "a stuffed and painted and unpopular humbug," and "a bald and rickety affair that bullies and wheedles good citizens," inexorably condemns it "to the scrap heap." In West Virginia, a zealous organ believes devotedly that the spoils belong to the victor; and the editor, having secured his part of the booty, announces that at the earliest practical date every democratic appointee in the office entrusted to him, "from the humble and poorly paid apple-jack gaugers to the well-paid storekeeper and clerks, will be succeeded by simon-pure-all-wool-and-yard-wide republicans." In Pennsylvania, an administration journal of importance declares that "the people are tired of the sham of reform, and would gladly snow it under with their votes." In Ohio, a similar representative administration organ warmly commends an officer who disregards the humbug. In Iowa, the Washington correspondent of a journal of the same character says that no administration member of congress that he meets favors the law, and announces that "it will be repealed as it ought to be;" while one of the chief journals in Central New York holds, notwithstanding the express words of the platform, that the President is not bound to go beyond the law and enforce the spirit of reform. Another, commending the refusal of the President to place the clerks of the census bureau under the rules of the civil service, declares its belief that the decision will be satisfactory to the party.

This is the tone of the larger part of the press of the administration party. No jeer is too contemptuous for reform, no epithet is too acrid. No platform of the opposition was ever denounced by party fury with greater scorn than that with which a representative body of the administration press now spurns its own. Naturally, this uniformity of tone in the party journals throughout the Union is echoed by party assemblies. The federation of republican clubs in the third Maryland district, representing twenty-three associations, pledge themselves not to support for any office a candidate who honestly adheres to the national republican declaration upon reform. The central committee of the District of Columbia denounces "the cowardly, treacherous policy that to the defeated belong the spoils." The republican central committees in two New York counties denounce as un-American and unfair the civil service law which the republican platform pledges the party to extend; and state conventions of the administration party in three of the great states which it controls, Pennsylvania, Iowa and Ohio, which formerly loudly declared for reform, are this year silent. Three members of the cabinet decline to profess their adherence to the most emphatic declaration of the party platform; and one laughingly remarks that he does not think he has appointed many democrats to office so far. Eminent senators and representatives of the party sneer with warmth at the cant of reform and dog the President for patronage. One representative announces that he will "test the sentiment of the house on the sham civil service law," alleging that "nine tenths of the members know that the law is a fraud, and say so in private;" and the energetic representative proposes "to smoke them out and put them on record."

These are facts wholly without precedent in our political history. To find a parallel, we must appeal to imagination, and suppose some secretary in Jackson's cabinet publicly laughing at the party platform, and democratic clubs and committees and a powerful part of the party press eagerly sustaining the United States bank and insisting that true democracy and the genius of American institutions demand its recharter and permanence. Or we must try to figure republican senators and representatives of the last generation arguing the justice and humanity of the fugitive slave law, and the republican press and local committees asserting the right of slave holders to take slaves into the territories, and declaring the freedom of the territories as demanded by the party platform to be unconstitutional and un-American. The republican platform of thirty years ago did not declare against the extension of slavery into the territories more forcibly and absolutely than the platform of last year declared for reform of the civil service. Such an attitude of party leaders and of the party press in former years toward the platform of their own party would have been that which the larger part of the administration press and of the boldest and most aggressive administration leaders to-day hold.

While this is the sentiment of the party as revealed in all the ordinary methods, what is the executive action? Does that conform to the platform promise and the President's pledge? The knowledge of every citizen in his own community answers. The daily record of the newspapers for seven months answers. The general political proscription; the policy which President Harrison when a senator defined as "the frank and bold, if brutal, method of turning men and women out simply for political opinion;" the clean sweep which is proceeding in the post-office, the alarm which pervades every branch of the service, the open, flagrant contempt for public opinion, for private information, and for the party promise, which was shown in the appointment of the late commissioner of pensions; the executive refusal to include the census service in the rules and the removal of public officers conspicuously fitted for their posts by character, ability, and experience, who have absolutely and confessedly disregarded politics in their devotion to official duty and the public service,—all these facts, and such as these, answer the question, How has the executive action conformed to the party promise and the President's pledge?

There are two signal illustrations of the manner in which those pledges have been kept. The fundamental principle of reform or of reasonable conduct of the public service requires the retention and reappointment of public officers in important places who are especially fitted for their trusts by personal character and proved ability, by long service and great experience; who are in no sense active politicians, and who are exclusively and most efficiently devoted to their official duties. When the administration came into power upon a platform of reform, it found two such officers in the city of New York—the postmaster and the naval officer. Both of them had what is almost impossible under a spoils system, pride and enthusiasm in the public service, in which both of them were knights without fear and without reproach. The administration could have given no such practical proof of its regard for reform as their retention in office. One of them, the postmaster, was summarily dismissed at the expiration of his term, nor can any reason connected with the public interest be assigned as the cause of his dismissal. The other, the naval officer, was displaced before the end of his term without a word, or a sign, or a reason alleged. The ablest and most serviceable of experienced public officers are dismissed like messenger boys. There is no other civilized government which pursues in its public service such a course which the President has truly described as brutal, and which he has chosen to pursue.

There is no pretence that the public interest, or the principles of reform, or the professions of the party, or the pledges of the President, required their dismissal. The President, speaking for the party, had made the four pledges which I have mentioned, and every one of them was violated by these dismissals. It is not pretended that there was any reason for the executive action, except the desire to reward party service, which, whether a sound reason or not, the President had publicly disclaimed as a proper motive for appointment or cause for removal. The dismissal in the case of the naval officer was delayed only until the factions of the party which had proclaimed that the public service should not be made party plunder, could agree upon a satisfactory distribution of the spoils. The result is that the two public offices, one of them by far the largest and most important of its kind in the country, which were in themselves conclusive illustrations of the practical value of reform to the public welfare, have been degraded again into prizes of partisan activity by the administration of a party which solicited support upon the plea that reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under its guidance, should be further extended wherever it was applicable. The genius of Shakespeare, which embraces all experience and gives us words for every emergency, in the passionate scene between Hamlet and his mother depicts him as accusing her of conduct which "calls virtue hypocrite," and makes her vows "as false as dicers' oaths."

Do I conceal or distort the significance of the situation? It must be judged, of course, as a whole. Certainly, every act of the administration is not a violation of the party declarations. Every removal is not unjustifiable, nor is every appointment unnecessary. But, whenever a change is made, the essential question, according to the principles of reform and the party pledge, is not whether party politicians demand a change, but whether there are legitimate reasons for it. It is not enough that the appointment of a postmaster or a naval officer shall be acceptable to the party machine of which he is a screw: the vital question is whether the interests of the public service and the express engagements of the party with the country require that a perfectly competent and satisfactory officer shall be dismissed. This question is not answered by saying that his successor is personally honest and intelligent. If all the public officers were changed every week, the supply of honest and intelligent successors would not be exhausted. The appointment of a good officer is no excuse for the needless and arbitrary removal of another good officer. This league justly held that the course in regard to the civil service pursued in Massachusetts by the late administration was no excuse for the course pursued in Maryland. It is true that Rome was not built in a day, and that a great reform can not be accomplished at once. That is a sound general proposition. But no executive bent upon reform in the civil service would urge as an excuse for displacing an entirely capable officer that he desired to reward a serviceable partisan with his place. Upon those terms Rome would not only never have been built, but the first stone would never have been laid.

NO MITIGATION

The President has selected an admirable civil service commission. Every member of it is a sincere believer in the necessity and the practicability of reform; and its vigilance and vigor are the best earnest of its effective service. He has refused, also, to extend the time appointed for including the railway mail service within the rules, and he has authorized the publication of the eligible lists. Besides these few executive acts, the significance of which is destroyed by the general executive course, there is little that shows any effective party regard for the resounding promises of the platform. The new administration senators and representatives who have professed to favor reform, and who lashed with stinging rhetoric the failures and inconsistencies of the late administration, now, when their conviction and courage find a fitting opportunity, are passive and silent. They see the general violation of pledges by which the party pledged them. They see the principles which they declare ought to control the power of appointment and removal openly disregarded. They see the abuses running riot, and apparently with their connivance, which they have themselves denounced. Yet, instead of frankly refusing to do what they joined in declaring should not be done, instead of indignant protest in the name of their party and of honest politics which should alarm those who make merchandise of the party faith and of the public service, they wail feebly that it is doubtful if the country really wants reform, that the pressure of trading politicians is very strong, and that there are many other important questions; and the Massachusetts convention, in face of the familiar and flagrant facts, congratulates the President upon the practical wisdom and honest purpose with which he has dealt with the complicated and difficult matter of appointments—praise which was as justly due to the first great presidential spoilsman, Andrew Jackson, as it is to his latest successor.

There is, indeed, a firm and strong protest in a portion of the party press against the abandonment of the platform. But these papers, like the leaders, do not condemn the constant contempt for reform shown by the administration. They commend the personal character of those who are appointed to office, without stating frankly that it is not the appointment but the removal which truly indicates the spirit and drift of the administration. They speak in no tone of challenge and command and conscious power to arrest the executive and the party chiefs of every degree in the reckless repudiation of good faith with the country. Unwilling to own that the platform promise and the executive pledge are of those professions

"That palter with us in a double sense;
That keep the word of promise to our ear,
And break it to our hope,"

they serve only like stakes planted in a current to show the swiftness of the stream. One of them only, so far as I know, and that a republican journal in Philadelphia, with an independence worthy of an American newspaper, with whatever party in sympathy, says of the administration what must be accepted as a just verdict: "The administration, in almost every one of its acts since it was inaugurated, on the 4th of March last, has scouted and flouted civil service reform and trampled under foot its own promises to respect it. It has turned it out of doors and barred the doors against it. That is the truth about the matter, in brief; and the administration and its organs could do no better, wiser thing, than to frankly confess that, having found civil service reform to interfere with its plans, it whistled it down the wind as remorselessly as it would dismiss an objectionable tramp."

So say you, Mr. Foreman, so say we all, gentlemen of the jury. There was never a more comprehensive and significant declaration of reform made in a party platform than that under which the present administration came into power. But no party ever broke faith with itself and with the country more completely. It is not, however, a new situation. During the nine years of the existence of the league, whatever may have been the profession, reform has not been the practice of either party. Nevertheless, it has advanced steadily and surely in the face of party contempt and wrath and denunciation.

"Yet, Freedom! yet thy banner, torn, but flying, Streams like a thunder-storm against the wind."

Last year, I recounted in detail the actual achievements of reform in the laws and in practice. They mark the rising tide of public sentiment. "With public sentiment," said Mr. Lincoln, "nothing can fail; without public sentiment, nothing can succeed." The severe standards by which executive conduct in regard to the civil service is tested by intelligent and independent citizens who believe that honesty is the best political policy; the impressive and startling contrast offered in the centennial year of the constitution between the tone and the course of the first and later administrations; the deepening sense of shame that alone among the great powers of Christendom we degrade our own public service—all show unmistakably how profoundly the public conscience is stirred. The great spectacle of the moment is a great object lesson. The argument for reform is steadily driven home by wanton party prostitution of the public service. Happily, there is a conservative and patriotic public intelligence which is the sure and invincible bulwark of popular institutions, because it saves popular impulse from its own excesses. When that intelligence fails, the republic ends. But that it is not failing our recent history shows. It has already exerted from party a profession of reform. It will presently compel a policy of reform, unless, as Goldwin Smith suggests, party can be maintained only by corruption and the bribery of place. But that is not yet the American faith. We do not believe that popular government is possible only when dishonest. But, on the contrary, although taught by recent and startling experience that corruption is today the chief peril of the republic, and believing that nothing more certainly stimulates it than the practice of converting the vast sum of the salaries of the civil service into a bribery fund at every national election, we have seen the awakening and the advance of the spirit of reform. As with all progress worth fighting for, the contest is stubborn and resolute. Delays and defeats are inevitable, but temporary. The advance is sure. The thunders of the church did not persuade Galileo that the earth did not move; and the roar of the party machine and the gross violation of public pledges by the President, the postmaster general, by senators and representatives in congress, by party committees and local leaders, all of which we have heard and seen before, do not convince us that the reform sentiment of the country is not stronger every day.

THE TIDE-WATERS AND THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY.

The familiar plea by which the partisan prostitution of the civil service is defended is that the administration should be entrusted to the friends of the national policy which has been approved at the polls. This is true of every post in the administration of which the duties are in any degree affected by the election. But it is true no farther, and it is true of but a very small number of places. The subordinate executive agents, as such, have no political duties. They are sworn simply to administer the law. If they are honest, their political views can not injuriously affect their diligence and devotion to their duties. If they are dishonest, their political views can not qualify them for public employment. Those who raise the cry that the government, meaning the civil service, ought to be in the hands of its friends shall not escape by refusing to say what they mean. If the cry does not mean that a postmaster would be more honest, energetic, and efficient in the handling and distribution of the mail because of his political views, it has no legitimate meaning whatever. It is merely a black flag flown at a masthead. It means only that we have captured the administration, and not content with enacting and executing the laws, which is our true end as a party, we make prize of the vast emoluments of the civil service to distribute among our followers as booty.

But this cry is fatal for those who raise it; for it is the confession that a partisan service is so corrupting that it unfits men for honest and eminent public duty. It leaves the champions of spoils contending for a system which they admit to be demoralizing. It asserts that a public servant who is faithful and capable under an administration which favors a national bank, for instance, will become dishonest or inefficient under one which prefers a sub-treasury, because, if he remain honest and efficient under the new administration, then, as his views do not affect his conduct, the public interest does not demand a change. Whoever alleges that an American citizen, whatever his political views may be, will do his sworn duty less efficiently, or even connive at the violation of laws which he is sworn to obey, because his party has not made the laws, accuses him of being a fool or a knave. To assert this of the great body of public officers is to brand American citizens as rascals. Yet this is the assumption of the theory that every non-political employe in the public service should change with a party change of administration. Why should such public officers be expected to regard their oaths more strictly, or to do their duty more faithfully, because they agree with the political views of the president, than the employes of a great private corporation because they agree with the religious views of the superintendent?

I will take an illustration familiar to all of us. The late postmaster of New York was a republican. But when a democratic administration came into power, he was reappointed postmaster. Did that administration betray its trust and wrongfully imperil the public service by retaining an important officer, who, not holding the political views of the President, under the theory we are considering, would be passive, careless, and inefficient in the discharge of his duties? In fact and by the record, did this difference of political view in the least degree affect the energy, the devotion, the ability of this man, who served his country as faithfully and at a sacrifice as great as any hero of the war? Did he flout his oath, did he connive at inefficiency and sloth and delay and misconduct in the postal service, in order to discredit the party with whose political views he did not agree? Had he no honor as a man? Had he no pride in the good name of the American government? Was he so poor a creature as to derange the business convenience of the metropolis of the continent, despite his oath, his honor, and his fame, because he was a republican and the President a democrat?

To ask the question is to answer it. Mr. Pearson was the same upright, faithful and honorable officer under democratic ascendancy that he had been under republican administration. Yet, warm as my regard for the man, and high as was my admiration of the public officer, I do not think that he was singular in this honorable fidelity to his trust. Americans are not the scoundrels that the common spoils theory assumes. What Mr. Pearson was, in honesty and fidelity, the great multitude of public officers and employes would be, if selected and retained as he was for his fitness, and not for his opinions. It is one of the worst evils of the spoils system that it tends to corrupt this honesty and to destroy this fidelity by making personal favor and political opinion, not proved fitness, both the condition of appointment and of the official tenure. Therefore it is that the removal of every such officer solely that his office may be degraded to a reward for partisan activity is a gross public wrong, a deadly blow to political morality, to the self respect of honest public servants, and to the American name.

The successful party in the election of last year pledged itself to promote civil service reform, "to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectually avoided." It was not the power of patronage, but a great, humane, patriotic purpose that created the party which made that declaration. Did the complete control of the patronage of the government for a quarter of a century, a patronage enormously increased and extended, and bestowed solely upon partisans, strengthen the party in public confidence, or elevate its leadership, or secure its ascendancy? Is it not true that, with the great increase of patronage, political corruption has greatly and consequently increased within the party and throughout the country? Is it less true that the determination no longer to treat the vast sums paid in public business salaries as a fund to reward partisan service would be the first serious check to the corruption which now threatens our political life? Thirteen years ago one of the most eminent of republican leaders said in the senate—and if it was true then is it less true now?—"I have heard the taunt from friendliest lips that, when the United States presented herself in the east to take part with the civilized world in generous competition in the arts of life, the only product of her institutions in which she surpassed all others beyond question was her corruption." When, three years hence, we welcome that world upon our western shores to another competition of proficiency in those arts, shall we be content with industrial superiority and material splendor? While our inventive genius, our daring enterprise, our swift civilization of a continent, may stir the wonder of the world, shall it not be our proudest boast that, as the material miracle has been wrought under popular government, our greatest achievement is the moral miracle of the constant purification of that government by the virtue and intelligence of the people?

THE THANKSGIVING DAY SERMON.

The progress of this movement continues to be encouraging. It is not possible to note this month more than the following:

Resolved, That in accordance with a suggestion made by Mr. Herbert Welsh, on behalf of the National Civil Service League, the ministers belonging to the Pacific Unitarian conference are requested to take for the subject of their sermons at the approaching Thanksgiving Day service "The Reform of the National Civil Service," or to devote at least a portion of their discourse to it, believing, as we do, that it is a theme of vital importance to our country, and should enlist the warm support of our pastors and people.

An appeal has been issued to the ministers of the United States, urging them to unite on Thanksgiving Day, or such other day as may seem suitable or convenient, in the presentation of the subject of civil service reform.

In general, a pastor can scarcely be too careful with regard to the public expression of his views on such matters as may invite the heat of discussion, or engender rivalries between those of differing positions, classes or political views. He is and must be first, last and all the time a religious leader. His one object, to which all others must be subordinated, should be to help men in their soul experiences to lead the life of Christ. As pastor he must know no republican or democrat, no employer or employed, no public official or private servant. His people are all individual souls, to be helped by him in their individual life with God. At the same time he is a citizen, and not only may but must have personal opinions on public affairs which must guide his public action. How to be unwavering in the one, and at the same time true to the other, is often a matter of great difficulty, and needs the most careful tact and judgment. It is as essential that a man be a Christian at the polls as in his home, yet to emphasize the requisites for Christians voting, and not to imply that they are coincident with the preacher's own political preferences, is no easy matter. The result has been too often that preachers refused to take up in the pulpit the great questions of government, and there are multitudes to whom the ideas of Christianity and politics are as far removed as possible from each other. This extreme is just as wrong as the other. While it is none of the business of the pulpit to discuss party politics, it is the bounden duty of the pulpit to present as fully and clearly as possible the principles that should control party politics.

The question of civil service reform, however, is in no sense a party question. It is one that involves the comfort and the rights of every community. It embraces in its scope the principles that should underlie all government in its local relations, in that it emphasizes the "service" element, brings out most forcibly the truth that public office is a public trust, that the public official should be as impartial, as unbiased in his public action, as the preacher himself in his church duties. The Homiletic Review for October.

THE REPUBLICAN PRESS ON CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

[For want of space a considerable number go over to next issue.]

General Harrison has spoken in no uncertain terms of his purpose to promote and perfect the great reform. Between cringing on the one hand and trickery on the other, the present administrators of the civil-service law and rules have lost public confidence. By the elimination of those non-progressive agents of reform, and the appointment of men honestly in sympathy with the principles involved, such progress may be made under the new President that retrocession will be impossible hereafter. With educated, alert, and faithful men in every branch of the civil service, it may one day become and be deemed as honorable to serve in that as in the naval or military service—Frank Leslie's [Rep.], December 1, 1888.

Of course many removals will be made—many ought to be made for the good of the government—but anything like a clean sweep will react upon the party and jeopardize its welfare.—Baltimore American [Rep.] November 27, 1888.

The cause of civil service reform has not yet made such progress but that there are some republicans who openly avow their approval of the doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils," and who unhesitatingly advocate a clean sweep of all democrats in office. It was this very doctrine and practice that created a necessity for civil service reform. The movement did not come any too soon, and, if held to its original purpose, it can not be too earnestly prosecuted for the welfare of the country. The fact that it has been made more or less odious by hypocritical professions and Pecksniffian pretenses is not the fault of the movement itself. The movement is essentially right. It aims to reduce the business administration of the government to business principles, to place it on a stable basis, to remove the minor offices from the field of mere political spoils, and to make merit and efficiency ruling principles in appointments and promotions. It is impossible to deny the justice of a movement that aims at these ends. All good citizens and both parties alike are interested in their accomplishment. They must be accomplished if our civil service is to be saved from becoming the mere prey of spoilsmen and a perpetual source of corruption and danger to the government. No government can be permanently maintained on a basis that openly defies business principles which are founded in the common sense of mankind. Civil service reform in its true sense—that is, in the sense of introducing an element of stability into the civil service and conducting it on a basis of merit and efficiency, rather than of mere political spoils—civil service reform in this sense has come to stay, and will move forward rather than backward. The republican clean-sweepers should not be unreasonable in their demands on the next administration. The democrats made that mistake four years ago, and republicans should profit by their example. The more unreasonable the demands and expectations in this regard the greater the liability to disappointment, and of its proving a source of party weakness. Those who make it forget that the republican party is fully committed by its platform pledges to civil service reform, and that General Harrison has declared himself in full sympathy with it; they forget that the clean-sweeping business was one of the main counts in the indictment against the democratic party, and the consequent demoralization of the public service one of the principal causes of its defeat.—Indianapolis Journal [Rep.], November 23, 1888.

The curse of office-seeking appears in two ways—it prevents a President, senator or congressman from exercising any possible statesmanship, and it leads to the election of men to those positions who have no ability for statesmanship even if they should have time for its use.—Omaha Republican [Rep.]

Shrewd political managers will see after awhile that the doctrines of civil service reform are as beneficial to the discipline of party as they are to the efficiency of the government service.—Louisville Commercial [Rep.]

The republican party is thoroughly committed to the advocacy of this reform, and we do not believe that there is any possibility of the repeal of the law. The efforts in that direction by a few politicians and public men are wasted.—Philadelphia Press [Rep.]

The pressure for office is well nigh intolerable, even with the protection at present afforded by the law, and the only way out of the difficulty is to enlarge the scope of the competitive system to keep pace with the growth of the civil service, or, better still, to gain upon it.—New York Tribune [Rep.]

General Harrison, as is well known, has devoted all his waking hours, even at the risk of seriously endangering his health, to listening to office-brokers and office-seekers. So long as they are encouraged they will make their periodical onslaughts, but once the President puts his foot down and stops it there will be an end of the miserable business, and he need not fear that the people will not endorse and applaud him in taking any step which will relieve him from this unseemly and disgraceful occupation of his time, and give him the opportunity to attend to public business and to devote to it the leisurely care and consideration which it needs.—Chicago Tribune [Rep.]

We believe the mass of the republican party is in favor of strengthening the civil service laws rather than relaxing them or trying to get around them. New York Press [Rep.]

The Lowell [Mass.] Courier [Rep.] tells Senator Blair of New Hampshire that in denouncing civil service reform he "is not a republican in good and regular standing." The Courier explains that "the reform of the civil service is a republican tenet." It has been formally set forth in every republican platform since 1876, and whatever there is of law or practice of the reform is of republican origin. The republican party can not disclaim the doctrine without inconsistency, nor can it ignore it without disgrace.

Patronage kills off more Congressmen than it helps, * * * Even with the President himself, the recognition of his services and abilities as a statesman and national executive officer are almost lost track of in the continual uproar for and against his manner of dispensing the official patronage. Cleveland's failure to please his party in handling the official patronage was more responsible for his defeat than his course upon national questions of statecraft and governmental affairs.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette [Rep.]

Not until the whole rank and file of the host of office-holders are brought fully under the civil service regulations can the main work of the reform really be said to have been accomplished.—Boston Journal [Rep.]

Judging from the declarations of those people, the principle of civil service reform has been abandoned, and, like the old Roman augurs, even the coryphæi of the reform movement are laughing in their sleeves at it as if it were a good joke. But they are mistaken. If there were such abandonment of the civil service reform principle, it would not be difficult to secure a repeal of the law by congress, but this can not be done and will not be done.—St. Paul Pioneer Press [Rep.]

The republicans are battling with that element of weakness, the patronage, and are getting the worst of it. The scramble for offices is disgusting, disheartening; the antagonism of men who last fall professed the most disinterested zeal for the party, but are now squabbling over the division of the political spoils, are making glad the enemy.—Brooklyn Times (Rep.)

And here comes the Philadelphia Press to assert that "the republican party is not going back on its civil service reform pledges to please anybody, much less disappointed politicians." What a whack that is at Ingalls, Blair, ex-Senator Platt, the New York leader, and others, who would fain have the republican party follow the course of the old whig party respecting slavery. That organization would resolve against its extension before election, and afterwards turn round and join in any compromise that would strengthen the institution nationally. The natural result was that the whig party fell by the wayside.—Boston Transcript [Rep.]

The Buffalo Express [Rep.] is not a believer "in the system which makes the senators and representatives assistant presidents in so far as the patronage of their districts is concerned." The Express says that the system "has been tried and found wanting. The scandals it gave rise to under former administrations weakened the republican party by creating factions and faction-chiefs, and by driving from the entire organization some of its best members. Its only good result was the passage of the national civil service law."

Certain republican members of congress who have not obtained all the offices they want vent their discontent by flings at the civil service law, and democratic papers eagerly pick up their remarks as evidence that republican support of the reform is diminishing. But a handful of discontented congressmen do not represent the party. The reform is here to stay.—Boston Journal [Rep.].

The Milwaukee Sentinel [Rep.] says that it is not "disposed to commend Mr. Clarkson's activity with the cleaver."

That the faith of the republican party is pledged to promote the best good of the civil service of the country.—Iowa Republican Platform, 1874.

THE MEETING OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE.

The National League of civil service reform associations held its annual meeting in Philadelphia, October 1 and 2. The resolutions adopted were as follows:

First. The National Civil Service Reform League gladly recognizes the steady advance of the reform sentiment in the public mind, and the good results already happily achieved in legislation.

Second. The national convention of the party now administering the government made the following declaration:

"The men who abandoned the republican party in 1884, and continue to adhere to the democratic party, have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance, of freedom and purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs, or because their candidate has broken his. We, therefore, repeat our declaration of 1884, to wit: 'The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under the republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectually avoided.'"

The president elected upon that platform declared in his letter of acceptance: "In appointments to every grade and department, fitness and not party service should be the essential and discriminating test, and fidelity and efficiency the only sure tenure of office. Only the interest of the public service should suggest removals from office."

Third. It is the duty of the league to consider how these solemn pledges have been fulfilled. The personal character, ability and experience, and the unquestionable and fearless devotion to reform of the members of the civil service commission appointed by the administration and the support accorded to them by the President deserve the heartiest commendation. The administration of the reform law has been improved by regulations making the eligible lists public, and permitting the appointment upon local boards of members whose tenure in the service is independent of the heads of the respective classified offices.

Fourth. The execution of the law, however, is seriously endangered by the appointment, with few exceptions, as heads of offices within the classified service, of men who are not in sympathy with the law or its purposes, but who are in many cases its open or secret enemies. A brief necessary delay in the preparation of eligible lists by the civil service commission was improved to sweep out of the railway mail service hundreds of employes, regardless of efficiency, and into these vacancies were hurried hundreds of partisans of the administration, with but a subordinate regard for their fitness. In the civil service generally, the President seems in great measure to have abdicated his constitutional power of appointment, by placing the appointments at the disposal of partisan leaders, thus enabling them to debauch constituencies and control elections. Thus the pledge of the President, that fitness and not party service should be the sole discriminating test of appointment, is disregarded.

Fifth. An equally flagrant violation of pledges is the removal of thousands of public officers, especially in the postal service, for mere partisan reasons, and especially of some trained by years of faithful service, and universally recognized to be peculiarly fitted for their several positions, and whose only fault was their unwillingness to seek the favor of influential politicians by subordinating to their interests those of the country. Against these excesses of the spoils system, whereby its injustice and cruelty are strikingly illustrated, the league records its unqualified protest.

The league also expresses its regret at the refusal of the President to extend the civil service examinations to the census bureau, inasmuch as the proper discharge of the duties of that bureau imperatively demands entire freedom from partisan spirit.

Sixth. The league renews its earnest declaration of the wisdom of the repeal of the four years laws, which are the fruitful source of political removals. When the power of removal is unrestricted, it is of the highest importance that every officer should be held to the responsibility which accompanies authority, and that every incentive to the arbitrary exercise of authority should be destroyed. To stimulate the official sense of this responsibility, the league recommends to its constituent associations the widest publication of the details of removals, that the public may be fully informed of any case in which its service may be made subservient to personal and partisan objects.

Seventh. The league renews its recommendation that public officers entrusted with power of appointment and removal should be required by law or executive order to place upon public record all appointments, removals and resignations, and the reason for every removal made by them; and appointing officers, when in their discretion they do not select those rated highest upon the eligible list presented to them, should be required in each case to file their reasons for such action.

While fully recognizing that the absolute power of removal must be vested in the appointing power subject only to a sound discretion, the league holds that the system of making removals upon secret charges of specified acts proffered by unknown accusers, with out opportunities for explanation or denial, is inquisitorial in its character, unjust in its results, and, like the spoils system itself, repugnant to the spirit of American institutions.

Eighth. The league warmly approves the appeal to the clergy of the United States to commend to the people the moral aspect of the question of reform. The promotion of public honesty, and the stay of increasing corruption, are not political or partisan questions; they are concerns of the truest patriotism and the pulpit in the discharge of its office of applying eternal principles of morality to human conduct, and aiding nations as well as individuals to walk in the right way, may well demand of the public conscience that specific and acknowledged evils affecting the highest public welfare shall be speedily and effectively redressed.

WORK MAPPED OUT.

A special committee of the league advocated the following plan of agitation, which was adopted:

The report from the special "Committee on Work," as named by Mr. Wheeler, was then read by that gentleman. It outlines a plan of procedure, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the several associations constituting the league be requested, without delay, to take appropriate action to secure adequate appropriations for the civil service commission; to promote the confirmation by the senate of the commissioners lately appointed, and to guard against legislation hostile to merit system, and as means to these ends that each of said associations prepare and circulate suitable petitions; appoint delegations to visit Washington, present these petitions to congress, and obtain public hearings before committees of that body; hold public meetings at which addresses on the topics above indicated may be delivered, resolutions adopted and committees appointed to lay these resolutions before congress; interrogate senators and representatives from its state before the meeting of congress (whenever this course seems to be advisable) as to their respective sentiments on the foregoing subjects, and make judicious representations to them calculated to induce favorable official action on their part; promote public expressions of opinion by noted citizens and the press, advocating the adoption by congress and the President of a policy in accordance with the principals of civil service reform; collect and transmit to the secretary of the league, and to journals friendly to the cause of reform, the facts respecting removals from office, and the working of the reformed system whenever it is in force, and that the secretary of the league communicate such facts to the several associations.

Resolved, That the secretary of the league transmit the foregoing resolution to the secretaries of the several associations, with a letter urging its prompt consideration, and that the president of the league address to the presidents of the several associations a circular letter suitable for publication, impressing upon them the importance of the action therein advised.

Resolved, That the executive committee of the league co-operate with the several local associations in organizing the agitation proposed in the first resolution, and assist them in obtaining well known speakers for their meetings, and proper introductions for their delegations and committees in the national capital, and that it cause to be prepared maps, with appropriate quotations and statistics, for exhibition at public meetings.

Resolved, That the several monthly papers published in the interest of civil service reform be requested to have at least one article in each issue, between December and June next, devoted to the subject of congressional action relative to the reform, and to send marked copies of each issue to the persons whose names shall be furnished them by the executive committee of the league, the actual cost of publishing such additional numbers to be defrayed by the league, and that the several associations be requested to promote the circulation of these papers, especially among those who are not members of such associations.

Resolved, That the executive committee be authorized, in their discretion, to undertake a thorough investigation of the working of the civil service law under the present administration, and for this purpose to secure, if they shall think fit, one or more suitable representatives, who shall further, if approved by the committee, present the cause of civil service reform to popular audiences in different parts of the country and aid in the organization of associations in union with the league, and also obtain information as to proposed legislation at Washington; correspond with the executive committee and local associations, see that petitions and resolutions are duly presented and delegations and committees received, and generally promote, by all proper means, the objects of the league.

Resolved, That, to meet the expenses of the action which the executive committee is hereby authorized to take, the treasurer of the league request the treasurers of all the affiliated societies to send him the names of persons in their judgment able and willing to contribute toward such expenses, and then send to all persons thus suggested a circular setting forth the importance of the proposed work, and asking their assistance in paying for it.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

To promise or confer public office as a bait or reward for personal or party service is always and everywhere immoral; it is a breach of trust and a form of bribery.—CHARLES J. BONAPARTE.

"PATRONAGE has been the great drawback of my life. If it had not been for patronage I would have been nominated for president of the United States. You can put it down as a rule that when you make half a friend by some appointment, you will make from twenty to forty enemies. For instance, take the Columbus postoffice. There are eight applicants, and each one is strongly recommended. The one to be appointed will probably consider he is entitled to it anyway, and the other seven will each form a nucleus for a mass of dissension."—Senator Sherman.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE will be glad to receive copies or reports of those sermons preached on Thanksgiving Day that touch upon civil service reform. It is especially desired to know of those preached in this state.

THE admirable address of Mr. Henry A. Richmond, of Buffalo, N. Y., before the Young Men's Christian Association of that city, has been printed. Mr. Richmond was one of the civil service commissioners of that state, and he therefore speaks with authority. The Indiana Civil Service Reform Association has a limited number of copies for distribution.

DURING the Indiana campaign of 1888 James N. Huston was chairman of the republican state committee. Soon after his inauguration President Harrison having been elected upon a platform which said "the spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments," made the head of the republican machine, United States treasurer. Mr. Huston accepted the place and proceeded to Washington. His duties as treasurer, however, seemed secondary and announcements began to appear that he was holding gatherings to determine the distribution of offices in Indiana. For a time it was believed that he was the lord of the Indiana manor, and his rooms became as popular as the office of George Law's subscription books. He was turned out of one boarding house because the crowds seeking his favor swamped the operations of the house. Having moved to a hotel the rush continued for a while and then suddenly died away. It came out that

Mr. Huston was desirous of having "head-quarters" in Washington where all persons desiring a federal office relating to Indiana should apply and receive or be refused office by him. President Harrison, for reasons of his own, declined to sanction this plan which caused a coldness on the part of Huston. It was not known until lately how the matter was arranged. For this later knowledge we are indebted to the Indianapolis News which got the facts from L. T. Michener, who has succeeded Mr. Huston as chairman of the republican state committee, and who says:

"When I became chairman of the state central committee, the assignment of such fourth-class post-offices as remained in democratic hands in democratic congressional districts was put into my hands. I found most of the postoffices in these districts already provided with republican postmasters when I came in. Before I was given control of them, their assignment was in Mr. Huston's hands. If my recommendations of applicants have conflicted with those of Mr. Huston, and been given precedence over them, I am not aware of it."

THE fourth class postmasters have important duties to perform and they are more intimately associated with the great mass of the people than any other class of federal officers. They have no possible reason for existence as officers except to perform those duties efficiently and courteously. Mr. Michener as chairman of the state committee, is actively engaged in putting the republican machine in order for the campaign next year. With the consent of President Harrison he is using the fourth class post-offices to strengthen this machine, and as part of it, to help carry the election at that time. These men will be expected to see to primaries and conventions in the interest of the man who appoints them. They will be expected to contribute money and work in the campaign for the nominees of a party although they are paid by all the people. This is the personal and party service which they will render for the offices that are now being given them. This is the Mahone business over again, and the Mahone business has come to be a very dangerous business.

It is called the American system. This "is keeping the offices near to the people." A system like that described in Mr. Dana's article in another column, which would make these officers dependent only upon their efficiency and character and leave them to reasonably and fully exercise their political rights, is un-American, aristocratic, savors of monarchy, forms a privileged class, and is attended with many other evils. Appointing to office according to the order of a chairman of a political committee is an insulting and offensive piece of despotism. To permit it is not only to violate the plain promises upon which President Harrison was elected but it is to make a corrupt use of the appointing power.

THE result of the election in Virginia more than met the repeatedly expressed hope of the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE. The spoils system was used by the republicans in its most efficient development. No man in the country except Gorman can handle public offices and bring the emoluments connected with them to bear upon an election better than Mahone. President Harrison was very deliberate about it; he knew Mahone and his methods; he had other advice and plenty of it from Virginia republicans, but he decided to put the federal service connected with Virginia into the hands of the head of the machine. He risked the whole case upon putting the spoils theory into complete practice and he constituted Mahone in effect a feudal chief. The latter relentlessly used all the power thus given. The Valley Virginian, a republican paper, says, that the only question in the campaign was Mahone and Mahone methods. He was beaten by 42,000 majority, and the result must gladden the heart of every good citizen.

The elections in other states afford ground for similar satisfaction. In Iowa Clarkson had carried on his operation of dividing the offices to the greatest extent. In subsidizing the press, in rewarding friends and punishing enemies, and in a wholesale political proscription, he had given the spoils system its fill. He had impudently and boastfully tabulated his work and published it, columns long, in his paper. He had been made an assistant postmaster-general because of his supposed capacity to divide offices rapidly and with the least friction among the workers, refusing the weak and unimportant, making small gifts to others, placating the dangerous and insatiable with larger bribes, and distributing "plums" to administration favorites. He did his best, and the result is that the democrats have carried Iowa for the first time since the republican party was formed, in 1854.

New York has been managed upon the principles of Plattism, and a studied emphasis was given to those principles by the displacement of such officers as Pearson and Burt. That state was full of republicans like Sherman S. Rogers, whose advice would have elevated the party, but instead the resurrection and domination of Platt, a sly machine worker, was preferred by President Harrison.

In Ohio the key-note of the campaign was given by Congressman Grosvenor in a speech abusive and contemptuous of civil service reform. Congressman Cooper, who as chairman of the nominating convention made a strong speech in the line of republican reform promises, was retired from the active list in the campaign. The head of the ticket, Foraker, characterizes civil service reform in private as "all rot." Here, too, the party had the full control and benefit of the federal patronage. Yet in Ohio and New York the republicans on election day were helpless.

PRESIDENT HARRISON entered upon his office with the determination that he would enforce the civil service law. He may or may not have had it in mind that he would not in his acts give the words of the platform and of his letter of acceptance the meaning which those words clearly have. He may or may not then have determined to give all the offices, over 100,000 aside from the few to which admission must be gained by examination, to personal and party favorites. If he had so determined, his course would have been what it has been. The machinery of our government can never be made to work faster in turning one set of office-holders out and putting in another. In this work the administration has proceeded without rest or relaxation. It has done no other work.

If the offices are necessary to keep a party together and to enable it to carry elections, President Harrison may have the consolation of knowing that he has done the best he could toward imparting that strength. Many bitter criticisms are made against him by the party workers, but unjustly. With only occasional exceptions workers got the places. Ransdall, who was made marshal of the District of Columbia, was certainly "a worker" if ever there was one in Indiana, yet no appointment the President has made has created so much dissatisfaction here. It is true Mr. Hildebrand, who was made collector of customs here, had not been a party worker, but all his deputies were, and his is an exceptional case. These are fair instances, yet all over the country appear such criticisms as this of Congressman Frank, of Missouri, who says that "the President has disorganized the party by his appointments. The men who zealously labor for party success are not to be studiously ignored." The President must feel that party machines at least are ungrateful. He has sacrificed everything upon the altar of the party workers, and now they turn and rend him.

It is not likely that the President values the advice of men outside of his party machine. He has not yet given any sign of changing his course; in fact the signs are that something like a Mahone attempt is to be made in Indiana next year. Nevertheless the administration ought to try to save the respect of somebody. The President ought to be willing to hear reason. He knows that the republican party was in power for twenty-four years and that the offices by means of the party work of the incumbents, and of assessments and of ruthless proscription of any independence of party lines were large factors in keeping the republicans in. But equally powerful was the theory that the democratic party would wreck the country. With the election of Mr. Cleveland the spell was broken. A party can no longer keep control of the country by slave drivers' whips in the hands of the Gormans and the Mahones however much that party may strengthen their arms by federal patronage. The public mind is turned toward administrative reform, and a party in power must not be or appear to be besotted. Apparently President Harrison had not read the signs of the times.

He tried the spoils plan with all his strength, and he has failed. If he keeps on he will fritter away his opportunity to render a great service to his country. He can not make or unmake laws, but in the three years and a half yet remaining he can destroy the spoils system. This is the only field in which he can make himself rank among our greater presidents. We know the objections; his party will fall off from him. It will not fall off more than it has now. He will be at war with the modern barons who pose as congressmen; that is true, and speed the day. He will not be renominated; that may be true, but what of a renomination followed by defeat? The demand of the time is that he disregard objections and be fearless of the consequences. With a statesman's plan, executed with a statesman's boldness, he would accomplish what is now utterly wanting. He would stir and rouse the patriotism of the people, who will gather about a strong man fighting on the right side.

THE road is plain to any one who will see it. Let the President demand of congress an appropriation sufficient for widely extended operations of the civil service commission. Let him bring every clerical position in the federal service within the civil service law. Let him make rules that the non-technical labor service of the country shall be hired according to the system of the Boston labor service. Let him throw the fourth-class post-offices into divisions on lines similar to the railway mail service and operated upon the plan elaborated by Mr. Richard H. Dana. Let him provide a system of filling the larger post-offices by competition among subordinates in a group of offices. These are paths along which the President may pursue a brilliant course. Braced by remembering "the dangers to free institutions that lurk in official patronage," he should, by his constitutional fiat and at whatever cost, once and forever cut off congressmen from that patronage. It is true that like the nobles with a king granting privileges to the people, our oligarchy of spoils dividers would attempt to wreck the President, but in the end the wreckers would be wrecked.

MR. HENRY C. LEA, of Philadelphia, is a far-sighted and powerful advocate of civil service reform. He was a republican, but voted for Mr. Cleveland in 1884 and did all he could to defeat him in 1888 on the ground of betrayal of this reform. In 1889, although presidents and parties may sacrifice their principles, Mr. Lea does not depart from his, as the following extract from his letter in the Philadelphia Times of October 15, shows:

Believing that republicanism represents the higher and nobler interests of the community, I am anxious for its success so long as it fairly upholds those interests. When it proves false to them it is false to itself. It can then be brought to a sense of its duty only by defeat, and its truest friends are those who will not hesitate to rebuke it in the only way made practicable under our system. If it is to remain in power, it can hope for supremacy only by deserving it.

Unfortunately the President seems to have misunderstood wholly the lesson taught by the last election. He has abused the appointing power to place the party in New York under the domination of Tom Plattism, in Pennsylvania under Quayism, in Virginia under Mahoneism. He has degraded it and himself in obedience to a short-sighted opportunism which seeks to utilize the baser element of the party at the expense of the principles to which it and he alike are pledged. Unless his course can be arrested it needs no prophet to foretell that by the end of his administration he will have sunk the party so low in the estimation of its honest members that even the phenomenal capacity for blundering of the democracy will, in all human probability, not save it. If it would teach him wisdom, the most wholesome thing for the party this year would be defeat in New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio.

Mr. Lea is following the only course by which an administrative evil can be rooted out—dealing with the man who is now doing the evil. As he wrote in 1888, "when a farmer nails a chicken hawk to his barn door he not only gets rid of a plunderer, but he gives a wholesome warning to its fellows."

CONGRESSMAN LODGE ON THE DIVISION OF SPOIL.

Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, now a congressman from Massachusetts, has written a letter to the Civil Service Record elaborating some ideas expressed by him before the Middlesex Club recently. He describes himself as a "strong party man," which seems to mean that he is a republican first and a civil service reformer next. He says that President Cleveland is not to be criticised because he made a clean sweep outside of the classified service, but for saying that he would not do it. "All these cries" about the "spirit of the reform" and "wholesale removals" are understood by the American people as depending on party feeling. The republicans look upon the civil service reform associations as democratic clubs in disguise and "do not value their utterances at all." The present spoils system is "thoroughly vicious" in its effects upon "the entire public life of the United States." The only way to get rid of it is by law backed by public opinion. Mr. Lodge also tells us that Mr. Cleveland made a clean sweep of the 300 employes of the Charlestown Navy yard, and now he says "the patronage of the yard has fallen largely into my hands." Also, "if I have not administered it well or judiciously, I am open to fair criticism, as was my predecessor on the other side; but neither is he nor am I open to criticism for the fact that we administered it."

In this naiveté he is only to be compared to Reuben Davis, who has recently written his life of broils and fights, and of whom the Nation recently said, "the author has not a suspicion that he is not a strictly moral and religious man." Mr. Lodge superintends the expulsion of 300 laboring men, many of them supporting families, from their places without a reason in the world except that they do not belong to his party, and that the places are wanted for party favorites. For this he is not to be criticised. It is useless to ask Mr. Lodge the meaning of that sentence in General Harrison's letter of acceptance which reads, "Only the interest of the public service should suggest removals from office." Equally useless would it be to ask him the meaning of that part of the republican platform which reads, "The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments." It is useless also to reason with a man who in his own words thus grades his political morality. We can, however, tell him some plain facts: Following Mr. Josiah Quincy, because many drunkards will have drink, Mr. Lodge is not justified in keeping a doggerly. As to the law which Mr. Lodge wants, the power of appointment is found in the constitution, and in that instrument there is not the slightest authority for using the 300 places in the Charlestown navy yard as Mr. Lodge has used them. Apparently we do need a law to put congressmen in jail for law-breaking. Finally we quote to Mr. Lodge the words of Mr. Bonaparte: "To promise or confer public office as a bait or reward for personal or party service is always and everywhere immoral; it is a breach of trust and a form of bribery." And we assure him that that statement is an absolute truth, and that while he and many others are with the President engaged in violating that truth by using over 100,000 public offices to pay for such service, they are to be and will be criticised, and the criticism ought to be proclaimed from the house-tops.

REMOVALS IN THE FIRE DEPARTMENT.

Trusler and Thalman, two members of the common council of this city, are taking the lead in putting through that body an ordinance providing that no fireman shall be dismissed until charges are filed against him and he has a hearing, and both branches of the city legislature dismiss him by a two-thirds vote in each body. All the republican members seem to be aiding in this business, and the party journals offer no objection. It is given out that the object of the ordinance is to keep politics out of the fire department. Doubtless this is meant as a joke, in view of the fact that early this year these same republicans, led by Trusler, displaced Mr. Webster from his place as chief of that department because he would not dismiss the dozen democrats out of the 82 employes of that department. The restoration of this officer was one plank of the democratic platform in the late city election, and if anything was decided, it was that the people wanted him restored, and with his restoration the banishment of politics from the department. By reason of that election the republicans are soon to lose control of the city government, and now they propose to fly in the face of the expressed will of the city by legislating, not to keep politics out of this department, but to keep politics in in the worst form. The reported declaration of Thalman, "We must take care of our friends," contains the whole matter—the object is to prevent removals except with the consent of the republican minority.

Let it be admitted that the democrats would do the same thing. The duty of a party is not to be gauged by that. The judgment must be upon whether a majority does the right thing for the public business. Civil service reformers are accused of favoring perpetual office-holding. The most extreme have never favored such inflexible permanence as this ordinance proposes. Under this a fireman may be disobedient, and for every reason worthless; yet he has only to have a "pull" upon one-third of the councilmen or aldermen and he is safe. Trusler and Thalman will be part of that third, and they will take care of their "friends."

Now, those who have studied this question most are a unit upon the principle that, to secure efficiency, the power of removal must be left in the head of each department, and must be untrammelled. Beyond this they simply ask that, as no removal is made without a motive, the removing officer shall make a written record of the cause and that such record shall be public. The public then may judge whether a removal is for cause, as, for instance, drunkenness, or whether it is an abuse of power, as would be a removal to make room for a partisan. Although this is the doctrine of the "civil service theorists," its practical sense will appeal to every one. They rely upon public opinion alone to prevent improper removals, and this reliance will not fail. It is only when things can be kept secret that ward politicians control heads of departments. No such officer will ever write in a public record "Removed because he was a democrat and Trusler had a man who worked three weeks for him in the last city campaign and whom he had to provide for." Even the Truslers would be ashamed to have such a public record. We have reached the point where a man's fellow-citizens will take up his cause when he is unjustly dismissed. The case of Mr. Webster, the motive of whose dismissal was well known, is ample proof.

Placed side by side, each system proves the motive which prompts its adoption. The one means a department head, with power to bring and keep his men up to the highest efficiency; this is for the public benefit. The other means a department powerless to enforce discipline without the consent of a minority made up in part of men who have already shown that they will sacrifice the public welfare for a petty partisan gain. The fire department is of vast importance to this city, and it should be governed by the strictest business rules, with concentrated authority and absolutely free from partisan influence. When men seek to put upon it a drag like this ordinance, they cease to be public trustees and become public pests. Doubtless we shall always have with us the Truslers and Thalmans, but there is hope that sometime the public will require fitness in a public officer, and this will effectually keep them out of public office.

MR. WANAMAKER IN POLITICS.

At a recent meeting of postmasters in Washington, Postmaster General Wanamaker is reported to have said:

There is necessity for a radical reform in the railway mail service. It matters not to me if a man can talk all day about cube and square root, theorems, and geometry, and climatic effects in Africa and Asia, so long as he does not thoroughly know the section of the country through which his postal car may be running. I would sooner have a postal clerk who knows every nook and corner in his district than some theorist who could tell all about zones and geographical centers remote from his own country; and I shall recommend to congress that the civil service examinations be modified to this extent.

This has been denied, but whether he said it or not it is consonant with his career as postmaster general. In other ways the belief has spread that he means harm to the merit system. Lists of questions have been put to individuals over the country, couched in a form which indicates that the answers are wanted to enable some one to make an attack upon the merit system. From all indications those answers are wanted for Mr. Wanamaker. It is also reported that he will attempt to influence congress to accomplish his end. Mr. Wanamaker belongs to the class of rich men wholly ignorant of what is peculiarly known as politics, who are often chosen as a respectable cat's-paw when the party bosses want "to pander to the moral sentiment of the community." Flattered by the distinction the man thus chosen readily quiets his conscience and adapts himself to the new requirements that while a Sunday-school is run upon one set of principles, politics have to be run upon another. The result is that acting upon this practical tenet in this newsphere he generally out-Quays the Quays. His newly rounded character is now upon the level of the plantation negro who worships lustily in the evening meeting and steals chickens on the way home.

In this case Mr. Wanamaker was first selected to raise money for the campaign. He collected a large sum, and with arguments which look queer when placed beside the principles which are supposed to guide a religious man, he attempted to raise another large sum and failed. Next he was made postmaster-general, and under him hundreds of railway mail clerks have been dismissed in plain violation of promises, and deprived of means of supporting their families, and in the same manner some 30,000 fourth-class postmasters have been dismissed without cause, and to make room for 30,000 political mercenaries trained to uphold the Quays.

On one day in the week he exhorts a large Sunday-school to acts of Christian charity, kindness and tolerance, and on the other six days he affords an object lesson on an enormous scale of sly intolerance, cruelty, and meanness that would be shocking in a barbarian.

THE MARYLAND ELECTION.

In the recent election another effort was made in Maryland to break the grip by which Senator Gorman holds the state. There is no other case of modern feudalism in the country which compares with this. Year after year the attempt has been made to break up his machine. It would have been accomplished in 1887 if President Cleveland had not sustained Gorman by giving him control of the federal patronage. The surrender of President Cleveland to Gorman, and of President Harrison to Mahone, are and always will be two very black spots upon the presidential office. The recent result shows that the long-continued and determined efforts of some of the best democrats in Maryland to free their state from Gorman's control is having its effect. In the meantime they may rest assured that their work is not without appreciation. We quote from a private letter from a correspondent exceptionally well informed in relation to the election:

I do not think that the party workers who passed the anti-civil service reform resolutions, as a rule, knifed the fusion ticket. So far as I could see, the great majority of them supported the movement with a fair degree of earnestness.

Of course the issues upon which the fusion leaders made the fight were away above the heads of the "boys". But as the "spoils" of the republican victory of 1888 are in Maryland as yet for the most part undistributed, the "heelers" as a rule seemed to think that their best policy was to work hard for the ticket which the republican party had officially endorsed. While this however is, I believe, true, it is also true that some republican votes were given to the ring ticket, and that a great many more republican votes were not polled at all.

There are in Baltimore, and I suppose almost everywhere else, a certain number of party men who are always stupidly and bitterly opposed to any fusion with any persons belonging to the other party. They will not vote for a ticket which is the result of such a fusion. Then whenever the ring's control of the city and state is threatened, it fights a good deal harder than it does when only the president or a member of congress is at stake. It buys republican votes, white and black, probably more of the former than of the latter. It pulls all the wires that control of the courts and police force give it over people engaged in liquor selling and other still more questionable pursuits, a minority of whom are republicans. It is probable that in this canvass, from these several causes, the regular democrats received the votes of at least 1,500 republicans, while perhaps 2,000 more deliberately refused to vote. The ring began their preparation for the campaign by raiding the registration lists. By striking off all the republicans, for whose striking off they had color of excuse, and by leaving on all the democrats they were not actually compelled to strike off, they managed to get off the lists at least 2,000 more republicans than democrats. On election day repeaters were extensively employed throughout the city, and in many parts of the city workers for the fusion ticket were assaulted and beaten by the democratic roughs. In some precincts the judges of election were changed on the night before the election when it was too late to protest against the new appointees. In some precincts the fusion watchers were excluded from the polling rooms. This violence and fraud must have been worth at least 3,000 votes to the ring.

Mr. Cleveland's plurality last year in Baltimore was 5,000. As above stated, the registration lists were manipulated so as to cause the republicans a net loss of 2,000 votes, 1,500 republicans, making a change of 3,000 votes, voted the democratic ticket, 2,000 more did not vote at all, and fraud and violence counted for 3,000 more votes. If we add to Cleveland's plurality of 5,000, the republican net loss in registration 2,000, 1,500 republicans voting the democratic ticket 3,000, republicans who did not vote 2,000, ring gain by fraud 3,000, the majority the ring would have had, had no democrats voted against them, would have been 15,000. But their actual majority was only 3,000, so that 6,000 democrats, counting 12,000 on a division, must have voted the fusion ticket.

The ring, then, by the exertion of its every resource, and by the perpetration of every kind of election rascality, returned itself a majority of 3,000 votes in the city, but for the first time since the war it failed to return a solid democratic delegation to the legislature. One of the three legislative districts of the city returns a solid republican delegation of six. Year after year, as the fights keep on, one part of the state or city after another slips from the control of the dominant party.

We are by no means discouraged and intend to keep up the fight as persistently as ever.

The Old Dominion Republican League, made up chiefly of office-holders, is one of those organizations that exist in Washington solely to raise money to help party leaders carry state elections. This body took measures to help Mahone carry Virginia, and its committee got out a circular asking for money for this purpose and mailed it to government employes in government buildings. Three members of the committee were office-holders. Mr. Thompson, of the civil service commission, first heard of it, and promptly took steps to bring violators of the law to account. Certain newspaper correspondents began to telegraph out from Washington that Mr. Thompson's "reconstruction was not thorough," but Mr. Roosevelt at this juncture returned and seconded Mr. Thompson with his well-known vigor. Probably Mr. Roosevelt will now have to be "reconstructed." The law declares that no office-holder shall anywhere solicit money of another office-holder, and that no person shall solicit money of an office-holder in a government building. For office-holders to send a circular asking money of other office-holders, and for this committee to send such a circular into a government building to office-holders seem clear violations of the law. The matter will be brought to the attention of the grand jury. Nobody is deceived by the pretense that the clerks in Washington wanted to contribute to Mahone. They were in constant terror lest Mahone should get them out of their places. There has been enough talk about this matter of assessments, and when three men go upon a committee and get out what is in effect an assessment circular, they know what they are doing. There are two men in Washington who have a duty to perform in this matter which they can not shirk upon the grand jury. These are Secretary Noble and President Harrison. They have no right to keep in the government service these three deliberate violators of the law.

How easy it would be to protect government employes and stop this blackmailing if their superiors really wanted to do it. The urgent invitation by the present civil service commission to all persons to come forward and compete for employment, and the bold assurance that all would be treated fairly, has for the first time inspired general confidence in the working of the law. So in this case, a government clerk is asked for money by campaign managers not because he is able to pay it, for he is no more able than the average citizen, but because he can be frightened into paying it by an implied threat. If the President is anxious to stop this business, let him give notice that while any government employe is free to contribute to any object he chooses, he is also absolutely free to refuse to contribute to any party purpose and he shall be safe in such refusal and that the law protecting him from the vengeance of party bosses for refusal to pay money shall not be evaded.

WHEN Mr. Saltonstall became collector of the Boston custom house in 1885 there were 334 employes. Of these 222 now remain. Of the 119 who were separated from the service, 34 were removed by the department to reduce the force, and 7 of these have been reinstated by the collector; 17 resigned, 14 died, 7 were dropped as private warehouses went out of bond, and 47 were removed for cause. There were no removals for political reasons. The collector has never found any difficulty in giving reasons for removals. After the first onslaught for places by the party workers had been successfully resisted, the "pressure" fell off and soon ceased. Collector Saltonstall's administration of the merit system has conquered criticism and now has the approval of his critics. It is an object lesson in civil service reform, and as is always the case under this system, with less force he has done more work. This comes from putting at the head of an office a friend of the law and a man who is not afraid of politicians. We ask Congressmen Hoar, Dawes and Lodge why Collector Saltonstall should not be retained?

GENERAM RAUM is reported in the Indianapolis Journal to have said:

"I find that the clerks are willing to cheerfully accede to any demand that I may make upon them if it affects their retention in office. They are all glad to buckle down to business and do everything that is required, and are perfectly contented if only permitted to remain. Very many of them have been expecting to be forcibly retired, and they seem to be more anxious to stay than I ever supposed an employe could be. Ever since the rerating agitation, and the statement that a number of the employes who had to do with the reratings would be discharged, trepidation and fear have reigned throughout the office."

Here is competent evidence that democratic and republican clerks, for the sake of a chance to support their families, are willing to aid the man responsible for the office with all their might. It is precisely what happens in private employment. A Methodist workman feels an interest in the success of his Baptist employer, although they hold diverse religious views, and his employer does not feel that to carry out the "policy" of his business his employe must be a Baptist.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—The editor of the Rahway [N. J.] Advocate has been made postmaster of that town.

—William Smyth, senior editor of the Owego

[N. Y.] Times has been appointed postmaster in place of Frederick O. Cable, removed. The Times is the home organ of Tom Platt.

—J. W. Watrons, editor of the Sunday Telegraph, has been appointed collector of the port of Milwaukee. He "was indorsed by the entire congressional delegation of Wisconsin." It is also stated that "the patronage of the office is large, including eighteen or twenty employes." The commission of the former collector did not expire until May 17, 1890, but he did not resign, and he was, therefore, removed without cause.

—According to the Boston Traveler, Postmaster Lawshe of Xenia, Indiana, runs a paper with a patent inside which it is fair to presume he does not read before publishing. In a recent issue two columns of the patent side were devoted to criticism of the administration. The postmaster has asked mercy by affidavits filed with the department.

—The republican postmaster at Syracuse, New York, served out his term, three years, under President Cleveland, and then the editor of the Syracuse Courier was appointed. President Harrison has now removed him and appointed Carroll E. Smith, editor of the Syracuse Journal. In making this appointment Senator Hiscock overruled Congressman Belden of the Syracuse district, although the latter made a hard struggle. Senator Hiscock has the President's ear and confidence, and in combination with Tom Platt he is irresistible when any spoil is to be divided in that state. Anything which throws light upon the history of such a man is always of interest, especially if it comes from a reliable source. Since Postmaster Smith, who has been the editor of the Journal all along, is Hiscock's man what he says in that paper must be very reliable.

Carroll E. Smith, Nov. 2, 1872.

HISCOCK is a NOTORIOUSLY BAD, UNSCRUPULOUS and DANGEROUS MAN, who seeks to get a seat in Congress for the sole purpose of introducing there the same CORRUPT AND ABOMINABLE PRACTICES WHICH HE, AS A RING ATTORNEY, has successfully practiced at Albany.

Carroll E. Smith, Oct. 26, 1872.

Mr. Hiscock is an accomplished politician in the LOWEST SENSE OF THE TERM. But when he strives to occupy the higher place in politics he fails utterly—for he LACKS MORAL APPRECIATION OF PRINCIPLE.

Carroll E. Smith, Nov. 1, 1872.

Republicans of honor and principle owe Hiscock nothing but EXECRATION AND OPPOSITION TO THE BITTER END.

Carroll E. Smith, Oct. 20, 1872.

By that record [the official record of the canal investigation], he appears to have had a prominent part in at least one of those GIGANTIC SWINDLES BY WHICH THE STATE HAS BEEN ROBBED OF IMMENSE SUMS OF MONEY. * * * The weight of proof is that 25 per cent. was the share of the Hiscocks in this operation—A COOL TEN-THOUSAND-DOLLAR transaction. These investigations must suffice for the public to make up their minds as to the worth and integrity of the man who will thus put large sums of money in his pocket which he and everybody knows were WRONGFULLY TAKEN FROM THE STATE TREASURY. It is cool and deliberate plundering of the people. Mr. Frank Hiscock has provoked this exposure by his lofty and unwarranted pretensions to the character of a reformer.

Carroll E. Smith, Oct. 30, 1872.

Like the criminal fleeing from justice, Hiscock and his apologists see an officer of the law in every bush!

NO MAN IN THE STATE OF NEW YORK HAS A DEEPER RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE SCHEMES OF JOBBERY AND WRONG UPON THE TREASURY THAN THIS MAN.

A man who, skilled in the crooked ways of the law and in appliances for evading the conditions of solemn agreements, can first frame a law for relief, then "get it through" the legislature, then control the representative of the canal board taking testimony in the case, then secure a full report for the full amount of excessive damages named in the law, and finally pocket a quarter or fifth of that award—is one who PROSTITUTES GREAT ABILITIES TO THE BASEST AND MOST MERCENARY PURPOSES, perpetrates a flagrant outrage against the people, and becomes infinitely a greater offender against the public and is incomparably a more dangerous man than those who, on their own resources and responsibility, drive a sharp bargain and make all they can out of it in whatever ways the experience and shrewdness of public contractors have taught them.

—C. J. Hovey, a son of Governor Hovey, has been appointed postmaster at Mount Vernon, Ind.

—J. C. De Gress has been appointed postmaster at Austin, Texas. He is chairman of the republican state committee.

—M. P. Curran has been removed from the place of assistant appraiser in the Boston custom house without cause to make room for L. A. Dodge, a relative of Abigail Dodge, a member of Secretary Blaine's family.

—Mr. W. T. Durbin, of Anderson, who is a member of the republican state central committee, visited the departments to-day before his departure for New York, and as a result of his labors some appointments will be made from Madison and Hancock counties.—Special to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 11.

—WASHINGTON, Nov. 13.—The railroad men of Indiana will this week get substantial recognition in the appointment of Augustus D. Shaw to be deputy third auditor of the treasury. Mr. Shaw is one of the bread-winners in the ranks, and is indorsed by railroad employes all over the state. He was one of the organizers and active promoters of the railway workers that did such excellent service for the republican party in the state last year.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal.

—Governor Foraker was not without weapons, although they did not seem to be of avail. He made up the board of public affairs in Cincinnati. This board appoints 1,400 municipal office-holders, lets all contracts for public works, and has a pay-roll of $800,000 a year. The 1,400 appointees are personal or party favorites of Foraker.

—Congressman Wm. Pitt Kellogg, of Louisiana, has been "ignored" by the present administration. He did not want anything himself, but he wanted to dictate the disposal of the patronage in Louisiana. Harrison chose to make Congressman Coleman the dispenser of the spoils, and Kellogg has ceased to admire the Harrison administration.—Special to St Louis Republic, Nov. 11.

—Ex-representative Goff, of West Virginia, makes frequent visits to the capital, and always goes away with the scalps of some democratic office-holders. In fact, he has so much influence with the administration that republicans from his state say Boss Steve Elkins and the minor bosses who train with him have become dissatisfied with him and are laying their plans to secure a larger share of the distribution of patronage. Goff must "tote fair," they say, or prepare for trouble from the wealthy syndicate of politicians headed by Elkins.—Special to New York Times.

—Mr. D. I. Throckmorton, of Lafayette, Ind., is among the arrivals here to-day. He is a candidate for postmaster of that town, and his friends think he will be appointed. It is understood, however, that congressman Cheadle, who resides in Lafayette, prefers the appointment of an ex-soldier, who was a messmate with Cheadle in the army; but, as the former is said to be a saloon-keeper, the President will not consider the recommendation. The congressman, therefore, has signified a willingness to compromise on Throckmorton.—Washington Special Cincinnati Enquirer.

—The Concord postmastership is the subject of a bitter fight. Lysander Carroll, the last republican incumbent, is a candidate and has a host of competitors, and in this case Senator Chandler seems to have over reached himself. Mr. Carroll went to Washington in the early days of the administration, and Senator Chandler materially assisted in getting prominent signers for him. But now up steps Senator Corning, one of Chandler's strongest supporters in the legislature, and asks for the place, refusing to accept the dictum of "too young," and he is only one of several who have special claims on Senator Chandler.

—Census Superintendent Porter has completed a list of places which will be assigned to Pennsylvania in census work. The entire personnel of the service in the state, superintendent, supervisors, and enumerators, will be appointed upon the recommendation of Senators Cameron and Quay in conference in the republican districts with their representatives in congress. With this view a schedule for organization for the collection of statistical data has been prepared for the use of the senators. A great mass of applications of persons for the different places in the state have been accumulating in the census office for the past four months, none of which have been opened, but will be referred in bulk to the senators. As this is the rule which has been adopted, it is useless for persons desirous of positions in Pennsylvania under the census bureau applying to the authorities here.—Special to Philadelphia Inquirer.

—Most of the Brooklyn politicians who have been here hunting for spoils for the last day or two went home to-night. They were joined this morning by Representative Wallace, and they ought not to complain of the result of their visit. With Mr. Wallace's help they secured the appointment of Joseph C. Fuller to be one of the special inspectors in the custom house, and they say they are promised that Granville W. Harmon shall be made an assistant appraiser; that William C. Booth shall be superintendent of the federal building in Brooklyn, and that "Mike" Dady shall fill a similar office in New York. Messrs. Wallace and Woodruff and their companions do not claim that they were promised the speedy out-setting of Postmaster Hendrix they have been so anxiously seeking, but they insist upon it that Brooklyn will have a republican postmaster before many days have passed.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times.

—Postmaster Murray, of Johnstown, New York, was appointed by President Cleveland in February, 1887. His work as postmaster is spoken of in the highest terms. The free delivery system has just been added, and some carriers being needed, the post-office department required Murray to confer with the congressman, who sent him to the republican county committee. This committee named four republicans, refusing the postmaster's request that two of the four should be democrats. Murray sent the names of two republicans and two democrats to Washington. The department requested him to withdraw the names and comply with the orders of the county committee. Murray refused, and the department repeated its directions, to which Murray replied:

UNITED STATES POST-OFFICE,
JOHNSTOWN, N. Y., Sept. 18, 1889.

Hon. Thomas Marche, Acting Superintendent Free Delivery Service, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: Yours of the 16th inst. at hand. For reasons stated in my letter to your office of 12th inst., strengthened by public opinion in this village and community, I feel it would be a violation of my sense of duty and a disregard of the wishes of the patrons of this office to nominate for carriers some of the names mentioned in your letter of the 9th inst. I do not recede from my position stated in my letter of the 12th inst. The more the character and qualifications of the candidates for carriers are examined the more I am convinced that the candidates nominated by me should be appointed. Having in view the success of the service, I respectfully decline to nominate the persons mentioned in your letter, and ask the appointment of the ones nominated by me.

M. D. MURRAY, Postmaster.

—In the division of the patronage last spring the Lincoln postoffice fell to Congressman Connell, of Omaha. All the candidates for the place except one have cultivated his acquaintance in the hope of capturing the plum. This one, the Hon. Charles H. Gere, of the Journal, made his fight in another quarter when it became reasonably certain that the Hon. Ed. P. Roggen stood highest in the estimation of the congressman. Gere laid siege to Senators Manderson and Paddock and asked for a new deal. It is now currently reported that the senators have agreed to force Gere's appointment, they threatening to prevent the confirmation of any other appointment. It is even said they have tendered the place to Gere over Connell's shoulders. Connell was seen this evening and expressed his doubts concerning the rumor. There is a bitter feeling between the Roggen and Gere factions in this city.—Special to Chicago Times, Oct. 16.

—The senate will be reorganized just before time for it to convene in December. The introduction of eight new senators from the four new states will make the reorganization quite interesting, and will bring about an almost complete rearrangement of office-holders. Many of the old men, who have been held in inferior positions, will undoubtedly be asked to give way to new men, that the new senators may be given their share of the patronage. It is understood that the present sergeant-at-arms is calculating to give to each of the new republican senators one position worth from $1,200 to $1,500 a year. This the new senators will not consent to, as there are many of the old senators who are given patronage under the sergeant-at-arms and under the secretary of the senate aggregating away up in the thousands, some of them having twice as much patronage as their own salaries aggregate. The demands of the new senators will undoubtedly cause a great deal of chagrin, and very rightly will dispose of a number of barnacles who have been bobbing along on the old ship of state for a good many years.—Special to Indianapolis Journal, Oct. 22.

—Mr. Brosius, the new member from Lancaster (who, though he never has sat in the house at all, has been elbow deep in office handling since the day his official term began), is criticised by his factional opponents for not getting the democrats out more rapidly. The Examiner, remarking that it doesn't care particularly "who is postmaster at May, Huber, Buck or Chestnut Level, if he be an honest, competent man," spurs up Mr. Brosius concerning the larger and more desirable places, Lancaster, Columbia, Manheim, Strasburg, New Holland, Lititz, Marietta, and all the big boroughs—which, it says, "mean something else." As to these, the Examiner insists, "the rascals"—meaning the democratic incumbents—"should be turned out as soon as possible."

—Now note the reply of the New Era, Mr. Brosius's defender. It sets out to show that he has done everything a reasonable spoils-seeker could ask. At Ephrata, a "big borough," a republican was appointed in June, the democrat who preceded having only had five months in the place. At Manheim a republican was appointed three days earlier than at Ephrata. At New Holland the change was made two months ago. At Strausburg the present incumbent is a woman, "and there is no applicant for her place." At Columbia, Marietta, Mount Joy and Lititz the incumbents were appointed in 1885, 1886 and 1888, and so can not be ousted, except by preferring charges, "as was the case with the change at Ephrata."

Certainly this shows pretty fairly for Mr. Brosius. What more could he do unless he manufactured an applicant for the lady's place at Strausburg, or invented some charges against the officers at Columbia and the other three boroughs? But the New Era clinches the nail at the close of its article. The facts in the foregoing statement, it triumphantly adds, "are still further strengthened by the additional one that Mr. Brosius has sent on to Washington the name of a person to fill the last fourth-class post-office in this country yet held by a democrat, for which there is an applicant.—Philadelphia American [Rep.]."

—The question whether the "patronage" of Berks county should be "distributed" by Mr. High, an agent alleged to have been designated for the work by the United States senators from Pennsylvania, has actually split the republican organization in that county, and two conventions were held on Saturday, two sets of candidates named, and two delegations appointed to attend next year's state convention. The High faction claim that their leader has in his hands the distinct and unmistakable power-of-attorney to parcel out the places—the post-office at Reading being most important—and that to look sourly upon him is not merely to affront the administration and flout the senators, but to forfeit the chance of any appointment. This seems, it is true, rather a sweeping claim, but who shall say where the powers of a local boss begin and end, under the spoils regime? A like designation is said to have been made in Lebanon, as was mentioned last week, and in Lehigh a bitter local fight took place over the matter some weeks ago. In Carbon the case is much the same as in Berks, a split having also occurred there, and two sets of delegates chosen.

Is this sort of thing good for the party that develops it? A dispatch from Reading to the Philadelphia Press says of the fight over High's assumptions, that "there has never been so much bitterness in any political contest in this county, and it is being carried into personal and business matters to an extent never before known."

The Dispatch, of Reading, a calm and contemplative party journal, remarks that "there is scarcely a county in the commonwealth where are not mutterings of discontent that break out in some places into the most emphatic kind of protests." It speaks at some length of the situation in Lancaster, and says that in Lebanon county also "the republicans are very much dissatisfied with the way in which patronage is dispensed there. It has been a common rumor upon the streets of Lebanon, for some time, that the people of that city are to have no say whatever as to who shall be the postmaster of that place, but that an attorney of Harrisburg is to name the successful man—that man his own brother."—Philadelphia American [Rep.].

—S. B. Ginn, of Henrico county, Va., refused a $900 post-office rather than agree to pay one per cent. assessment and have his deputy named by Mahone.

THE CIVIL SERVICE LAW.

Representative Chandler, of Georgia, [Dem.]—"The internal revenue and civil service laws must be abolished. One is a pernicious burden; the other a fraud."

Congressman Reagan [Texas] says:

I fear that if the civil-service law is to be carried out, and there are many valuable reasons suggested for its existence, it will end in retirement for the balance of their lives of people who may have grown old in the service. This would be such an innovation upon the character of our government that I think it will overbalance all the good that can come out of the law.

Congressman Payson says:

I think there is a growing feeling throughout the country that there is a necessity for some radical changes in the experience we are having under the civil service laws. Whether the laws themselves need radical amendment or the practice under them by the commission needs changing by express provision of law, and whether either would be effective, I am not prepared to say, because, to be candid, I am not at all an admirer of the system as I have seen it administered. I have had occasion to say more than once that I thought the railway mail service in the Arthur administration the best civil service in the world. Its employes were the energetic, brainy young men of the country, recommended by the members of congress and appointed permanently if they proved efficient after a probationary service. I see now very little except pedantry and book-learning. Questions are asked of candidates for letter carriers that members of congress—yes, indeed, members of the commission—could not answer. We are, as the commission is now working, simply creating a vast list of "eligibles," not one in 1,000 of whom scarcely will ever be called on for service; keeping up an expensive bureau which will constantly be enlarging its claims and jurisdiction, and with little practical good, in my judgment. There is too much sentiment and too little business in it, and I have no doubt this matter will be earnestly canvassed during the session. If carried on as begun it will eventually result in an office-holding class and a civil pension list. To this I know there is strong opposition. It may be that a reform among the reformers will meet the public demand, but I doubt it. But the whole matter will be thoroughly canvassed I have no doubt.

Congressman Cutchins of Mississippi does not look for the repeal of the civil service law.

Congressman Dolph [Oregon] says:

The civil service law will be amended, but will not be repealed.

Congressman Hitt [Ill.] says:

As for the civil-service law, too many senators and congressmen of both parties are pledged in its support to allow of its repeal. To be sure, it is not apt to be extended at all, but if anything is done it will only be in the line of an amendment to supply some want.

Congressman Simmonds [Conn.] says of the civil-service law:

Undoubtedly there is a decided opposition to the law among the workers of both parties, but speaking entirely from a partisan point of view, I think patronage is a positive evil. I have no slurs to cast upon a man who seeks office. I think any man may have an honorable ambition to hold an office, and that he has a perfect right to seek it; but the possession of patronage is a positive injury to a party, and I think the civil-service law should be maintained and extended as far and as rapidly as it can be of benefit to the public service.

ANTI-AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

THE Louisville Commercial [Rep.] says that all classes of officers, without exception, are being allowed in Kentucky to serve out their terms.

THE Lewiston [Me.] Journal, Congressman Dingley's paper, says that all the democrats holding four-year offices are being allowed, with few exceptions, to serve out their terms, while Mr. Cleveland made many removals of republicans holding four-year offices in Maine.

THAT changes have not been made more rapidly in this district is probably due to the fact that Congressman Hitt devotes more attention to intellectual problems that pertain to his position than he does to importuning the president to disregard his pledges and those of the Chicago platform, by which he is bound not to make wholesale removals in the business service of the country merely for political reasons.—Rockport [Ill.] Register [Rep.].

CONGRESSMAN MILLIKEN, of Maine, says: "Only three men in my district have been superseded by appointees of the present administration, and they were for cause. I have not asked the removal of any man whose term has not expired, and I don't intend to unless there is very great need for it in the interest of the service. The republicans of my district, so far as I know, don't desire their removal."

CONGRESSMAN MOORE is the editor of the Nashua [N. H.] Telegraph, and he invited the republicans of Nashua to choose a man for postmaster. Thereupon the Mirror, another republican paper, declared that "the man who spends the most money and does the most work for his party and to promote the candidacy of a congressman should everywhere be appointed postmaster."

To this congressman Moore's paper replied:

"A more scandalous and pestiferous doctrine was never uttered by anybody outside of a mad-house; carried to its logical results, it would reduce our government to a system of gigantic favoritism, intrigue, and jobbery."

And the editor further adds, that if he owes any persons anything for helping him to get elected to congress, he will pay the claims out of his own money, but he "will not steal the public offices, that are public trusts, with which to pay them."

THE THANKSGIVING DAY SERMON.

The clergy of this city have been the subject of mistaken criticism in relation to the plan formulated by Mr. Herbert Welsh, looking to inducing clergymen everywhere to some time preach a sermon upon civil service reform advocating it "so far as it involves fundamental principles of righteousness." Some weeks ago the Indianapolis Sentinel published interviews with a few of them whose remarks showed that they had not seen the appeal. Those interviewed did not seem inclined to preach such a sermon upon Thanksgiving day. With a single exception all were in favor of breaking up the spoils system. Father Gavisk, Catholic, says of the reform, "I would be heartily in favor of it and would like to see it established in this country." Dr. Cleveland, Methodist, says, "I heartily believe in the principles of civil service reform and that their adoption by the great political parties would bring an almost incalculable blessing to the country." Mr. Haines, Presbyterian, says, "I am in favor of the civil service reform movement. I hope it will speed and grow." Dr. McLeod, Presbyterian, is in favor of it but wanted to begin "by getting all the bad men out and putting the good men in and then keeping them there." Dr. Jenckes, Episcopalian, says of the reform, "It has to come sometime, but the adoption will probably be gradual;" and he believes that the present administration or the next one "will bring out civil service in good shape" without his intervention. Most of these gentlemen seem to think that in touching upon this subject in a sermon they would be carrying politics into the pulpit against the rule that church attendants have the right to presume that their political feelings will not be hurt. We are sure that upon reflection they will not hold to this impression. The use of more than 200,000 state and federal offices to pay personal and party debts is a gigantic system of bribery, and it is therefore immoral.

Mr. Lucas, Christian, says: "I used to be quite a civil service reformer myself, but the more I studied the subject the more I became convinced that it is a humbug and impracticable and of no use in a republican government." Also, "to say that some offices are political and others are not is an easy way of covering up the hypocrisy of the so-called civil service reformers." There is much more, including the statement that "all offices and positions in this country are political," and that "the men who are at present making the greatest cry and running the civil service commission of the country are greater politicians than many of those whom they oppose." It is a matter for congratulation that Postmaster Wallace of this city does not propose to put his pastor's principles into effect in the post-office.

TWENTY-SEVEN bishops of the Episcopal church have approved the suggestion that the clergy preach a sermon upon the moral aspects of civil service reform. In addition the house of bishops in the pastoral letter show that for them there is a duty in this matter to which they will not close their eyes, and that in performing this duty they are dealing with a fundamental evil which can not be passed by on the ground that it is "politics." We quote the following:

"And while the church of God—the kingdom not of this world—does not undertake to wage the warfare of the partisan, it is nevertheless charged with the duty of establishing and maintaining principles which shall find expression in the political as well as in the social and family life. Official place in morals and in politics is not the prize won by a vulgar selfishness, nor the refuge of patronized incompetence, nor yet the barter price promised and paid for political influence, but the place in which a righteous man may serve his fellow-men and advance the reputable interests of his country. The emoluments of office are derived from a fund contributed to the state by the loyal obedience and patient toil of the industrious masses. To say the very least, it should be distributed so as to secure the most efficient and economical conduct of public affairs. The honors of office are the legitimate rewards bestowed by popular confidence upon upright citizenship. It must be an evil day for our country when both emoluments and honors are made the prey of a partisan activity which often discards all honesty in its methods and renounces all shame in its corrupt and corrupting success."

—We do not believe in introducing politics into the pulpit, but the time has come when christian ministers and christian men must lift up their voices in solemn and indignant protest against the rule of the political spoilsman.—Charleston News and Courier [Dem].

IS CIVIL SERVICE REFORM SIMPLY A QUESTION OF POLITICS?

--B. S. Clayton has been appointed postmaster at Columbia, S. C. in place of Wade Hampton Gibbes removed. Senator Wade Hampton, whose word will be credited, writes to Wanamaker under date of November 9, 1889, as follows:

"Perhaps you may remember, if your memory is not treacherous, your assurance to me a few days ago that Mr. Gibbes should not be removed until the expiration of his term in February next. Not only did you do this, but you voluntarily assured me that inasmuch as Columbia was my post-office, you would, when the successor to Mr. Gibbes was to be appointed, consult me.

"It is a matter of small importance to me who takes the place of Mr. Gibbes, but as I informed him in passing through Columbia, of the promise you had made, you may perhaps understand how your action has placed me in a false position. But it is fortunate for me that Mr. Gibbes will know that I at least told him the truth, though I was grievously deceived in believing what was said to me. I shall know better in future what reliance to place on statements emanating from the same source."

THE New York Evening Post of November 13 gives the following, through its correspondence, which it believes reliable: "The postmaster at Lawrenceville, Va., has filled the office for many years to the satisfaction of the entire community. Hearing that Mahone was to remove him to make room for a 'drunken illiterate,' a lady who receives through the post-office large sums of money as gifts for charitable and educational work among the negroes, and whose efforts in this direction have given her a national reputation, went to Washington to find means to avert the disaster. Wanamaker promised her, and in her presence gave the order to Clarkson that no removal should be made. Some weeks later the removal was made and the 'drunken illiterate' appointed, who has since had to resign."

TAKING THE POST-OFFICES OUT OF POLITICS.*

President Harrison in his inaugural address, said: "The civil list is so large that a personal knowledge of any large number of applicants is impossible. The President must rely upon the representation of others." This is perfectly true, and in no branch of the service more true than among the postmasters. The question is who are those "others" upon whose "representations" the President must rely? The proposition is frequently put as if the members of congress belonging to the President's own party were the only persons on whom he could rely, and yet we all know they are the very persons most interested in turning the post-offices into electioneering machines, and the least to be trusted from purely business considerations.

Far from having to resort to the unconstitutional method of relying on the legislative branch for executive appointments, the administration has at hand, in the post-office department itself, a body of men, who, by the scope of their duties, are the very persons upon whose representations a president can rely for information regarding postmasters. These are the post-office inspectors. They are now selected under civil service rules and usually by promotion from other parts of the service. They are a picked lot of men, trained in the postal service, knowing the wants of the service, and having continually to examine into the conduct of the various offices, and report on the need of new post-offices, the discontinuance of old ones, etc.

When a vacancy occurs in any of the smaller post-offices, an inspector can be detailed to visit the locality, see the applicants, and make inquiries regarding their character and experience. For the sake of fairness and regularity the applicants should be made to fill out certain blank forms in their own handwriting, and on a basis of all this information the inspector would make his report, just as a road agent of an express company makes his report on the relative merits of several candidates for local agencies. The higher post-offices, say all above the fourth class—that is, all with salaries above $1,000 a year—could be filled by promotion either from the classified service or from among the postmasters of relatively lower grades, promotions to be based on the efficiency with which they have performed their duties. There are already complete statistics kept regarding the management of all the post-offices, and these could be used for this purpose. For greater convenience, the country should be divided into postal districts, as is done in England for the postal department there, and in this country for the great express companies. Indeed this division into postal districts is greatly needed for many other purposes. Each district requires some general manager who can know its wants, see to expediting the mails, etc., as can never be done properly from Washington alone. Such a system as this would doubtless work well in the hands of an administration friendly to it, provided there was not too great an opposition from congressmen. Any system, however, which we propose will, in all probability, be left to the mercies of an indifferent or possible hostile administration, and will lie open to attacks from local politicians. If the appointments of all the fourth-class postmasters are left in the hands of the inspectors, there is a danger that the pressure, which no postmaster-general has yet been able to withstand, will simply be transferred from him to the inspectors. Though they are appointed under civil service rules, it would not be impossible to intimidate the weaker ones, and either remove the stronger ones or put them on other branches of work. We do not want to find ourselves in the position of having urged the adoption of a system which will allow the spoilsmen, when criticised, to turn around and say: "We have made these appointments which you complain of on the reports of your civil service inspectors. What more do you want?"

It seems well, therefore, that any system we propose should be as strongly fortified from attack as possible. Two very efficient means of fortification occur to one. The first is to incorporate into our system some regulation of removals. Let any bill we propose state clearly that there are to be no removals because of political opinions. With that as the fundamental rule give every man a hearing who wants it, and have no removals except on the written reports of inspectors who conduct these hearings. Suspensions can be made, in extreme cases, awaiting the reports. The hearings, too, need not be conducted with the formality of judicial proceedings, and a well-grounded suspicion, not satisfactorily explained away, may be sufficient cause for removal. There is nothing unpractical or unbusiness-like in this regulation of removals. Mr. Adams told me lately that in the Adams express company they give "the meanest man a hearing" before removal, and if he thinks he has been treated unfairly at a road agent's hearing, he is given another hearing by an assistant manager. According to the last official report, that for the year ending June 30, 1888, out of the 1,244 removals of postmasters, 663—that is, more than one-half—had been made on the recommendation of post-office inspectors. Why should there be any removals except on such reports, unless, indeed, a hearing be waived by the postmaster himself? How quickly many of the so-called reasons for removal, trumped up by politicians, would vanish into air if there was to be a hearing on them conducted by a trained and competent government inspector?

The second method of fortifying this system of reform would be by eliminating as far as practicable the personal element of choice left to the inspectors. I know no better method than a system of competitive examinations; if it were not too cumbersome, it would be well to apply the examination system to all the fourth-class postmasters. A great majority of these postmasters, however, have a very small salary, so small as not to be worth having, as a republican congressman from New York state said the other day, on boasting that he had got every postmaster in his district changed whose office was worth having.

Of the 57,376 postmasters, 2,502 are above the fourth-class and their aggregate of salaries is $4,202,800. The aggregate salary of the 54,874 fourth-class postmasters, is only $8,386,968, or just about an average of only $153 a year apiece. As far as I have been able to estimate it, there are less than 6,000 having $500 or more a year; the average salary of the remainder being about $90 a year. The chief pressure that would be brought to bear upon the inspectors would be for these 6,000 places, and if they could be included within the classified civil service, the inspectors might be able to resist the weaker pressure that would be brought to bear for the large number of smaller places, many of them hardly worth the holding.

These 6,000 with fair salaries, with chances of promotion and security against removal without a hearing, would probably average a tenure of not less than ten years. That would give 600 postmasterships to be filled each year by examinations. If the country were divided into 12 districts, that would give 50 for each district. Now in Massachusetts alone, the civil service commission held no less than 172 examinations last year, all conducted by the chief examiner, and 73 of these were held in cities outside of Boston. Under the United States commission for the year ending June 30, 1888, there were held no less than 450 examinations. The examinations for postmaster of this grade would all be of the same general character and easy to devise, while no small part of the examinations just mentioned were for a great variety of positions, requiring many different kinds of test. A good deal of the machinery of local examining boards could be made use of and perhaps the post-office inspectors might conduct the examinations in distant towns. Furnishing good securities on the postmasters' bonds, as already required by the law, is of itself a guarantee of character, worth more than a usual letter of recommendation, as no person with property wants to go on the official bond of a dishonest or inefficient man.

The system I should propose would be summed up as follows: Removals never for political opinions, and only after a hearing, and on a written report of an inspector, who is himself selected under the civil service law. Appointments to all the postmasterships, with a salary above $1,000 as rewards for executive ability shown in the postal service, made either from among other postmasters who may apply for a promotion, or from the classified postal service—a system that has been in successful operation in England for many years. Appointment to all with a salary between $500 and $1,000 by competitive examinations. And as to the still lower grades on the reports of inspectors, regulated in such a way as to secure the greatest possible uniformity and fairness. And for convenience in all of this, a sub-division of the country into suitable postal districts.

Why is not the reclaiming of the postmasters from the patronage system the next great work for the league to take in hand? Let us unite on some measure, as we united on the Eaton bill, afterwards called the Pendleton bill, and press for its adoption, and I believe we can get it adopted. If some of us have thought that our efforts since 1883 have been too diffuse, why is not this the very concentration we need?

AFTER THE ELECTIONS.

It is not the question of a few post-offices. I freely say to my colleague that the republican party would be stronger in Indiana if you put every republican out of office, and I think the democratic party would be weaker in precisely the same proportion that you put democrats in.—Senator Benjamin Harrison, March 26, 1886.

—It is high time that all those connected with this administration who have a real regard for civil service reform, and all republicans everywhere who would be sorry to see their party committed to the foolish and fatal policy of a return to the spoils system, should speak out boldly and emphatically. There is not the slightest danger that the civil service law will be repealed or the reform move in any other direction than forward. But there is danger more or less that the party position may be misrepresented and the affections of the voters alienated to some extent by the utterances of a few spoilsmen, whose boldness increases with their disappointment at finding that they can not make free and complete loot of all the government offices.—St. Paul Pioneer Press [Rep.], before the elections.

—Mr. Harrison is responsible only in as far as he has not found it practicable to put a stern and final veto on the projects of the spoilsmen. But he is responsible in a larger measure for the conduct of the post-office department; because the record which Mr. Clarkson is making there is a distinct injury to the party. It does not greatly matter to the public or greatly affect the service whether the postmaster at some cross-roads is republican or democrat. But it does affect the party in the eyes of the people to know that removals in the postal service have been made at the rate of about 20,000 in six months. We speak plainly, and speak as republicans, anxious for the future of the party; and we say most emphatically that this is neither civil service reform nor good politics. There are some signs already of discontent with it. Local elections here and there, notably that in Indianapolis, evidence the growing discontent that follows as a constant Nemesis on the footsteps of the party that, in these days, fails to come up to the height of its own aspiration and disappoints public hope and expectation.—St. Paul Pioneer Press [Rep.], before the elections.

—“The truth is,” says the Pittsburg Dispatch [Rep.], after discussing the causes of Tuesday’s overwhelming defeat of the republican party, “that the republican success of last year, in connection with the reverses of this year, show, if anything, that the party is stronger without patronage than with it.”

—I am greatly surprised at the outcome of the Ohio campaign. A heavy defection in Hamilton and Franklin counties was to be expected, but I certainly expected to see Gov. Foraker pull through by a decreased majority. Now, what has lost the fight? In the first place, I noticed a sullen spirit among Ohio republicans. They were heavy and apathetic. They were displeased with the administration. The offices were distributed without proper consideration, and those who got offices were not appreciative.—Gen. Geo. A. Sheridan, who was in Ohio through the campaign.

—“Did the distribution of official patronage have anything to do with the result in Ohio?”

“Naturally; not in the way of bad appointments, because there have been none; but there were nearly two hundred thousand applicants for places in the service of the government from Ohio. Most of those applicants wanted post-offices. Congressman J. D. Taylor had two thousand applicants in his district. Now most of these people have had to be disappointed, and that made them indifferent to republican success this year.”—F. B. Loomis, a newspaper correspondent, who was in Ohio all through the campaign.

—Some persons are disposed to hold the administration responsible for the loss of the republican state ticket in New York. The same individuals declare that had the President been more generous in the distribution of offices, victory would certainly have perched on the republican banner. Take the Twenty-first Assembly District in New York city, for example. Warner Miller a year ago carried it by a majority of about 1,500. Yesterday the republican state ticket got a plurality of scarcely one-tenth of that figure. Ernest H. Crosby, as a candidate for assembly until last year, was accustomed to receive from 1,000 to 1,500 majority. Lewis, Crosby’s successor, gets less than 150. President Harrison has appointed more men to office from this district than from any other in the state. The collector of the port, the surveyor, the United States district attorney, the minister to France, the minister to Austria, the judge to the court of arbitration at Cairo, a United States commissioner for the Union Pacific railroad, and at least a dozen more appointments of greater or less importance, have been awarded to the Twenty-first. Yet her showing on election day was nearly as bad as the districts in which the republicans made little or no effort to win, and yet barely succeeded. What is true of the Twenty-first is also true of other districts which have been treated liberally, so far as patronage is concerned.—Philadelphia Enquirer’s Washington Correspondence.

—The distribution of this patronage, in perspective of any other issue involved, tends to create unpopularity for the administration. The congressman or senator through whose influence an appointment is secured is strengthened by the support of the office-holder, and this is felt in the district conventions, but the party at large loses votes. There are about 150 consulates at the disposal of the President. There were 2,000 applications for these positions. At the New York custom-house there are 1,500 places, of which about one-third may be available for party rewards. There were 25,000 men who wanted these 500 places.

Take the postmastership in a country village. It is an important post, but it is generally held by a storekeeper, to whom custom is drawn by the appointment. Here are six storekeepers in a place, all working to get the benefit of the extra trading that goes to the postmaster. The man who gets the appointment works hard for the congressman who secured it for him, but the five other men are disappointed, and either neglect to vote for the party at the next election or vote for the opposite side. Where one vote is secured for the distribution of patronage, three—yes, five—votes are driven away.—Chauncey Depew in New York Tribune.

—It will take hard work for the republican party to recover the ground which it lost on Tuesday. The administration will have to help in this work. One thing that it can do is to drop all such crazy folly as the Mahone business. Another thing that it can do is to fill the vacancy on the bench of the supreme court by appointing a man whose fitness no one can question. This is a perfectly easy thing to do. Another thing is to pay some attention to the public sentiment of a state outside of the political machine of that state. Another thing is to stop appointing republican editors to office. The appointment of editors is very complimentary, but when they are foolish enough to accept it takes away from the party its most effective advocates, and muzzles the paper from which the appointment is made. Another thing is to keep an eye single for the public good, and allow all officers who are doing their work properly to serve out their terms without molestation. Mr. Hayes’s saying that he who serves his country best serves his party best, is a very good one to apply in this emergency, no matter what the men who are after something may think about it.—Wilmington Morning News [Rep.].

—To his friends who called on Wednesday President Harrison is understood to have said that no administration could in its first year successfully withstand the assaults of the office-seekers. Later on he believed the political horizon would brighten and better conditions prevail.

If the President is correctly represented, here we have an acknowledgment that the republican vote only can be brought out when office-seekers are interested in the contest. If they are indifferent, there is no one to bring out voters, and the republican candidates accordingly suffer. The obvious meaning of this is, when the machine is out of gear, the republican party gets into trouble. It is doubtful, however, if the inactivity of party workers altogether explains republican defection. With anything but approval the people have watched the proceedings of the national administration. President Harrison complains that he has been unable to appease office-seekers, and that their resentment brought disaster to the republican party. Many voters believe that too much time and attention have been bestowed on the office-seeking class. They desire to see this administration address itself to work of greater moment, but do not seem to consider that down to the present time it has had but little opportunity to show affirmatively what it can do.—Albany Express [Rep.].

—Republicans of the “rural districts” did their duty nobly. The city did damnably. The returns show that only about 60 per cent. of the republican vote of 1888 in this city showed up at the polls, while Tammany drummed up and dragged out by systematic work nearly eighty per cent. of their vote. Equal republican activity and vigilance here would have given us a complete victory in this state. Dissatisfaction and disappointment over the distribution of the favors of the administra- tion may have contributed somewhat to the apathetic feeling and lack of interest. The rum power and its ally, the prohibitionists, can each claim their share of the credit. They both did their worst.—Tom Platt, Head Distributor of New York Patronage.

—"Civil service reform had nothing to do with the defeat of the republicans in Virginia, Ohio and New York," says the Boston Transcript [Rep.] "The old system of patronage, in which the government honors all the drafts drawn on it by a certain recognized 'king maker,' did."

—The St. Louis Globe-Democrat, [Rep.] is convinced that there is no political efficacy in spoils. Speaking of the recent Republican defeat in the capital of Indiana, it says: "The Indianapolis episode this year, like the Maryland and Indiana incidents of a year or two ago, furnishes one more proof that federal patronage, in ordinary circumstances, brings weakness instead of strength to the party dispensing it."

—The Philadelphia North American [Rep.] does not conceal the significance of this week's elections. "The North American," it says, "can not commit the folly of underestimating what has just occurred, and it sees very clearly that the republican party must show courage, honesty, and clean-handed leadership to win success hereafter. Its power was broken by a too great belief that in those qualities it had degenerated, and its power was regained largely because it was supposed that it had profited by that rebuke to cast off the leaders and the methods which had weakened it."

—The elections furnish an excellent comment on Mr. Harrison's statement, made while he still was a senator, that a great party is weakened rather than strengthened by the possession of the federal "patronage." An English statesman once said that every place he bestowed made three enemies and one ingrate. Mr. Clarkson has been very busy for eight months past in securing to the party the kind of influence which is supposed to attend the possession of the offices. He certainly did not neglect his own state in doing so. Iowa has seen as thorough an application of the spoils theory in the matter of its post offices as has any state of the Union. We hope he is pleased with the result. His "Pyrrhic victories," if carried a little farther, would put an end to the republican party. They have been won not only in Iowa but in Massachusetts, in New York, in New Jersey, in Virginia, and in Ohio. In all these states the party was distinctly stronger before he began to sign commissions upon the requisition of the congressmen. And if the democrats could have stopped their quarreling, and pulled themselves together, there might have been an approach to the same showing in Pennsylvania. The truth is that the failure of the administration to come up to the expectation of the better self of the party in the matter of the civil service, is disheartening the party everywhere. Brooklyn may be taken as an example. The republicans had a good case there. The state and city tickets on the other side were bad. The registration was heaviest in the parts of the city where the republican strength lies. The canvass was as vigorous as could be expected in an off year. Two years ago Mr. Chapin had a plurality of 882. This year it is nearly ten times as great. The democratic state ticket has a plurality of close upon eleven thousand, and a district heretofore republican elects a democrat to the legislature.—Philadelphia American [Rep.].

—The failure of the administration to meet expectations in the enforcement of the civil service law has also alienated from the republican party many of those adherents of civil service principles who voted with the party last year. The loss may not have been large, but it was something. The administration has undoubtedly been a disappointment to all who hoped for and expected something more than a change of politicians in the offices. The distribution of spoils and the waste of public money stand out most conspicuously as the distinguishing characteristics of the new administration in its brief reign. It is not a record that the people could be expected to endorse, and they have not availed themselves of the small opportunity afforded them for giving what, if there had been a sweeping republican victory, would have been construed as an endorsement. The general result, we believe, indicates that the trend of sentiment is against the kind of politics exemplified in republican management of public affairs.—Indianapolis News [Ind.].

—We are of the opinion that while other issues, such as the tariff, the liquor question, and pension profligacy, have contributed to the republican losses this year, the chief cause has been disgust among decent people at the sack of the civil service by the Harrison administration, combined with the rage of office-seekers who have not got what they asked for, or "something equally as good." It is needless to recount particular examples, but no man who has kept his ears open this year to the conversation that may be heard on the cars, or at watering-places, clubs, counting-rooms, or wherever educated people are gathered together, can have failed to discover profound and pervading disappointment with Mr. Harrison and his policy. Since his policy up to this time has been nothing but a spoils policy of the worst type, there has been nothing else to find fault with. He has done nothing but cut and slash among the office-holders, and now he has received a pretty severe rebuke. If this had been a congressional election he would be confronted with a hostile majority in the house.—New York Evening Post [Ind.].

THE STATE PRESS.

—Men who are after the "spoils," and who succeed in getting what they seek, as a general thing are not nearly as efficient officers as men would be who had been selected simply because of their fitness and qualifications for their work. In the very nature of things it must be so. "Spoilsmen" have no heart for the duties of the particular position they may fill. Their sole purpose in seeking it was the "spoils," and the "spoils" is all they care for. Patriotism, desire for the public good, conscientious discharge of duty, are the last things they think of. With them, public office is not a public trust, but rather a foothold whereby they mean to get as much as possible from the public with the least possible return for the "spoils" so won. "Spoils," "spoils," "spoils." Down with the whole system. Let civil service reform, in theory and practice, win the place it ought to fill in a government like ours.—Steuben [Ind.] Republican [Rep.].

—There is a great deal of kicking against the civil service law, and many disappointed applicants are venting their spleen against the administration, as if the President were responsible for the existence of the law, or deserving of censure for its enforcement. The civil service law is all right, and if it can only be kept on the statute books, with such amendments as may be needed to perfect it and extend its scope, it will in a few years work out its own salvation. It is hard on the spoilsmen, of course, but few of that class are really competent to discharge the responsibilities of office and ought not to be appointed.—Indiana New Castle Courier [Rep.].

—The spoils system of appointing men to place solely on account of politics has been tried long and often and has proved a failure. It is a relic of barbarism and will have to go along with many other bad customs. It will not answer in this enlightened age, which is an age of business sense, progress and steady advance in civilized methods. The principles of the law will eventually be applied to every department of the federal service. The time will come when the people will no more tolerate the removal or appointment of clerks on account of their opinions than they will now tolerate ostracism of the same for their religious views. In other words, we are slowly progressing from the methods of barbarism to the methods of an enlightened civilization.—Indiana Shelbyville Republican [Rep.].

—Frank Hatton, a political cowboy, is running the Washington Post, to cater to the spoilsmen in the dominant party. Hatton is a republican for spoils, not for any principle the party cherishes. His political methods are of the same order as the frontier bully, swagger and general brutishness included. Hatton has neither the courage to oppose civil service reform in conventions and campaigns, nor the honor to regard the pledges there given.—Indiana Richmond Sunday Register [Rep.].

—That the spoils system has assumed an alarming tendency there can be no doubt, and the necessity for remedying the evil is apparent. What the remedy shall consist of is still debatable. In the case of local appointments, such as for postmasters, for instance, the most satisfactory results are usually obtained by effecting recommendations on the result of popular elections, but even this plan is open to serious objections. Real and permanent reform can only come through the education of the masses to cease looking upon "public office as a private snap," and the senators and representatives in congress should be first to encourage that idea instead of continuing the custom of standing out as conspicuous adherents of the spoils system in its most offensive phases.—Indiana Lafayette Courier [Rep.].

—The Democrat is a friend of civil service reform. It prefers the merit system to the spoils system. In common with thousands of good republicans and equally good democrats, it believes that business principles should obtain in the administration of the government. In no other way can corruption, profligacy and inefficiency be rooted out of the public service. Every political party has resolved in favor of the reform. Every republican president, save Abraham Lincoln and Benjamin Harrison, urged its adoption upon congress. The present executive voted for the civil service law. Both by his repeated declarations and the pledges that led to its restoration to power, the republican party stands committed to a faithful observance of the law both in letter and spirit.—Indiana Putnam Democrat [Rep.].

—Politicians ought not to be blamed for trying to get rid of it, for it is greatly in their way. But the reason why the average voter should oppose civil service reform is not clear. The masses of the people have no hope of getting the offices, and in fact do not aspire to them. Good government is all they have to hope for, and all they have a right to expect. Why then should they wrangle over the offices, when their only real interest is to have good public servants? That an aspirant to public office should prove his efficiency for it by submitting to an examination is entirely practical and reasonable. That the ablest man should carry the prize will strike any man as being proper and sensible.

That the distribution of the offices as party rewards is liable to abuse is within the knowledge of any man. The extension of the merit system would be the most effective electoral reform ever thought of. The scrambling for offices is the primary cause for all the bribery and corruption which occur at every election. We can conceive of no reason why a sincere democrat or republican should be opposed to the merit system. It is eminently fair and democratic, as it gives the offices to the ablest aspirants.—Indianapolis Catholic Record.

—Four-fifths of the republican journals of character and influence in the United States are honestly in favor of a reform of the civil service on the general line of principle advocated by Mr. Curtis and his associates.—Philadelphia Bulletin [Rep.].

"Now, this doctrine, which proposes to give the spoils to the victors, has been imputed mostly to one of our political parties, and, as some suppose, has been avowed by that party. . . . We shall see, perhaps, how far the opposing party will abjure this doctrine of the spoils, and whether it is not yet to be the universal doctrine of politics in the land. If so, then shall we have a scene in this land never before exhibited on earth, one which would destroy the integrity and sink the morality of a nation of angels. . . . Only conceive such a lure held out to this great people, and all the little offices of the Government thus set up for the price of the victory, without regard to merit or anything but party services, and you have a spectacle of baseness and rapacity such as was never seen before. No preaching of the Gospel in our land, no parental discipline, no schools, not all the machinery of virtue together, can long be a match for the corrupting power of our political strifes actuated by such a law as this. It would make us a nation of apostates at the foot of Sinai."—From a Sermon by Rev. Horace Bushnell, in 1840.

At the recent dinner of the Cambridge and Boston Civil Service Reform Association James Russell Lowell said:

"When I was in Spain I could not help thinking that the decay of that noble country, with every element of greatness in it, due, no doubt, to many other causes, was due mainly to a civil service precisely like our own, but which had gone further in the inevitable road in which ours is going."

The Civil Service Record for December contains a full account of the recent meeting of the Boston and Cambridge Civil Service Reform Associations. Mr. Roosevelt was the guest of the evening, and the following extract should surely, coming from him, carry great weight:

"To me the spoils system is, in its essence, brutal and degrading, and I do not see how any man can see its workings and not feel as I do. In Washington any man who keeps his eyes open must see around him, continually going on, things that make his heart bleed. There are wrongs that have gone on for years, that are still going on, that should arouse every manly instinct in a man to make him protest against them."

MR. CLARKSON'S recent reverses appear to have thrown him into a state of irritation and mental confusion. His organ at Des Moines says:

"The civil service commission is the greatest humbug principle that has ever been forced upon the people of the United States. It is a species of feudal aristocracy that should have no encouragement in a republic."

A commission which superintends open competition for public employment can hardly be hurt by Clarkson's paper calling it names.

MR. JOHN Q. DONNELL, of Kingston, in this State, has recently delivered a series of lectures on practical economics before the senior and junior classes of Hanover College. One lecture was upon civil service reform. If we are not mistaken this is the first time that the students of this college have had a lecture upon this subject.

THE executive committee of the National Civil Service Reform League, in pursuance of the instructions of the annual meeting of the League in Philadelphia, has appointed a committee to examine into the management of the federal civil service. The committee consists of W. D. Foulke, chairman, of Indiana; Sherman S. Rogers, of New York; Charles J. Bonaparte, of Maryland; Richard H. Dana, of Massachusetts, and Wayne MacVeagh, of Pennsylvania. In a general way the investigation will be like that made in Indiana in 1886, but it will extend over the whole country, and will be so thorough in its collection of facts that its work will be of great historical value, and will deal the staggering spoils system the hardest blow it has ever had. That system can not survive the publication of the facts. Four members of the committee voted for General Harrison. The committee is a strikingly able one, and will be so regarded by the country. To a man it is impartial and fearless, and it will not blink the facts.

THE sixth report of the civil service commission, covering the time from July 1, 1888, to June 30, 1889, has been published. No one can read it, and every one ought to read it, without being convinced that a great advance has been made in the administration of the law. It can be obtained by application to the commission. We have room for but a single extract. How many years have Indiana reformers fought for the recognition of the principle there stated.

"But any sweeping and wholesale removals of large numbers of employes in the classified service for causes not in each case fully specified, certainly create a very strong presumption that they are made for political, and therefore improper, reasons, and the commission holds that if in any department or office a very large proportion of the employes is changed, the burden of proof should be considered to rest on the officer making the change to show that his conduct was proper, and the failure on his part to establish the necessity for these changes ought to be held to warrant his dismissal."

CONGRESSMAN CHEADLE, from Indiana, has introduced a bill to repeal the civil service law. It is fitting that he should do this. For months he has been on the road to Washington or back to Frankfort, his whole soul and mind bent upon obtaining offices, whether by bullying, extortion, persuasion or guile. He has had Broils, Intrigues, Conspiracies, Revolts, Tumults and Dissensions without number among his henchmen and his tributary Towns and Hamlets. The League investigating committee can do no better than to commence with Cheadle's Territory.

WE print that portion of the President's message which relates to the civil service. It must be said that he shows a clear appreciation of the purpose of the law, and that he knows when the law is honestly executed. He also understands that no progress can be made without an honest and vigorous enforcement of the act. His statement that incumbency, impartiality, moderation, fidelity to public duty, and a good attainment in the discharge of it, make a conclusive argument for retention in office can hardly be improved upon. There is nothing in his suggestion that heads of departments keep records of faithfulness and efficiency so long as he employs Clarksons and Ransdells, and makes feudal lords of the Quays and the Platts. After reading this message, the question is constantly suggested, why does a president who writes so well permit hundreds of railway mail clerks to be turned out without cause, and why does he permit Clarkson to turn out 30,000 fourth-class postmasters in nine months for no reason whatever, except on the principle that a pirate strips his prey, and why does a president write such an indescribable letter as President Harrison wrote to General Manson, and so on through a long list? Further, why does the President say that the duty of appointment "is devolved by the constitution or by the law," and then allow congressmen to bully him to a wholesale practice of removals and appointments not warranted by the constitution or the law, and to his own "actual distress?" Why does he not stop the practice? Does he not believe what he writes, or is he a weak man who can not carry out his principles, or is he afraid that he will not be renominated? Whatever the reason is, the message leaves the country in darkness as to any remedy.

"A PATRIOTIC INTEREST IN THE ELECTIONS."

There has been another Dudley episode in this city caused by his appearance here. A warrant was sworn out for him, but the United States commissioner, after making it, did not deliver it to the marshal because of the district attorney, Smiley N. Chambers, who says:

"I exercised the prerogative in this case that I would exercise in any other case of like character, and decided that the warrant be not issued upon this affidavit."

With the legal aspects of the case we have nothing to do. The judges have decided in effect that Dudley has not committed a punishable crime, and that ends the matter. But there are other aspects worthy of comment. That Dudley wrote the letter which has become famous there now seems to be no manner of doubt. When it was first published a few days before the election, it was a time for forgeries, and there were marks about it not consonant with Dudley's reputation for "fine work." For instance, the injunction to divide the floaters into blocks of five seemed impossible to come from Dudley, because every one posted in floater rules knew that a party-worker never "voted" more than one, or at most two floaters. The rule given in the printed directions used in Shelby county in 1884 was, "do not count the 'floaters' as 'doubtful,' because the 'doubtful' voter is not the man who votes for a consideration. * * * You must appoint at least one man for every two floaters."

Subsequent events, however, fix upon Dudley the letter, which is as follows:

"NEW YORK, Oct. 24th, 1888.

"DEAR SIR—I hope you have kept copies of the lists sent me. Such information is very valuable and can be used to great advantage. It has enabled me to demonstrate to friends here that with proper assistance Indiana is surely republican for governor and president, and has resulted, as I hoped it would, in securing for Indiana the aid necessary. Your committee will certainly receive from Chairman Huston the assistance necessary to hold our floaters and doubtful voters, and gain enough of the other kind to give Harrison and Morton 10,000 plurality. New York is now safe beyond peradventure for the republican presidential ticket; Connecticut likewise. In short every northern state, except possibly New Jersey, though we still hope to carry that State. Harrison's majority in the electoral college will not be less than 100. Make our friends in each precinct wake up to the fact that only boodle and fraudulent votes and false counting of returns can beat us in the state. Write each of our precinct correspondents, 1st. To find out who has democratic boodle, and steer the democratic workers to them, and make them pay big prices for their own men. 2d. Sean the election officers closely, and make sure to have no man on the board whose integrity is even questionable, and insist on republicans watching every movement of the election officers. 3d. See that our workers know every voter entitled to a vote, and let no one else even offer to vote. 4th. Divide the floaters into blocks of five, and put a trusted man with necessary funds in charge of these five, and make him responsible that none get away, and that all vote our ticket. 5th. Make a personal appeal to your best business men to pledge themselves to devote the entire day, Nov. 6th, to work at the polls, i. e., to be present at the polls with tickets. They will be astonished to see how utterly dumbfounded the ordinary Democratic election bummer will be, and how quickly he will disappear. The result will fully justify the sacrifice of time and comfort, and will be a source of satisfaction afterwards to those who help in this way. Lay great stress on this last matter. It will pay.

"There will be no doubt of your receiving the necessary assistance through the national, state and county committees,—only see that it is husbanded and made to produce results. I rely on you to advise your precinct correspondents, and urge them to unremitting and constant efforts from now till the polls close and the result is announced officially. We will fight for a fair election here if necessary. The rebel crew can't steal this election from us as they did in 1884, without some one getting hurt. Let every republican do his whole duty, and the country will pass into republican hands, never to leave it, I trust. Thanking you again for your efforts to assist me in my work, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

"W. W. DUDLEY.

"Please wire me result in principal precincts and county."

The man who wrote that letter believed in the principles there stated. Some of those principles are literally subversive of free government, and when they run their logical course, they take a country, through corruption and anarchy, to the rule of the strongest leader, and to despotism. The man who writes such a letter ought to be a political and social outcast. He ought to be as much under the ban as Benedict Arnold. Yet Dudley comes to Indianapolis and dines with the chairman of the republican state committee. He is called upon and congratulated by men who pass for respectable citizens. He is escorted by the United States marshal into the federal court room, and, without invitation, is conducted upon the bench and impudently forces the federal judge to shake hands with him. There has never been more convincing proof of how the ways of recent politics have rotted the public conscience. We have, however, one other proof in District-Attorney Chambers, which would, if needed, complete the demonstration. In an interview in the Indianapolis Journal, December 13, he said:

"I wish, also, to state that I have read the letters printed in the press, purporting to be written by the Colonel, and, in my opinion, unattended by any extraneous evidence, they do not advise bribery, as pertaining to the election of 1888. The letters, construed in the light of the knowledge that we all possess of how elections in Indiana are conducted by both parties, have nothing in them of a criminal character, but, upon the other hand, when so construed, are honorable, and indicate simply a patriotic interest in the elections."

Several readings are necessary to make sure that one sees that statement aright. There is no one in Indiana who does not know that a floater is a man who requires and receives pay for his vote; that the bargain is made with him before hand; that he is accompanied to the polls by the party worker to whom has been assigned the task of "voting" him; that before approaching the polls the worker has put the party ticket into the floater's hands and does not lose sight of it until it is dropped into the ballot-box; that some where within reach is the man who "handles" the money of the precinct; and that after the voting, the worker reports to the precinct boodle man and he pays the floater the stipulated price. The floaters come from every grade and class, not excepting the pecuniarily well to do. They are utterly dead to patriotism and to any concern whatever in the public welfare. This public debauchery has been carried on by party managers until there are in Indiana, according to the poll-book makers, from 20,000 to 30,000 floaters. They are well known to the committees of each precinct. Their number varies from 42 out of 260 voters in the township where Abraham Lincoln's mother lies buried, to 450 in Monroe county, in which is located Indiana University, and 800 in Shelby county, the home of the late Vice-President Hendricks. It is but just to Indiana to say that this system is identical with that prevailing to an equal extent in New York, Rhode Island and elsewhere.

What now shall be said of a district attorney who reads "your committee will certainly receive from Chairman Huston the assistance necessary to hold our floaters and doubtful voters and gain enough of the other kind [democratic floaters] to give Harrison and Morton 10,000 plurality * * * Divide the floaters into blocks of five and put a trusted man with necessary funds in charge of these five and see that none of them get away," and after reading says that such injunctions are "honorable and indicate simply a patriotic interest in the elections." Bad as politicians have been charged to be, Mr. Chambers has voluntarily given an instance of political corruption which startles, and the more so considering his office. The people of Indiana would indeed be to be despaired of, if they could face such sodden immorality indifferently.

INDIAN COMMISSIONER MORGAN.

There is opposition to the confirmation of Indian Commissioner Morgan. This opposition comes first from the senators who have not succeeded in getting their fill of spoil. The following letter shows the unceasing assaults, of these senatorial freebooters upon the hapless wards of this country:

"GREENWOOD, SOUTH DAKOTA, Nov. 26, 1889.

"Mr. Herbert Welsh, 1305, Arch St., Philadelphia:

"MY DEAR MR. WELSH—Last Sunday there appeared a man here armed with a letter from Senator Moody, of South Dakota. It stated that he could not get for him the land office for which he had asked, but that if he would like it, he thought it possible to get the Yankton agency for him, and that that was the only agency in South Dakota which could be had, as all the rest of the agents were to be retained in consideration of the help which they had given the Sioux commission. This man, Foster, came from Redfield, near Huron, where he is a farmer with a large family, whether with or without qualities for such a position I do not know. He did not intimate whether he would accept the offer of the position. He brought with him a man whom he proposed to make clerk if he did.

"Now I know nothing whatever about this man personally. He may be just the right material for an excellent agent, or he may not. That is neither here nor there. I write to you again to appeal to the Indian Rights Association to bring their influence to bear to save us from the change of agents here, and the risk of it. Major Leavy has not completed a year here yet, but he is the best and most acceptable agent, both to whites and Indians, that we have had here for twelve years. He is doing a good work here, and he commands the respect and love of all. He seems to have the confidence of the Indian office. They do most everything he asks, and I doubt not the commissioner does not desire to make a change. But, alas, these wretched politicians and spoils seekers! Help us, and ward them off if it be possible.

The agent himself will make no effort for himself. He says he can not ask for favors from republicans, although he would like to stay and see something of the working out of his efforts and his plans.

Sincerely yours, JOSEPH W. COOK.

There is also opposition to General Morgan from the officials of the Catholic church. It is claimed that he is hostile to the contract or denominational schools in which this church has large interests. Opposition on this ground is a matter of difference of opinion, and is strictly legitimate; but it is also claimed that General Morgan and Mr. Dorchester have discriminated in their removals against the employes of the Catholic faith. Unfortunately Mr. Dorchester's strong feeling against the Catholic church lends color to the accusation. Both General Morgan and Mr. Dorchester deny that any removal has been made on account of religion, or that the Catholic employes have been removed in greater numbers than those of other denominations. Mr. Herbert Welsh also says that he has made a careful investigation and does not find this charge sustained.

There is in these days of spoils intrigue and treachery, but one way to meet such charges and it is to follow the plan of Mr. Roosevelt—publicity—and to state to all the people the reasons for each removal. General Morgan has done this to a few, and while his motives for protecting incumbents from scandal are praiseworthy, it is not the true way to meet a charge publicly made though weakened by being general. Secret removals, secret reasons, secret charges, are all poisonous outgrowths of the spoils system that flourishes and grows mighty in the darkness and becomes in the light of day, a dwindling, contemptible thing which nobody fears.

Senators Farwell and Cullom continue to amuse the country with the cheerful alacrity with which they pursue small spoil under a multitude of rebuffs. Senator Farwell has had an honor conferred upon him here in the President's home. A few months ago a collection of persons organized themselves as the tin-horn club. Some few had places in the city government which were soon to slip away from them. Every member deemed himself a party worker, and every one wanted an office.

It was as strong an organization as could be made in this city of the much-heard of men who are claimed to "keep up" a party and who must be paid for their services. The tin-horn club wrote to various eminent persons for a photograph and received liberal responses. It rented fine quarters, and having thus adorned it walls it proceeded to resolve against civil service reform. It secured speakers, but, somehow, when the speakers came, there were so few present that the speech was put off. Finally one member got a small deputyship, and the club soon after, probably from jealousy, expelled him. Then the funds began to run short, and one night, the story goes, a man put the "truck" from those fine quarters into his wheelbarrow and dumped it in the back room of an obscure quarter. But a single meeting was held in the humble room. Some six members gathered together and as a sort of funeral obsequy deliberated upon a new name. The name of Oliver P. Morton was summarily rejected. But the inspiration came at last, and the name Farwell Club was chosen, on the ground that Senator Farwell is the only man who has the "sand" to oppose the civil service law.

Austin H. Brown, of this city, was chief of the horse claim division in the third auditor's office, a place of great responsibility. He was originally appointed to reward him for party services, but he had become competent, was liked and was respected by the people of Indiana, and his integrity was beyond question.

Not long since one Thomas Ryan came, it is reliably said, with a note from the President directing that he be made chief of this division, which was done. Ryan had been made a government agent in Alaska by President Cleveland and then removed for cause upon evidence which is now on file in Washington, and to which the administration refuses access. After his dismissal in 1886, Ryan turned republican and was active for the election of General Harrison. This is his reward. The members of the tin-horn-Farwell club are crazed because President Harrison has picked out a worker of only a few months and ignored them who have carried torches and transparencies longer.

The Indianapolis Journal has allowed itself to be taken in by Senator Gorman. Under date of December 2, it quotes him as follows:

"I never pay any attention to the small appointments, but there was one case in Baltimore, some time ago, that attracted my attention. A very bright young man, of splendid physique, and perfectly familiar with every street and number in the city, submitted himself for examination for a position as letter-carrier. He could read and write, and had been attending night-school, and was in every way fitted for a letter-carrier, but he failed when asked the most direct route from Baltimore to China. He said he had never been in China, nor did he expect to go there, and he only wanted to be a letter-carrier."

Then the Journal goes on to say that Mr. Roosevelt is an enthusiastic young man who means well, but is hasty. Also that although Gorman is no friend of the reform, his testimony is not less worthy of attention. Also that Mr. Roosevelt and other advocates of the system should remedy such defects and not berate the critics. Now comes Mr. Roosevelt with an open letter and mortifies the Journal by showing that no such question was ever asked an applicant for a carriership since examinations began. Gorman is not dashed. Confronted with the proofs of his falsehood, he jauntily replies that he believes it to be true, and is content to let Mr. Roosevelt undertake to convince the people that the examinations are practical. The Journal should know that Gorman and his likes do not start such lies for civil service reform papers like the Journal to copy. He expects civil service reformers to know him too well. His purpose is to furnish a stock from time to time for the use of Bourbon spoils papers like the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette, which must occasionally have a change.

Frank Hatton's Washington Post, a co-worker and preceptor of the Commercial Gazette in this matter has taken itself in by an interview with General James R. Carnahan, of this city. The Post probably did not know that an interview with Carnahan, while it doubtless flattered him, would not carry great weight with either the spoilsmen or the civil service reformers. Needing some new stories it therefore puts into his mouth, statements which make him and the Post appear ridiculous. These statements can be understood from the answer made to them by a civil service commissioner:

He says, or implies, that in an examination for admission to the naval academy our commission, among other questions, caused to be asked the location of Bitter mountain. As a matter of fact, we never do nor have examined any one for admission to the naval academy. Again, he says a man examined as a copyist was asked the names and areas of the five great lakes. We never have and never do examine a copyist in geography, and we never ask such a question as that about areas of any applicant whatever. Then, he states that a certain country school-master passed almost perfectly every branch of a mail-carrier's examination, and when appointed made a failure, because he knew nothing of the streets or local geography of the city. As a matter of fact, a third of the marks, or thereabouts, in a mail-carrier's examination are given precisely on the subject of streets and local geography of the city, so that the General's statement must be incorrect. If the General has been correctly reported, I would suggest that he learn not only the places for which we examine applicants, but also the questions we ask them, before indulging in further criticism.

George H. Pendleton died in Brussels November 24. The cause of civil service reform is under lasting obligations to him for introducing and managing the bill which became the present civil service law. He had what few congressmen had or have, an intelligent conception of the way in which it was expected to break up the use of the federal service as spoil. The bill was drawn by Dorman B. Eaton, and Mr. Pendleton was its steady and efficient advocate until he secured its passage, during which he was dogged in Ohio by his party after the following manner, taken from the Butler County Democrat: "Senator Dan Voorhees polished off the Pendleton snivel service hog-wash in a style just too beautiful." It is a just compliment to say that the law in honest hands answers its purpose admirably, and six years' experience has not shown the need of radical amendment. There is no doubt that Mr. Pendleton's advocacy of this reform made it possible by bribery to defeat his re-election to the senate. But that advocacy will give him a permanent place in the history of his country, and his place will be the higher when, in the future, history looks back upon the breaking up of the spoils system and rates it, as it will rate it, second only to the destruction of slavery.

In sending him abroad, President Cleveland rid Gorman, Voorhees and other looters of the civil service of a powerful opponent, of which another, though less conspicuous, example was in the appointment of Rufus Magee, of Indiana, to Sweden and Norway.

Mr. W. D. Foulke addressed the Commonwealth Club of New York City, December 16, on "Present Political Problems." No one doubts Mr. Foulke's republicanism, nor the sincerity of his regard for President Harrison, and such candid and just criticism any party or any president should heed. The worst enemies of any administration are those friends whose personal admiration blinds them and whose standard of comparison varies. We quote as follows from the report in the New York Evening Post:

A certain circular letter marked "confidential" was sent by one Marshall Cushing (who has since been appointed private secretary to Postmaster-General Wanamaker) to a number of civil service reformers, and one copy came to me. As the correspondence has been already published on several occasions, I do not suppose there is anything very secret about it, at the present time, but even if it were otherwise, I do not recognize the right of a public officer to make me the mask of concealing his insincerity, without my consent. The writer says: "I have undertaken some investigations of the present civil service system for a cabinet officer," and he asks a number of questions. Why are the law and the commission subject to so much criticism? Is not a civil pension list a logical result of the system? Are not the commissioners merely providing themselves with employment? Will not the efficiency of the departments be hereafter interfered with by the old age of clerks who can not be removed? And then follows the remarkable interrogatory, "Why should not both parties discard all their insincere professions for the law and have the patriotism to go back to the old system under which it was inquired simply whether a man was honest, capable, and faithful to the constitution?"

The questions asked have already been very fully answered by Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte and Mr. Lucius B. Swift. I shall not repeat these answers, but I want to say a word with regard to this last question. I believe this is the first time in our history where an investigation made on behalf of a cabinet officer is based upon the assumption that the professions of his own party contained in the very platform upon which he came into power were insincere and unpatriotic. If Mr. Wanamaker is willing to declare this to the world, one of two things is true—either the party which he represents is, in fact, insincere, or he has no right to represent it and remain one of the instruments of carrying out its policy in regard to the matters in which he assumes that it did not mean what it said. So long as such a man remains at the head of the post-office department the administration of President Harrison is not a civil-service-reform administration, and he has not kept, and can not keep, the promise that "the spirit and purpose of reform shall be observed for all executive departments." For he has put at the head of the greatest of departments of the government, to carry out this spirit and purpose, a man who assumes that the declaration of his party and his own chief were insincere and unpatriotic professions.

We had a few years ago some little trouble in Indiana in reference to one Aquilla Jones, the postmaster at Indianapolis, who, when appointed to the place, said of the civil service law, "I despise it," and who consistently maintained his opinion by a constant course of evasion and violation of the statute. We thought then that the initial fault lay with the President in appointing such a man. That he could not expect the law and its provisions to be observed when he put such instruments there to do the work. But if this were true in a subordinate and unimportant office, how much more is it the case when a cabinet officer, whose work it is to carry out the policy of the administration, declares that the principles professed by his own party in its platform are nothing but a mockery and a sham. Men do not gather grapes from thorns nor figs from thistles, nor can the President carry out the principles of civil service reform to which he pledged his adherence in his letter accepting the nomination by means of a cabinet minister who assumes that this pledge was an insincere and unpatriotic profession.

There is one thing of which the politicians of the country may be well assured, that whether or not the people favor civil service reform, they will not continue to have confidence in the party which knowingly, with its eyes open, fails to perform its solemn promises to the country. There is something more immoral in this than even in the spoils system. The republican party has been successful in the past because it has been true to its great promises and plans—emancipation, the preservation of the Union, enfranchisement, payment of the national debt. These became embodied as fixed facts in the history of our country. The party was as good as its word. But if at the last convention it has in most solemn manner made a distinct pledge to the people, and if it fails to keep that promise now, the people will know just the value of every pledge hereafter made.

Daniel M. Ransdell, at present marshal of the District of Columbia, has an added importance because of his undoubted intimacy and influence with the President. When in Indianapolis soon after his appointment Ransdell said, according to the Indianapolis News: "I am very thankful that my office does not come under the civil service rules. I shall have no hesitancy about making places for just as many republicans as possible." With this preliminary statement, this officer, appointed by a President who said that only the interest of the public service should suggest removals from office, and that fitness, and not party service, should be the essential and discriminating test of appointment, set about his work. He "controlled" thirty-five places. He turned officers out with the remark, "I recognize that these gentlemen have been good and efficient officers." Among his appointees he has made his brother-in-law, John R. Leonard, a deputy. Another is his brother, Edward S. Ransdell, who was formerly a letter-carrier of the Indianapolis post-office, who stole letters, was convicted in the federal court and then pardoned by President Arthur, the latter being induced thereto by influence brought to bear by Marshal Ransdell. Thus Marshal Ransdell is exemplifying his idea of the purposes of the government service. He owns these thirty-five places. He may give them to whom he wishes, without any regard to public feeling or to public decency. They are simply spoil to be divided. It may be said that his brother has repented. That is very likely the case, and if President Harrison, or any other friend of Marshal Ransdell, saw fit to aid him in an attempt to recover his foot-hold by giving him employment, the act would be praiseworthy, but no one has any right to quarter him upon the people. And the offense is doubly aggravated by the dismissal of an efficient officer to make room for him. And so the injunction of the platform that "the spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments," is carried out by this favorite of the administration.

THE PRESIDENT ON THE CIVIL SERVICE.

On the 4th of March last the civil service commission had but a single member. The vacancies were filled on the 7th day of May, and since then the commissioners have been industriously, though with an inadequate force, engaged in executing the law. They were assured by me that a cordial support would be given them in the faithful and impartial enforcement of the statute and rules and regulations adopted in aid of it. Heretofore the book of eligibles has been closed to every one, except as certifications were made upon the requisition of the appointing officers. This secrecy was the source of much suspicion and of many charges of favoritism in the administration of the law. What is secret is always suspected; what is open can be judged. The commission, with the full approval of all its members, has now opened the list of eligibles to the public. The eligible lists for the classified post-office and custom houses are now publicly posted in the respective offices, as are also the certifications for appointments. The purpose of the civil service law was absolutely to exclude any other consideration in connection with appointments under it than that of merit as tested by the examinations.

The business proceeds upon the theory that both the examining boards and the appointing officers are absolutely ignorant as to the political views and associations of all persons on the civil service lists. It is not too much to say, however, that some recent congressional investigations have somewhat shaken confidence in the impartiality of the selections for appointments. The reform of the civil service will make no safe or satisfactory advance until the present law and its administration are established in the confidence of the people. It will be my pleasure, as it is my duty, to see that the law is executed with firmness and impartiality. If some of its provisions have been fraudulently evaded by appointing officers, our resentment should not suggest the repeal of the law, but reform in its administration. We should have one view of the matter, and hold it with a sincerity that is not affected by the consideration that the party to which we belong is for the time in power.

My predecessor, on the 4th day of January, 1889, by an executive order to take effect March 15, brought the railway mail service under the operation of the civil service law. Provision was made that the order should take effect sooner in any state where an eligible list was sooner obtained. On the 11th day of March, Mr. Lyman, then the only member of the commission, reported to me in writing that it would not be possible to have the list of eligibles ready before May 1, and requested that the taking effect of the order be postponed until that time, which was done, subject to the same provision contained in the original order as to states in which an eligible list was sooner obtained.

As a result of the revision of the rules of the new classification, and of the inclusion of the railway mail service, the work of the commission has been greatly increased, and the present clerical force is found to be inadequate. I recommend that the additional clerks asked by the commission be appropriated for. The duty of appointment is devolved by the constitution or by the law, and the appointing officers are properly held to a high responsibility in its exercise. The growth of the country and the consequent increase of the civil list have magnified this function of the executive disproportionately. It can not be denied, however, that the labor connected with this necessary work is increased, often to the point of actual distress, by the sudden and excessive demands that are made upon an incoming administration for removals and appointments. But, on the other hand, it is not true that incumbency is a conclusive argument for a continuance in office. Impartiality, moderation, fidelity to public duty, and a good attainment in the discharge of it must be added before the argument is complete. When those heading an administrative office so conduct themselves as to convince just political opponents that no party consideration or bias affects in any way the discharge of their public duties, we can more easily stay the demand for removals.

I am satisfied that both in and out of the classified service great benefit would accrue from the adoption of some system by which the officer would receive the distinction and benefit that in all private employments come from exceptional faithfulness and efficiency in the performance of duty. I have suggested to the heads of the executive departments that they consider whether a record might not be kept in each bureau of all those elements that are covered by the terms "faithfulness" and "efficiency," and a rating made showing the relative merits of the clerks of each class, this rating to be regarded as a test of merit in making promotions. I have also suggested to the postmaster general that he adopt some plan by which he can, upon the basis of the reports to the department and of frequent inspections, indicate the relative merit of postmasters of each class. They will be appropriately indicated in the official register and in the report of the department. That a great stimulus would thus be given to the whole service, I do not doubt, and such a record would be the best defense against inconsiderate removals from office.—President's Message, Dec. 3, 1889.

SECRETARY WINDOM ON THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Under the old plan appointments were usually made to please some one under political or other obligations to the appointee, and the question of fitness was not always the controlling one. The temptation to make removals only to provide places for others was always present and constantly being urged by strong influences, and this restless and feverish condition of departmental life did much to distract and disturb the even current of routine work. Under instrumentalities which are now used to secure selections for clerical places, the department has some assurance of mental capacity, and also of moral worth: the character of the candidate is ascertained before examination. The manifold duties of the department require the closest application on the part of the secretary and his assistants, and the freedom from importunity now enjoyed for appointments to places that are within the classified service, and the saving of valuable time heretofore devoted to the distribution of minor patronage, are of very great advantage, and enable these officers to devote more thought to the important questions of administration constantly arising. The clerks received from the civil service commission usually adapt themselves readily to the duties they are called upon to perform, and rank among the most efficient in the department.—Annual Report, 1889.

A PAID PRESS.

Senator Benjamin Harrison, in the senate March 26, 1886:

"I find in looking over the list of appointments in Indiana that sixteen democratic newspaper proprietors and editors have been appointed to office. * * * If I could believe that in appointing these men Mr. Cleveland meant that they should pursue a perfectly inoffensive course politically, that these newspapers should not irritate the feelings of republicans, should not publish charges against republican candidates for office, should say nothing offensive to the republicans—if I believed he meant by these appointments sincerely to put these sixteen democratic newspapers under those bonds, I should have brighter hopes than I have now of carrying Indiana next time. But it will not be so. Here are these sixteen editors, two of the three collectors of internal revenue in Indiana, and the others holding influential post-offices; and Mr. Cleveland knows, and every honest democrat knows, that those sixteen newspapers will be fulminating with all the force and vigor and power and partisanship they can against the republican party. I am not complaining of that; but if a man is to be put out, as my old soldier, Mr. Bain, of Martinsville, who marched with the regiment which I had the honor to command in the war, was put out, because he was the editor and proprietor of a republican newspaper, and the editor of the democratic newspaper in the same town was put in his place—if that is good reason for turning a republican out, the same history, the same services to the democratic party, ought not to be good reason for putting the other in."

UNDER President Harrison in the state of New York, the editors of the New York Tribune, the New York Press, the Utica Herald, the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, the Owego Times and the Syracuse Journal have received important offices.

And in Iowa there is already the government press, or, what is the same, a Clarkson-Allison press—as follows:

Iowa State Register—Its editor appointed first assistant postmaster general.

Burlington Hawkeye—Its editor appointed to the office of collector of internal revenue.

Muscataine Journal—Its editor appointed postmaster.

Fairfield Ledger—Its editor given an office in the interior department.

Keokuk Gate City—Its editor appointed commissioner of education.

Marshalltown Times—Republican—Its editor appointed postmaster.

PRESIDENT William Henry Harrison in 1841:

There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press.

DANIEL Webster in 1832:

But remember, sir, that these are the attributes of a free press only. And is a press that is purchased or pensioned more free than a press that is fettered? Can the people look for truths to partial sources, whether rendered partial through fear or through favor? Why shall not a manacled press be trusted with the maintenance and defense of popular rights? Because it is supposed to be under the influence of a power which may prove greater than the love of truth. Such a press may screen abuses in government or be silent. It may fear to speak. And may it not fear to speak, too, when its conductors, if they speak in any but one way, may lose their means of livelihood? Is dependence on government for bread no temptation to screen its abuses? Will the press always speak the truth, when the truth, if spoken, may be the means of silencing it for the future? Is the truth in no danger, is the watchman under no temptation, when he can neither proclaim the approach of national evils, nor seem to decry them, without the loss of his place?

Mr. President, an open attempt to secure the aid and friendship of the public press, by bestowing the emoluments of office on its active conductors, seems to me, of everything we have witnessed, to be the most reprehensible. It degrades both the government and the press. As far as its natural effect extends, it turns the palladium of liberty into an engine of party. It brings the agency, activity, energy, and patronage of government all to bear, with united force, on the means of general intelligence and on the adoption or rejection of political opinions.

THE Buffalo Commercial Advertiser [fettered] says of the appointment of the editor of the Syracuse Journal in 1889:

Mr. Smith has rendered long, faithful service as a hard worker in the republican ranks, and as the editor of one of the most influential journals in the service of the party. He has always been ready to do the bidding of the republican party, and has done so promptly, courageously, efficiently, and unselfishly.

THE CLERGY AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

In Geneva, N. Y., Rev. H. W. Nelson, Jr., of Trinity Church, said:

"To treat office as the prize of the successful party at an election is a tremendous source of corruption, and it turns the patronage of the government, designed solely for the public convenience, into a vast bribery fund. It teaches the citizen to expect payment for discharging a duty incumbent upon every voter. It tends to transform an election from a popular verdict upon differing public policies into a desperate struggle for the emoluments of place. For whether a worker is paid by a check or by an office, makes no difference as to the right or the wrong of the matter; or rather, while the man bribed is equally guilty, whatever the form of his reward, it is surely more odious and more noxious to bribe with what is the people's than with what is one's own; to purchase suffrages or influence at the taxpayer's cost than to pay for these out of the corrupter's pocket."

Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth preached on "Scientific Patriotism" in the Centre Congregational Church in New Haven:

"Looked at from the point of view of the social scientist, the spoils system has no reason for its existence save greed. It owns no higher law than sordid success, and holds no better promise for the future than the wreck and ruin of free institutions. Yet even under this weight of condemnation the spoils system might remain undestroyed were it not for the further fact that, looked at from the point of view even of political leaders as different administrations in turn come into power, the spoils system begins to be felt more and more heavily as a millstone about the neck of the party in office, threatening, if it can not be broken off, to cast the administration into the depths of the Salt Lake. The spoils system is proving to be bad politics as well as bad statesmanship.

"This reform moves slowly, yet with steady and sure advance. In 1865 the first bill by which it was proposed to cut off some of the evils of our civil service was received by Congress with scorn. Yet, fifteen years later, the Pendleton bill was passed, and to-day some 27,000 inferior officers of the government can eat their Thanksgiving dinner in peace. The day is hastening when the whole Babylonish system of spoils shall be fallen."

In New York Rev. Morgan Dix, rector of Trinity parish, said:

"The practice of making public office the reward of political service that is the evil against which we are called to protest. I am glad to add my voice to those which will be raised to day throughout the land on this subject. Our House of Bishops has already spoken on this scandal of our system of government in their pastoral letter.

"There is a wide distinction between political office and public office. He who accepts a 'political' office is bound to promote the views of his chiefs; it is his duty to aid in carrying out the policy of the administration; he serves, first, the party in power. But the holder of a 'public' office has no necessary relation to politics and party. He serves the public, and the man who serves them best is he whose acts have no political reference. Cabinet ministers, and a few other prominent officials, must be, of course, in perfect accord with the head of the government. But it is not necessary to the public that the great army of the servants of a nation should have any personal partisan duty outside the line of their business."

Rev. Robert Collyer, of the Church of the Messiah, resigned his pulpit to Mr. Dormon B. Eaton, who said:

"It is a great mistake to assume, as so many republicans do, that civil service reform has no support among the democrats, and that its fate depends upon the republicans alone. The civil service bill in both houses of congress was introduced by democrats—by Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, in the senate, and by Mr. Willis, of Kentucky, in the house. The effective support which Mr. Pendleton, now just deceased, gave to that bill is one of his highest claims upon the grateful memory of his countrymen.

"President Cleveland faithfully sustained the examinations while president, and three members of his cabinet, Messrs. Bayard, Endicott and Whitney, gave them a more friendly support than they have received from any of President Harrison's cabinet.

"The passage of the civil service reform law of the state of New York was vigorously promoted and was signed by a democratic governor, Mr. Cleveland. It has been since executed, though in a way by no means satisfactory, by another democratic governor, Mr. Hill. The president of the New York state commission is also a democrat, and is showing a zeal for the reform which Governor Hill doubtless would like to check a little. The New York law has been well executed by two democratic mayors in the city of New York, Mr. Grace and Mr. Hewitt. In the triumphant and salutary administration of the civil service law of Massachusetts, Mayor O'Brien, of Boston, an Irishman, a catholic and a democrat, has had a most creditable part.

"In no city of the country have civil service laws and rules been better administered than in the city of Brooklyn, under its democratic mayor, Mr. Chapin. If Mayor Grant expects to run an even race for honors in his party with that young statesman he will need very soon to imitate more nearly the example of Mayor Chapin in promoting the cause of civil service reform.

"If, therefore, the republican partisans, patronage mongers, and bosses who have been so successful in making war on their President and discrediting his administration shall attempt to stave off the reform by refusing adequate appropriations in this congress, we may be sure, I think, that democratic votes will prevent it. But, if the majority of the republican party really wish to reject the reform as too much for their patriotism, the democrats, I am sure, will be ready to take it up and go with it before the people in the next presidential election. Civil service reform will cause radical changes in the parties and politics of the country, if, indeed, it does not create a new party."

In Brooklyn, Rev. John W. Chadwick, pastor of the Second Unitarian Church, said:

"The worst operation of the spoils system is the dishonoring of the whole order of government in men's eyes. Government never can be regarded as noble and august under a spoils system. To have it understood that sharpness, that management, that trickery and fraud, that running with the machine, are the appointed ways of political advancement, is a sure way of making government contemptible, even in the eyes of those who are mixed up in all these things. To make it noble and august it must be understood that public office is a recognition of ability and character. If the spoils system had no other condemnation it would have one all sufficient in its responsibility for the birth and existence of the political boss. Without the spoils system his occupation would be gone. As it is, he stands between the people and the government, promising offices with one hand, asking for votes with the other, and corrupting both alike. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.'

"The fruit of the spoils system is the political boss, the most poisonous growth ever fattened in the sun. We shall never deal with them effectually until we cut up by the roots the monstrous growth upon which they feed."

In Syracuse Bishop Huntington preached on Christian Politics, using the text:

*"It came to pass when Samuel was old he made his sons judges over Israel, * * And his sons walked not in his ways but turned aside after lucre and took bribes and perverted judgment. Then all the elders of Israel gathered themselves together * * and said" * * "Now make us a king to judge us like all the nations." I Sam. viii, 1-5.*

"He that walketh righteously and speaketh uprightly, he that despiseth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes—he shall dwell on high; his place of defense shall be the munitions of rocks." Isaiah xxxiii, 15, 16.

"About two months ago, after some preparatory personal correspondence, forty-six citizens, in different parts of the country, put their names to a request that ministers of religion in their several places should, on this day of thanksgiving, appeal to the conscience of the people in behalf of high principles and a purified practice in the civil service of the republic, in all its branches. Within a short time several hundred men declared in writing their hearty concurrence in this invitation. They represent nearly all denominations of Christians and Jews, strong institutions of education and enterprise, and are leaders of learned professions and practical industry, men of enterprise and men of thought. Such a call creates no new obligation. It carries no other than a moral authority. With me it has weight not only in the character and judgment of the petitioners, but for the following reasons: A movement at once so general, so spontaneous, and so direct in its object, is an evidence first that there is a perilous wrong working in the life of the nation, and then that it is in the power and the will of the people to set it right. Reform implies abuse. Here the abuse hurts the health and damages the welfare of the whole political body. It is treachery to a social covenant. It is a violation of a sacred trust. It is the enslavement of the common interest of the many to the self interest of the few. In a free government this is disloyalty. Everywhere it is dishonor. In officers, who are republican servants, it is a fraud. Most significantly this is now acknowledged in the platform of each of the great parties, no one of them daring to face an election without that certificate of honesty. So much the deeper is the guilt if under these plausible pretentions there is a crafty hope that after that fair confession of faith some one of a dozen ways may be found to discard the creed with a jest, and turn reform into contempt. Rightly, therefore, it seems to me, at a great national festival, when all eyes look upward, when all hearts in the wide land are supposed to be lifted from the heritage and the stewardship to the righteous Giver and Lord, do we ask light and instruction from God's word, while we adore him for his mercy. Why congratulate ourselves on a government of which we are loosening and unsettling the foundations? Will he accept us when we thank him for our laws if we break his own? To what purpose are our sacrifices of praise in his church unless while we worship at his altars we renew our pledges of obedience to his commandments?"

In St. Louis, Bishop Tuttle preached at Christ Church Cathedral, saying:

"It may sound manly to say 'to the victor belong the spoils,' as if manifestly a determination to abide the consequences of a square fight, but the manliness goes clear out when considering that the spoils are the public money and the motherland's dower of ownership."

Rev. S. J. Nichols, of the Second Presbyterian Church, said:

"It would be well to cast about for a few reasons why this debauchery of public sentiment prevails. I believe they could be summed up in the spoils system. A system that places partisan service above the public good, which makes character of the least account, which has done more within the past few years to corrupt the fountain head of government and undermine our freedom. It has supplanted the rights of the people with chicanery and fraud; it has stood in the way of the efficiency of the civil service, and made it a laughing-stock for the nations; it has dethroned the respectable citizen and elevated the political boss; has metamorphosed the primary into a den of infamy and has desecrated the sanctity of the ballot-box; it has placed a premium upon all forms of rascality and fraud, and has well nigh destroyed political integrity. The doors of office swing open to the political fine-worker, who enters to plunder instead of serve the people."

Rev. M. Rhodes, in St. Mark's Evangelical Lutheran Church, said:

"Political assessments came next before the speaker's consideration. It is argued that an office is the political gift of a party, and that candidates seeking office at the hands of the party should be willing to pay for it. It is a plausible argument, but it makes a lottery scheme of politics, with money as the principal factor in winning the prize. It is under such conditions that in March, 1888, an open and direct bid of $1,500 for the consulship at Guttenberg, Switzerland, was made. It is bound to have a demoralizing effect. It is a bribe paid to stifle conscience, judgment and manhood."

Dr. Holland, rector of St. George's Episcopal Church, said:

"The United States is not a democracy—it is a monarchy with far more despotic power vested in its sovereign than is vested in the Queen of England. We call our ruler a president, and instead of having a life tenure in the title hereditary in his family he is only elected for four years—not by the people, but by a set of men, chosen by another set of men whose American soubriquet is most appropriate. They are bosses."

Dr. John Snyder, pastor of the Church of the Messiah, preached on civil service reform.

In Chicago the Union Park Congregational, the First Congregational, and St. Paul's Reformed Episcopal Church united. Dr. Noble, of the Union Park Congregational Church, preached on political parties and municipal government.

In St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal Church the pastor, Rev. Wm. White Wilson, on the ethics of civil service reform.

Rev. T. P. Prudden, of the Leavitt Street Congregational Church, said:

"This present manner of dealing in offices is bribery. A candidate says in effect to men: 'Work for me, and if I am elected I will get you this or that position.' And the bribe runs all the way from a foreign mission to managing an elevator in a government building. What difference does it make whether the bribe is in money or something else? The bribery in our civil service is especially bad, because it prevents a free and full expression of opinion at election. It is especially bad bribery because it maintains an army of politicians who control conventions and laugh at conscience in politics. It is especially bad bribery because it is bribery with some one else's property. It is misappropriating funds to bribe with. But the immorality of our present civil service is further evident because it tends to corrupt men. It really puts into a man's hands a fund of offices for him to use as a bribery fund."

Rev. J. C. Learned, of the Church of the Unity, preached on the moral side of politics.

"The speaker began his address by referring to the granting of the Magna Charta in an article of which the king promised not to appoint any 'justices, constables, sheriffs or bailiffs but such as knew the law of the realm and meant truly to observe it.'"

"It has been said," continued the speaker, "that this ancient provision is the gist of civil service reform, which is only an attempt in modern times to restrain the encroachments of arbitrary power for selfish or partisan purposes, to limit such disposition as still survives even under republican form of government."

Sermons were also preached by Rev. W. H. Kaufman, Heber City, Utah, by Rev. Dr. Hickok, pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, and Rev. Wm. Richmond, rector of All Saints Church, in East Orange, N. J. In New Brunswick, N. J., Rev. S. S. Weatherby, of Pitman Church, Rev. Dr. W. J. McKnight, of the First Presbyterian Church, Rev. M. V. McDuffie, of the Remsen Avenue Church, and Rev. H. C. Applegarth, of the First Baptist Church, preached on the spoils system. Mr. Applegarth said:

"I can see how there may be differences of opinion as to how this evil shall be suppressed, just as there may be differences of opinion as to how the liquor traffic is to be suppressed or controlled, but I can not see how any one can stand up and say that the system ought not to be abolished, one way or the other, unless he is crazy or a veritable scoundrel and rogue."

THE STATE REPUBLICAN PRESS.

—Repeal [of the civil service law] would be a stupid blunder.—South Bend Times.

—There is hardly a republican criticism of the administration but that would have been avoided if there had been no offices to distribute.—Lagrange Standard.

—If republicans don't mean what they say in their platforms, they are dishonest. They put civil service into their platform of principles and now they must stand by it. President Harrison has nowhere else to look to. He must be guided by the principles upon which he fought and succeeded.—Winchester Herald.

—The action of certain Indianapolis republicans in naming a republican club the Farwell club, because Senator Farwell proposes to introduce a bill in the senate to repeal the civil-service law will scarcely meet with the approval of republicans throughout the state. The republican policy is fixed and certain on the civil-service law, and a few disgruntled politicians can not change it.—Columbus Republican.

—The more we see of the wild rush for office under the government—the disappointments, the valuable time wasted, and finally the demoralization that generally follows one who has once held an office—the more we are inclined to believe in a civil service law honestly carried out.—Marion Chronicle.

—A newly organized republican club at Indianapolis has dubbed itself the "Farwell club," because the senator of that name is opposed to the civil service law. There is no accounting for tastes, and this is only equaled by that other club down in the southern part of the state which burned up its campaign paraphernalia because the President didn't appoint one of its members postmaster.—Porter County Vidette.

—It is the offices; and yet how slow we are to learn that the distribution of the offices is sure to weaken the party that has it to do. It is impossible to please. The sourness and the soreness that was felt towards Cleveland was all on account of office hunger, and it is precisely so in the case of President Harrison. It is impossible to satisfy all the hungry ones, and it is not practicable always, at least it is not always done, to appoint the very best man for a particular office. And then there are two kicks, and the kickers are much more numerous than the happy ones who draw the prizes. Shall not an editor, for instance who is an applicant for a good, solid office and gets left, lift up his voice and—weep?—New Albany Tribune.

—There is a growing independent element in the country which is less and less interested in partisan politics from year to year. It is a blessing that this is so. The party managers have not near the grip they had a few years ago, and machine methods are constantly declining in popularity and power. People have come to the conclusion that government is not for the office-holders, but for the wise and honest management of the people's business, which is too often miserably mismanaged.—Terre Haute Mail.

—The patriotism that puts patronage above principle, and threatens death and damnation to every one engaged in the distribution of a few offices contrary to its will and wish, is the source and support of civil service reform. The plain people who are not office-seekers, disgusted with these exhibitions of selfish arrogance, will consent to almost any policy which promises to abate them, and so the kickers decrease their chances of getting their noses in the public trough.—Logansport Journal.

—The Tribune will be glad to see President Harrison take strong ground in his message in favor of improved methods in the civil service, especially in the vital matter of appointment to office. And having spoken in behalf of it, we shall be glad to see him push it all along the line. The defects in the law should be promptly remedied by congress, and then let its operations be enlarged and extended. Such disgusting performances as that which occurred at Jeffersonville will soon bring thinking people to a rigid demand for more rigid laws on this subject.—New Albany Tribune.

—It is confidently expected that President Harrison will rub a liberal allowance of salt into the discharging wounds of disappointed office-seekers, next Monday, by renewing his pledges to civil service reform which gives the opportunity to remark that the President's determination to be a man of his word, and of a few words, will prove a God-send to the government service, whatever misfortune he may risk individually.—Kendallville Standard.

—Senators and representatives have no more claim to dictate appointments than the man in the moon, except so far as custom goes, and if there is anything in the petty plea set up by Senator Farwell by a juggling of the language of the constitution, democratic members of congress have the same legal right to say who shall or shall not be office-holders in their respective districts as the President of the United States. The practice has grown to be a great evil, and if the present head of the administration succeeds in taking some of the conceit out of the patronage brokers, and thereby correcting a most flagrant abuse, the result will be appreciated by large proportion of the people who cling to the old-fashioned notion that a statesman's duties consists of something more than office-begging.—Lafayette Courier.

The New York Evening Post, of December 9, contains a valuable interview with Mr. Deland, a government employe of eighteen years, on the practical working of the merit system.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—Samuel A. Kercheval has been appointed examiner in the department of justice. His duty is to examine the records of attorneys, marshals, clerks and commissioners. Kercheval was chairman of the Spencer county republican committee during the campaign. After the election, according to the Chicago Times, in the bar-room of the New-Denison hotel of this city, Kercheval made the following statement, which has never been denied:

"Of course, it was an expensive campaign—the most expensive the state has ever known. The prices of votes averaged over $20 each, and in some cases we had to pay as high as $40 and $50. But we got them, and we carried the state. In Spencer county we had a great many 'floaters,' and it was an open question whether we or the democrats could buy them. We got most of them."

"How could you be sure that a vote which you had paid for would be really delivered?"

"Nothing simpler. If you buy dry goods you get the package when you give the money. We went on the same principle. We had one man stationed at the polling places who was able to see the ballot from the time it left his hands until the time it went into the box. Now, suppose a floater is secured by a worker. Say you are a worker and this gentleman is the voter, and this gentleman here is the guard at the polls. Now, you agree with this man to pay him $20 for a straight republican vote. You steer him up to the guard at the polls and call his attention to him. The guard gives him a ballot folded and ready to put into the judge's hands. The voter takes it, and if he votes as he has contracted to do, without looking at it or 'monkeying' with it in any way—and the guard can see whether he does or not, for he is never more than three feet away from the ballot-box—then he (the guard) signals back to you that the man is all right, and you take him off and give him his money. He has to trust you that far, although I have seen cases in this election when the 'floater' would not trust the worker, but insisted on having one hand on the money while he put in the ballot."

"How is the money paid afterward?"

"Well, down in our part of the country we took a room which had been used as a gambling hell. The door had one of those little openings to it in the center from which you could see out, but you could not see in. When a worker had got a vote, he wrote on a little piece of blue paper the amount of money to which the voter was entitled, and the voter poked his hand through the hole with that bit of card-board in it. The paper was taken off by a young man inside, examined and verified, and, if it was all right, the money—$10, $20, $50, as the case might be—was placed in the still open hand. The man outside saw nothing; neither did the man inside. It was all done quietly and efficiently, and nobody was the wiser."

—It is reported that John C. Houk, son of Representative Houk, of Tennessee, and at present in the employ of the census bureau, is to be assistant doorkeeper of the house. Mr. Houk, it will be remembered, despises the civil service law as un-American and un-democratic. Mr. Houk does not wish his son to be subjected to the test of open competition. It is better to get into a place because he is the son of a feudal baron.

—WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—President Harrison this afternoon appointed the following United States consuls:

William E. Gardner, of Wisconsin, to Rotterdam. Mr. Gardner has been for several years connected with the Evening Wisconsin, Milwaukee.

John B. Osborne, of Pennsylvania, to Ghent, where a vacancy exists. Mr. Osborne is a son of the congressman from Wilkes Barre.

—Col. C. S. Forbes, of the Boston Journal, and F. N. Whitney, of the Burlington Clipper, have been appointed deputy collectors of internal revenue for the district of New Hampshire.

—Senator Moody, of South Dakota, seems to have surprised even old stagers at office-grabbing by appointing his son a page in the senate.

—Wm. A. McDowell, of Lafayette, has passed a successful examination for a position in the census office, and, upon the recommendation of Congressman Cheadle, will soon receive an appointment.

—Dudley W. Fleming, of Warren county, has been appointed, upon the recommendation of Mr. Cheadle, to a position in the government printing office. —Special to the Indianapolis Journal Dec. 5.

—A postmaster at Lafayette is expected to be named this week. It is undecided yet who will get the position. B. Wilson Smith and Messrs. Throckmorton and Creigmyer are mentioned prominently. The latter has received the indorsement of Congressman Cheadle.

—"The people in my locality," said W. T. Durbin, of Anderson, "are beginning to realize that this is purely and strictly a republican administration. The party in Madison and Shelby counties is harmonious, and in Hancock the outlook is very bright. As to President Harrison's message, I have heard nothing but praise."

Mr. Durbin means that so far as his domain extends this is a Durbin administration, and that he has dispensed the patronage to the satisfaction of Mr. Durbin and Mr. Durbin's favorites.

—A hundred and ten prominent republicans, headed by Gen. Adam E. King, from Baltimore, came over to-day and called upon the postmaster-general for the purpose of making a recommendation for the appointment of a postmaster at Baltimore. After they presented their candidate the postmaster-general looked the delegation in the face and smilingly inquired: "Are there any more citizens left in Baltimore?"

"Yes," replied Gen. King, "there are a few women and children left over there."

Mr. Stockbridge, the newly elected representative of congress from Baltimore, has recommended the appointment of another man than the one urged by this delegation. Mr. King told the postmaster-general that they desire it understood the man recently elected to congress in Baltimore was not authorized to speak for 500,000 patrons of the Baltimore office in the selection of a postmaster, and that they desired to take issue with Mr. Stockbridge's recommendations.

"Well," said Mr. Wanamaker, "you have elected Mr. Stockbridge to represent you in congress, and I shall take it for granted that you have, by his election, decided it to be known that he is your authorized representative, and it is the policy here to recognize the recommendations of republican congressmen in the selection of federal officers in their districts."—Special to the Indianapolis Journal, Nov. 25.

—The delay in the confirmation of Maj. Cravens, internal revenue collector for this district, has caused the friends of the appointee to resent what appears to them to be unwarranted interference on the part of Messrs. Browne, Cheadle and Owen, republican congressmen from this state. These gentlemen (since there is no republican senator from Indiana) have assumed to control the patronage.

The collector of revenue has fifty-eight appointments to make, including storekeepers, gaugers and deputies. The deputies are appointed by the collector, and are responsible to him only. The other appointees are named by the secretary of the treasury, upon the recommendation of the collector. The appointment of ten of these has been "hung up" because the congressmen named will not consent to the recommendations made by the collector, and the collector will not name the men whom the congressmen are trying to hoist into place. The congressmen have even gone so far, it is asserted, as to resist the confirmation of Cravens, on the ground that he is "a back member," and only agree to "let up" in consideration of the concessions desired.

On the other hand, the friends of the collector say time will shame the congressmen out of their position. They are particularly severe on Congressman Tom Browne. "It is understood that this is his last term," said one of them, to-day, "and I don't see what right he has to interfere. He will have no further need for his friends' political support."—Indianapolis News, December 18.

—Frank H. Challis, editor of the Manchester, N. H., Daily Press (Rep.), was a candidate for the deputy collectorship for his district, but another man was appointed on Tuesday. Challis, therefore, says in his paper: "With the election of a republican president the editor was insane enough to think there was going to be an administration of the government of which a young republican might be proud, and of which it might be an honor to be, even in a small way, a part. He therefore foolishly allowed himself to become a candidate for the office. But the editor himself is eminently satisfied (he does not say pleased) with the outcome. He is glad that he is not to be placed in a position which might seem in any degree to demand a cordial support of the administration of the cheapest pattern of the genus homo that ever was wafted into the presidential chair."

—Joel Hyatt, of Indiana, who was superintendent of the clerk's document room, house of representatives, during the past three congresses, has been superseded by a Pennsylvania republican. Mr. Hyatt was one of the most intelligent and popular officials under the late administration. This position was promised General Browne for one of his constituents at Muncie, but Pennsylvania seems to fall heir to about all the good places under Mr. McPherson, who is a Pennsylvanian. He has already given to his state the positions of chief clerk, assistant disbursing clerk, stationery clerk, index clerk and clerk to the document room. Besides these, the state comes in for the lion's share of committee clerks, chairmanships and positions under the door-keeper, sergeant-at-arms and postmaster.—Special to the Indianapolis Journal, Dec. 13.

—The new postmaster, of Kansas City, has made the son of the President's brother [a democrat] his deputy.

—The President, through Marshal Ransdell, has given A. D. Shaw a $2,000 place as chief of a division in Washington. Shaw was president of the railroad men's club here in the campaign. Other members, however, say that it will take more than this appointment to reward the club for their services.

—The appointment of Eugene G. Hay to be district attorney for Minnesota, made to-day, ends a controversy that has been going on for some time. Mr. Hay was indorsed by Senator Washburn and opposed by Senator Davis, who had another candidate. Mr. Hay has lived in Minnesota only a few years. He was for many years a resident of Indiana, and is a warm personal friend of President Harrison.—Indianapolis Journal, Dec. 17.

—Maj. Kinney, one of the editors of The Courier, wishes to be postmaster, and he is backed by Senator Hawley, the editor-in-chief, who is said to have secured from the President the promise of Kinney's appointment. Leading merchants and other eminent republican citizens are also in favor of him. On the other hand, the rank and file of the republican party of the city are opposed to Kinney and in favor of a merchant named A. B. Gillette, who is an active member of the young republican wing of the party, and is backed by the republican city committee and its chairman, Mr. McGovern. Maj. Kinney supposed he had the inside track till yesterday, when McGovern issued a call for the republicans of the city to assemble in one of the public halls on Saturday next and decide by ballot between the two candidates. This has created consternation in the editorial camp, for it is feared that McGovern, as the leader of the machine, can get out his men in far greater numbers than the Kinney faction can get out theirs, and can thus show a large popular majority in favor of Gillette.—New York Evening Post.

—Primarily the national administration and President Harrison have not been acceptable to the republicans so far as the distribution of patronage is concerned, and the Ohio republicans have not received what they consider their full share.—Interview with Judge Thurman.

—The people demand immeasurably more from the republican party than they do from the democratic party. The second can retain its voters by doing comparatively well; the first can keep its hold upon its followers only by doing positively well.—Philadelphia Press [Rep.], since the elections.

—This is a question of the greatest interest to workingmen, inasmuch as the reform looks to the placing of all men on an equal footing for chances of appointment to the public service, irrespective of the power of influence or favor. Those who oppose it seek to delude the masses with the false cry that it is a scheme for placing the aristocrats and college-bred in control of the offices, to the exclusion of the common people, because an educational test of merit is required as an evidence of fitness. This is simply a shallow pretence, or worse, a bare-faced misrepresentation.—Buffalo Sunday Truth [Labor].

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

No matter what a person's position, whether king on his throne, or judge on the bench, or only village postmaster, to disregard the principles which should naturally and justly govern his conduct, whether to advance his own selfish interests or those of some party he has associated himself with—this is immoral; and no obligations to his party, no traditions of the past, can make it otherwise than immoral.—Rev. Joseph May, November 28, 1889.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana

Probably if the letter books of all the congressmen in the country were published a blow would be struck at the spoils system from which it would never recover. The people of the country, irrespective of party, would be shocked to find for what mean and paltry reasons good men and women are discharged, how unworthy are the agents to whom, in great measure, the federal patronage is committed, and how poorly their own interests are consulted in the choice of officeholders.—Boston Post [Dem.] January, 11.

MR. OLIVER T. MORTON has written an article upon "Some Popular Objections to Civil Service Reform," which will appear in the Atlantic Monthly in March and April.

A STRANGE report comes from Philadelphia to the effect that Quay's Collector Cooper appoints men as laborers and then promotes them to clerkships within the classified service. It is also said that Mr. Roosevelt has investigated this and pronounced it true. The Philadelphia association ought to make open and continuous war upon this cheating and illegal practice. It hardly seems possible that President Harrison will wait to have his elbow jogged before he will correct such a clumsy fraud.

OUR barons are disturbed, and are showing their hands—a bad thing to come to in this country. They are proposing bills to put the some 150,000 federal places into congressional districts to be divided for their benefit, but at less personal trouble and risk than they now have. General Rosecrans has a bill called a civil service reform bill, which proposes to have the places lotted out to congressmen, and for each congressman, when a vacancy in his bailiwick occurs, to select five of his henchmen and to put these under an examination for the final test.

THE Farwell club is no more. Senator Farwell felt that it was more than even he could carry, and wrote them a letter refusing to have the club named after him, whereupon it expired. Its effects were gathered in a heap and sold to William Pritchard for $36.41 for debt. This is a very instructive life and death. The tin-horn-Farwell club was composed exclusively of that class constantly spoken of as the active party workers, the men who keep up the party, the men who get out the voters on election day, the torch bearers, the men who ride forty miles at night for the Ingallses, the boys with cold toes, the wheel-horses, the members who must be taken in out of the cold, and finally and above all, the men who must be fed with spoil or party ruin is inevitable. In this view, when banded together, they should have been irresistible. In fact they were the contempt and the subject of ridicule of every class. They got no spoil. They whined and threatened, and went to pieces. As individuals they breathe vengeance, but if the republicans had only them to fear, it would not need to dread the future.

A GOOD deal of space is given in this number to illustrate the operation by which those characterized by a president of a republican club as "lean and hungry republican shoats," crowd each other at the official trough. The information is given as it has been reported from time to time in the public prints, and in certain cases allowance will have to be made for partisan bias. In the main, however, any one conversant with the operations in this state will recognize that the statements under-color the true situation rather than the opposite. It is also recognized on every hand that the process has honey-combed the republican party strength. This is what certain congressmen describe as keeping the offices near to the people.

MR. HENRY A. RICHMOND, of Buffalo, New York, one of the first civil service commissioners under the law of that state, has placed in the hands of the editor of the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE fifty dollars to be used to further civil service reform in Indiana. Believing that the destruction of the spoils system only depends upon the publication of the facts, it has been determined to offer the above sum as a prize for the best statement of the facts of the use of the federal offices as spoil in any given district. For instance, a concise account of the efforts of Congressmen Cheadle and Owen in this behalf, in their respective districts, would be very instructive. A sample question might be: Why was the editor of the Delphi Journal given an office? Young men in college and out of college, and all others who are interested in such investigations, will be especially urged to compete.

THE annual meeting of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association will be held in March or April. As the time approaches the project of holding it in Fort Wayne is being discussed. Many prominent men in that city have become identified with the Association, and have taken an active interest in its work. It is true, also, that cities like Fort Wayne, Richmond and Terre Haute should have the civil service law applied to their local federal offices; this object, agitation at home would tend to hasten.

A CRITIC'S INCENTIVE.

If the committee to investigate the civil service, of which Mr. Foulke is chairman, should do nothing more than to prepare a list of the newspapers that have been subsidized by office, it would be an impressive object-lesson. We know that a congressman receives the support of a county paper, and later gives its editor an office; but, all the same, it is difficult to rid the mind of the fiction that a newspaper reflects public opinion. Not till the lists of the subsidized newspaper editors and the office holders, made of the political committeemen, are printed, shall we realize the grip of a political machine and the tremendous agencies it employs to stifle public opinion. An instance of this has recently occurred at Delphi, this state. The republican paper, week after week, attacked the civil-service law and the merit system with bitter hostility. So far the editor may have been wrong, but honest, though all the old lies against the merit system were repeated with a gusto that forbade correction. But it later appeared that the animus of these philippics was an office wanted that had not come. Then the editor discarded generalities and made his wishes known in a way that must have caused his worthy congressman to shake with apprehension. Space must limit the the quotation:

If, when John C. New, of the Journal, asked for the London consulship, he had been informed that Cleveland's appointee would be retained, what a blue tinge the air would have taken on. And how Dan Ransdell and W. H. H. Miller and Porter and Huston and all the rest of them would have howled in agony if civil service slop had been doled out to them. Under these circumstances would the Indianapolis Journal be feeding the pampered, weak-mindful, scrofulous child on choice bonbons? No indeed. The Indianapolis Journal would have been a center from which greased lightning would have darted in all directions. The Journal ought to know that it is of infinitely more importance to satisfy the working republicans in the out counties on this point than the prominent politicians of that paper and in Indianapolis. For the out counties give the republican majorities. * * * * *

We can see that President Harrison is merely executing the law as it now is. This is all right. But unless the present congress relieves him of the law by wiping it out of existence they will show to the country that they lack the courage of their convictions, that they are not in harmony with the republican sentiment of the country.

Let Congressman Cheadle go ahead. Let him force his bill to a vote. We want to see the names of the cowards who are tarred with the same stick that has made the names of Roosevelt, Curtis, et al., odoriferous to a purgative extent.

Mr. Ricketts got his office forthwith.

THE LOOT OF THE INDIAN SERVICE

It would seem to be a simple matter for an association known to be entirely non-partisan and composed of men of the highest standing to have its word regarding evils investigated by it accepted by a President. But so dense is the officialism at Washington that the Indian Rights Association labored nearly four years before they succeeded in really making any headway in impressing President Cleveland with the gravity of the evil that had gone on. Every one else knew of the shameful wrong and scandal resulting from giving the places in the Indian service as spoil. At the close of his administration, the appointment of Mr. Oberly doubtless foreshadowed a reform in this service. During President Harrison's candidacy and after his election, every effort was made to induce him to subject this service to no risk, but to at once put it under the competitive system. General Harrison showed entire familiarity with the abuses that had gone on in this service, but he was reluctant to say that the competitive system was the best practicable system. Why has President Harrison also apparently given this service over to the clutch of congressional spoilsman? Last month the Civil Service Chronicle printed a letter from an entirely trustworthy source, stating that Senator Moody had sent over a henchman to spy out the Yankton agency to see whether it would suit him. A protest was made against removing the best agent the Yankton Indians had had for twelve years, but to no purpose. Since protests do not avail, it is the duty of the Indian Rights Association to appeal to public opinion and to give a particular account of every instance where a congressman attempts to remove a competent employe in order to put some man who has made "his hedge" or carried out "his dung" into a place. Mr. Welsh may be sure that if he will give his fellow citizens the facts, they will not be indifferent. Nor can the responsibility of the President end with the appointment of General Morgan. Has he said to him, these places are not congressional or other spoil, do your duty and I will do mine. If a recent interview with General Morgan is correct, he has already reluctantly come to admit that these congressional barons, if they so insist, must be obeyed, and places made as they dictate, to be filled as they will.

THE CLERGY AND CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

The Civil Service Record for January prints a list, as the names have casually come to the knowledge of the editor, of the clergymen who have already preached or will in the near future preach a sermon on civil service reform. It is a noteworthy list of two hundred or more. Many of these sermons will be printed and circulated, the more the better. Those clergymen who have tried to maintain that this question was only a political one, and thus not for pulpit discussion, can not hold their ground in the face of the sermons, treating it as a grave moral question. That the list of the Record by no means indicates the number of sermons actually preached, but not reported, may be illustrated by Richmond, in this state. There Rev. I. M. Hughes, Rev. Alexander Gilchrist, Rev. J. W. Stone and Rev. A. W. Lampert, preached upon this question. In Indianapolis, Rev. John Hilliard Ranger, of Christ church, will shortly preach upon it. Rev. E. R. Johnson of Crawfordsville, in his sermon said: "To-day nearly, if not quite, 250,000 offices of the civil service are like so many distinct sums of money used as political capital in the hands of the wire-workers in both parties in order to secure the election of their candidates. In this way the offices of the country have become the stronghold of the party in power, and the party out of power makes strenuous efforts to become possessed of them." This is brave talk in Indiana, but we are informed that this sermon was fully endorsed by Mr. Johnson's congregation, and that the question of civil service reform is to be further discussed by the ministerial association of Crawfordsville. All this is most encouraging.

CONGRESS AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The confirmation of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Thompson as civil service commissioners marks a decisive advance of the merit system. They came upon the commission at a time when it was in sore need of a fearless attitude, and it can not be said that they have been meek. With Mr. Roosevelt as the chief spokesman the commission has allowed no direct attack to go unnoticed. It has given blow for blow, and very generally its critics are badly disfigured. The commission also has understood the duties laid upon it by the law and has not been backward in performance. Office after office accustomed to obey the law so far as party exigency permitted was brought up with a round turn. The commission proclaimed everywhere that democrats and all non-republicans and republicans would have exactly the same treatment when competing. It overhauled local boards and had it understood that these boards are not local party machines. It did not hesitate to beard Mahone when his henchmen undertook to unlawfully collect money. The result is that the law is being enforced in a manner never known before, and it necessarily follows that this enforcement will not in the future be less rigid, but more so. That the senate, made up almost entirely of partisans, now confirms these appointments indicates that even partisans have come to recognize the inevitable—that the merit system is thoroughly rooted in the federal service.

Another indication of this decisive advance is the constitution of the committee on the civil service by Speaker Reed. The members are, Lehlbach of New Jersey, Bayne of Pennsylvania, Butterworth of Ohio, Hopkins of Illinois, Greenhalge of Massachusetts, Sanford of New York, Lind of Minnesota, Stephenson of Michigan, Dargan of South Carolina, Stone of Missouri, Alderson of West Virginia, Andrew of Massachusetts, Boatner of Louisiana.

The formation of this committee proves that the merit system is to be built up. Let congress now give the little sum of $53,000 asked by the commission and that system will make progress that will please its friends and convince its enemies. It will relieve congressmen of the greatest burden they now carry—the importunities of place hunters. Once relieved of these importunities the very congressmen who are now struggling to retain the distribution of offices, will turn and thank the civil service reformers. It is doubtful if upon self-examination any congressman who is now an outspoken spoilsman would find that he had any other motive than fear of his party workers at home. This is an ignoble fear and to a large extent unnecessary. The fate of the Farwell club in Indianapolis proves that the men who do party work only for party spoil are the weakest of enemies. Any congressman has but to fight them openly and take the people into his confidence to put them to rout.

THE PRESIDENT'S OPPORTUNITY.

It is not true that incumbency is a conclusive argument for a continuance in office. Impartiality, moderation, fidelity to public duty, and a good attainment in the discharge of it must be added before the argument is complete. When those heading an administrative office so conduct themselves as to convince just political opponents that no party consideration or bias affects in any way the discharge of their public duties, we can more easily stay the demand for removals.—President's Message, December, 1889.

The President can find in the postmasters at Springfield and Quincy, Mass., public servants who have not only shown all the qualifications he would exact for retention, but whose retention is demanded by public opinion in the communities in which they have labored. Mr. Spear, the democrat appointed postmaster at Quincy by President Cleveland, is past middle life, an old resident and a successful business man. He has administered the office to the satisfaction of citizens of all classes. The republican, whom Congressman Morse intends to have appointed, is the chairman of the republican ward and city committee, and at present without any regular business. In Massachusetts a congressman feels constrained to appear to defer somewhat to public opinion, and Congressman Morse therefore suggested a caucus to determine the wishes of the republican patrons of the office. Later the republican city committee, hearing that the caucus was to be conducted on the plan of the Australian ballot system, objected, and Mr. Morse saw fit to withdraw his offer. Instead, he sent some circulars around and asked that the preference be indicated by letter to him. Nothing becomes an aristocratic government by congressmen like secrecy! Nevertheless, a caucus was held, and out of 150 votes Mr. Spear received 100. Mr. Morse explained the situation by saying, "The republicans are indifferent, and do not care who is postmaster so long as he is a good man." This is simply the congressional way of saying that the republican taxpayers do not approve of turning out a good man.

The President can now decide between a public servant who has not allowed "party consideration or bias" to in any way affect the discharge of his public duties, and a republican chairman of a political committee whose whole experience unfits him to become the public official indicated by the President.

The case of Postmaster Rice is much stronger. He is all and more than the President asks for. At the end of four years there are more republican than democratic subordinates employed under this democratic postmaster. Over two hundred and seventy-five republican patrons of the office were willing publicly to petition for his retention. Fourteen republican papers, including the Boston Journal, the Boston Transcript, the Haverhill Gazette, the Palmer Journal, the Brattleboro Phoenix commend the efforts of the Springfield Republican to retain the services of such a man. The President has always expressed a tenderness for the veterans of the civil war. What ruler, except in the United States, would even consider the brutal discharge [the four years tenure is nothing except an opportunity for evasion] of an employe of the highest efficiency and popularity, a veteran with this record, which we copy from the Republican:

John L. Rice enlisted April 19, 1861, in the 2d New Hampshire regiment. It was the very day when the first Union soldiers, men of the Massachusetts 6th, were slain in the streets of Baltimore. In the first battle of Bull Run, in the final struggle for the Henry hill, just before the stampede of the Federal army, Rice fell with a musket ball through the lungs. He was borne off by his comrades toward Sudley church, which had been taken for a hospital, but being sharply pursued, and thinking him dead, they left him under a fence. There he lay two days, unconscious, and was found by a Virginian and his wife who had been taking care of the wounded men in Sudley church; they cleansed his festering wounds, tended and fed him, until the end of ten days he could be moved. He was taken to Manassas Junction, placed on board a freight car, and conveyed with other prisoners to Richmond. In Libby prison, 14 days after the battle, Rice for the first time had his wound properly dressed. Meantime, he had been reported dead, and his friends at home had held funeral services. In Libby he remained six months when he was exchanged, and immediately rejoined his regiment, although for several months he was unable to carry more than his musket and ammunition. He served in its ranks, through all its battles on the Peninsula and in Pope's Bull Run campaign, at South Mountain and at Antietam. On the field of Antietam the governor of New Hampshire found him doing guard duty and promoted him to a captaincy. Capt. Rice was among the troops detailed to accompany Gen. Banks when he went to Louisiana to relieve Gen. Butler.

There ought to be no objection to a thorough investigation of the operations of the civil service commission and no friend of the merit system will make any. Some things are, however, clear without any investigation. One is that no relative of any member of the commission should be in its employ. After the years of public scandal of appointing officers giving offices to relatives, for the civil service commission to have such a case is per se improper.

In the same line, also, Senator Edmunds cuts a poor figure in the matter of the proposed Dudley investigation. That he could read Dudley's letter and not get up and heartily second the investigation is a grave disappointment to many who have for years believed that Senator Edmunds would never be afraid to hunt for the truth and face it. This matter can not be allowed to rest here. Dudley wrote that letter; "unimpeachable witnesses have sworn to his signature. The district attorney of Indiana illegally prevented his arrest and pronounced his letter honorable and patriotic, and still, by sufferance of President Harrison, unbearably disgraces his office by occupancy. These facts make a situation which can not be ignored. The administration and its party will have to learn the lesson that discovered scoundrels must become discarded and discountenanced scoundrels. Notwithstanding all that has occurred, it is not by any means certain that with a prosecutor who meant to do his duty Dudley could not yet be sent to prison.

A remarkable and disgraceful struggle between Congressman Dalzell and Congressman Quay over the Pittsburgh post-office has recently come to a close in the triumph of Quay. Complete statements of each side are given in another column. Their frankness is truly astonishing. Dalzell says, "The President * * seems to think that precedent could not stand against the demand of the chairman of the national committee. * * It is a wrong against the representative of my district." Quay says, "The President is the absolute arbiter of all federal patronage. * * * The fact is that the city organization of Pittsburgh has, until very recently, been exceedingly hostile to me, and the Pittsburgh post-office embraces about three hundred appointments, which to put it mildly, I decline to have placed in the hands of my adversaries. * * The President * * could not under the circumstances well avoid complying with my wishes." Will President Harrison read the constitution of the United States and say that he is not disgraced by this transaction? Not only his oath of office, but his manhood is trampled upon and dragged in the dirt.

The Maryland opponents of American feudalism and of Mr. Gorman as its striking example, have now been for several years giving Senator Gorman Pyrrhus-like victories. There are signs that these assaults have told on even Senator Gorman's nerves, and that his hand has lost somewhat of its cunning. A ballot-reform bill would be inconvenient for the carrying out of his political methods, but a ballot-reform bill had been promised. He therefore prepared a crafty speech, which was intended only for the ears of the county weekly papers, and which was to give them the keynote of opposition to the Australian system, and to undo the chance of passing any bill. But Mr. Gorman's speech got into print, and the outcome was such a burst of public disapproval that he felt obliged to announce that he would explain more fully his opinions about ballot reform. There are bad days ahead for the Maryland boss.

Delegate E. M. Clements of Petersburg, has introduced into the Virginia legislature a bill providing for non-partisan boards of fire and police commissioners in cities, who shall after examination of applicants, without reference to political opinion, nominate men for positions in those departments. The common council has the confirmation of the nomination. The term of office in the departments named is six years, one third going out each year. This is not a complete merit system, but it is a step and it will be a very considerable step in a state that has been ridden by Mahoneism.

In connection with this bill the Petersburg Progress gives some interesting facts about the government of that city. In 1869 a military order put out the democrats and filled their places with republicans. Early in 1870 under the new constitution the democrats came in and turned out all the republicans. In May, 1870, after a city election, the republicans got control and turned out all the democrats. In 1874 the democrats in turn put out all the republicans. In 1882 Mahone coalitionists got control and swept out the democrats. In 1888 the city council again became democratic and made the last clean sweep. After the rotation of 1882, a large fire occurred from lack of a known convenient supply of water. Within one hundred feet of the burning building was a reservoir with abundance of water, but so complete had been the application of the rule of "giving some else a chance" that not a person connected with the fire department knew of this cistern. It was as completely lost as a buried city.

Two of the three recent post-office appointees from the top of the eligible list are stated to be democrats.

The appointment by the President of John B. Harlow as postmaster of St. Louis is not only a creditable act, in that it gives a large city a good postmaster, but the promotion of a faithful and efficient clerk to be the head of an office is the very essence of the merit system. A curious injustice of the spoils system has been the custom of going out to select an inexperienced man to be the head of a department, and to consume months in teaching him his duties, and to ignore the men whose fidelity and efficiency had earned them the right of promotion. The civil service law has thus largely been in the hands of its enemies. The men who have entered the service under the merit system, trained to the belief that their chief duty was to do the best work possible, have been superintended by working politicians, trained in the belief that the office was to be made the backbone of the party's strength. This has been a constant menace and peril to the law, and to the men who have entered the service under the law. Every time the President promotes a worthy federal employe he strengthens the principles of the merit system the country over.

Census Superintendent Porter, according to the Indianapolis Journal, says: "It will simply be impossible to see any more applicants for clerical positions. My whole time has nearly been consumed in talking with applicants. The business of the office has been neglected." The responsibility for this condition of things is upon the President. Long ago the civil service commission not only offered to furnish the clerks for the census bureau under the system of open competition, which permitted tests that would have supplied the best class of men, but urged upon the President the adoption of this course. He refused with deliberation, and it is no injustice to him to say that he refused with the sole object of giving his party the benefit of the use of these places as spoil. The result was, of course, inevitable. A superintendent of the census, who has in hand a work which would tax to the utmost the capabilities of the ablest specialist, if absolutely free for that work alone, has his whole time consumed in "talking with applicants," and in trying to find quarters at the expense of the people for multitudes of congressional henchmen.

The attention of the esteemed civil service reform league of Indiana is invited to the fact that the postmaster at Fort Wayne has just been elected a member of the republican central committee of Allen county. Mr. Cleveland didn't permit federal office-holders to become members of political committees, but he wasn't a good enough civil service man for the Indiana reformers, so they helped elect Harrison, who has no objection whatever to federal office-holders acting in this capacity. The Indiana reformers are what Sam Weller would call a "rum lot," sure enough.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

There is no more gratifying sign of the increase of public sentiment against the use of public offices as personal or party spoil than is afforded by the Sentinel under its new management. This management evidently has not read the back numbers of that paper. If it had, it would find that Mr. Cleveland's postmaster Kaough, at Fort Wayne, was one of the most pestiferous party workers during his whole term of office. As chief marshal of the federal office-holders in the service of Congressman Lowry, he led his party to disaster in the twelfth district in 1886. He was one of the large class of brazen insulters and contemners in Indiana of Mr. Cleveland's orders and declared principles. In a friendly way, we advise the Sentinel to avoid comparisons like this. Those who lived here at the time were long suffering and are full of facts. Ugly as those facts are, they do not in any manner excuse President Harrison, and it is a vicious impropriety to allow the postmaster at Fort Wayne to be a member of a republican county committee.

THE AMERICAN-DEMOCRATIC ANTI-CHINESE-SYSTEM.

This pork is fat enough to kill, and it ought to be disposed of while the political knife is sharp and the water hot, so as to give place to a few of the lean and hungry republican shoats who have been rooting and digging for the last four years in hopes to get a whack at Uncle Sam's crib before the corn is all gone.—S. R. Stratton, President of the Pennsylvania Republican Association in Washington, Aug. 29, 1889.

—JEFFERSONVILLE—The republicans of this city are indignant over the appointment of Major A. M. Luke as postmaster. He, like all other appointees here, held office for years when Cleveland came in. The Lincoln League last night burned all campaign outfits and Harrison's pictures, as expressive of its dislike.—Special to Indianapolis News.

—SULLIVAN—The republican wrangle for postmaster at Sullivan yesterday culminated in a mass meeting, and E. P. Lacey, deputy postmaster at Sullivan in Garfield's time, was named as the choice. J. P. Clugage, editor of the Union, who is also an aspirant, refused to go into this meeting.

—BERNE—After a bitter wrangle John N. Sullivan, an old soldier, was appointed postmaster at Berne, and he moved the post office into a drug store owned by a democrat. This added additional fuel to the ill-feeling already existing, and the disgruntled republicans were successful in getting Sullivan's appointment revoked, and a township committeeman named Wagoner appointed. The latter refuses to qualify, and the tangle is greater than ever.—Indianapolis News.

—LOGANSPOUT—It is stated that the postoffice fight in Logansport has been settled, and that Congressman W. D. Owen will recommend the appointment of Daniel W. Tomlinson, chairman of the republican county central committee.—Indianapolis Journal.

—MUNCIE—We made a gain of 480 for Harrison, showing the second largest gain of any county in the state. Yet we have not secured a single appointment. Marion county lost 1,100 and the annual salaries of the citizens who have been appointed from Indianapolis will aggregate $200,000. If this is good politics, we don't know anything about politics. Probably this accounts for the indifference up our way.—Interview in Indianapolis News.

—MONROEVILLE—Monroeville republicans are so determinedly opposed to Hugh Stewart, recently appointed postmaster, that a boycott has been organized against the office, and citizens have arranged for a pony express, and send their mail to a little town across the Ohio line to be forwarded.—Indianapolis News.

—The Monroeville postoffice war continues. U. S. Marshall Blair was there last week for the purpose of looking into the affair, and found that the majority of the people would have nothing at all to do with the postoffice, mailed their letters upon passing trains, and purchased their stamps at Fort Wayne.—Indianapolis News.

—The squabble over the Monroeville post-office has been settled by the resignation of Hugh Stewart, who takes a place in one of the departments at Washington, while George Webster succeeds him as postmaster. Captain J. B. Davis, another applicant, has been appointed government agent for the Sioux Indians. The situation is still further ameliorated in Allen county by making Robert A. Liggett, of Fort Wayne, revenue guager for that district, vice Edward R. Sweet, removed.—Indianapolis News.

—KOKOMO—Almost the last act of President Arthur was to nominate Colonel Milt. Garrigus, of Kokomo, as collector of that revenue district, but General Harrison was a member of the senate committee, investigating certain charges which had been preferred, and Garrigus was not confirmed through his efforts. In the last campaign Garrigus was chairman of the Howard county central committee, and he increased the republican majority. After Harrison's inauguration he filed an application to be appointed postmaster of Kokomo, but his friends have been notified by Harrison that he can not be appointed, because of the old accusation, which has been withdrawn from the senate, and of which the only copy is in possession of one man, who has notified the President that no one save himself can produce the charge against Garrigus, and that it is his property. President Harrison, however, is determined not to appoint Garrigus, although Congressman Cheadle is making a personal fight for him, and in consequence, there is great hubbub in this section of the state.—Special to Indianapolis News, June 8, 1889.

—WINAMAC—A correspondent of the Indianapolis Sentinel states that Congressman Owen recommended the editor of the Winamac Republican for postmaster, but that the President refused, on the ground that there were too many old soldiers who had been neglected. However, he was told that any compromise which might be reached whereby Editor Atchison could receive a portion of the salary from any of the soldier candidates, the appointment would be made in harmony with the compromise. Mr. Owen so informed the committee, who made the proposition to each of the soldier candidates for the position that if he would pay Atchison $200 per year out of the salary, that his appointment would be made forthwith. E. N. Hughes, George Douglass and Johnny James, all honest and highly respected citizens, were the soldier candidates, but they concluded that they would take the "entire swine" or none. Another soldier was then approached, who accepted the terms made by the committee, and he being the highest and best bidder, at the recommendation of Congressman Owen and by order of Chief Harrison, the post-office was "knocked off" to him.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

—FRANKLIN—Our city is all torn up over the new postmaster. Certainly the slick six here got in their work. As against either of his leading opponents, Richardson or McLaughlin, he could not have got one vote in ten. I have heard prominent republicans denounce his appointment most emphatically. There was a call published to the old soldiers to meet Saturday, and, if possible, to defeat this very nomination, which was telegraphed to Washington, and the appointment hastened to head off any expression from them.—Letter to Indianapolis Sentinel.

—PORTLAND—It had a soldier democratic postmaster with nearly three years time yet to serve in office. He was removed and a republican appointed. Postmaster Lowrie was the most popular official who has ever served in the office, and a man in needy circumstances. He was given the "razzle-dazzle." There were six republican candidates—Levi L. Gilpin, a gallant soldier; Nimrod Headington, a gallant soldier; Thomas Bosworth, a gallant soldier; Theodore Baily, a gallant soldier; Mr. Buck, a gallant soldier (every one has a good soldier record), and Elias J. Marsh, a civilian and a crank. Marsh was appointed. There is no more unpopular man in his own party. The kicking is mighty among the republican cohorts. It was totally unexpected here that Marsh would get the appointment. His candidacy was laughed at, but Congressman Browne, of Winchester, was enlisted in his behalf and the appointment, it seems, was easily obtained.—Letter in Indianapolis Sentinel.

—GREENFIELD—Word has reached this city that Mr. Isaac Davis has been appointed postmaster of Greenfield vice N. P. Howard, jr., removed. This change has been looked for for some time past, as it was known to be the choice of Col. Richard Alexander Black, the boss of the republican graveyard. It will require several days to file the necessary papers to enable Mr. Davis to enjoy the possession of the prize. The appointment is not satisfactory to a large number of republicans, especially our friend, Mr. Montgomery, editor of the Greenfield Republican.—Hancock Democrat.

—COLUMBUS—Republicans, twelve or fifteen in number, who want the post-office, with their friends held a convention last night to try to settle on a man to be recommended for the Columbus post-office. When the time arrived, three or four aspirants, with their followers, bolted and swore they would not abide by the decision reached. The wrangle was kept up until a late hour when the choice fell on Amos Hartman, a groceryman. There is great dissatisfaction, and the party is torn up in consequence.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

—The Reelsville post-office was a bone of contention until the appointment of G. L. Elliott was made a week or two since. Mr. Elliott no sooner got possession of the office than "an influence" was brought to bear on the powers that be by which his removal was effected, and the office was given to Mr. J. P. Gaskin. We are not advised as to the causes leading to the change.—Putnam Democrat, Jan. 8, 1890.

—INDIANAPOLIS—The appointment of Nicholas Ensley as pension agent at this point has stirred up trouble for the administration. President Harrison's old regiment, the seventieth, is sizzling hot. When the regiment met here to attend Harrison's inauguration in a body, there were 145 members from all parts of the country. Before starting to the union station the regiment held a meeting and passed a series of resolutions indorsing Colonel Merrill and asking President Harrison to appoint him to an office, as a compliment to the regiment and a reward for his services in Harrison's behalf. These resolutions were intrusted to Captain P. S. Carson, of Southport, and Lieutenant Hadley, of Logansport, who presented them to the President. No request was made for any particular office. The President is believed to have promised to look after Colonel Merrill at the proper time. He was suggested for the post office, but didn't get it; then for collector of internal revenue, and that appointment went elsewhere. The collectorship of customs also went fleeting.

"There was nothing left for us, then," said a prominent member of the regiment, "except the pension agency, and we felt assured that Colonel Merrill would get that. Harrison has gone back on us and we are disappointed. We are unable to understand the President's treatment of his old regiment. The boys had their hearts set on having Colonel Merrill rewarded. It looks to us very much like that portion of our regiment which has always been in office has absorbed all the pap there is for the regiment, and that it is not worth while for anybody to apply who hasn't the Slick Six's ears. We have nothing against Ensley, but here was a chance to stir up enthusiasm by a capital appointment, but it isn't made, and we don't understand it."—Indianapolis News.

—RUSSELLVILLE—The appointment of J. W. Harvey as postmaster at this place is not satisfactory at all to a majority of the republicans here. Uriah Brown, the present postmaster, was appointed under the democratic administration on the resignation of the former postmaster, on a republican petition signed by fifty of the most prominent republicans here, and since the present administration went in, another petition signed by more than one hundred republicans was forwarded. Also a personal letter from Ira J. Chase was sent to the postmaster general recommending him. All the republicans except a few hustlers, the most of them applicants for the office, were satisfied. Mr. Brown is a staunch republican: has lived here for thirty years; is one of the best citizens, and not able to work and make a living. There is not a single person here that can say a word of harm of him. Harvey is a physician, has plenty to live on, has only lived here three or four years, and wants the office for some one else. Simply because Mr. Brown was appointed by a democrat he must be removed by his own party and against his party's wishes.—Indianapolis Sentinel Special, June 12, 1889.

—CLAY CITY—Petitions are being prepared in which a vigorous protest will be made against what is claimed to be an outrage upon the people of this place and neighborhood. Brown is a republican without guile, and has given universal satisfaction. Mrs. Wilbur, it is asserted, is unable to read and write, and the office is an important one. She is the widow of Joseph Wilbur, who, while intoxicated and returning from a republican rally last fall, fell from the cars and was killed. He was one of the republican committeemen of this township at the time.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

—CUMBERLAND—The applicants were Edward Bonge, a postmaster under a former republican administration; Lewis Wasling wanted it because his father had been a soldier in Harrison's regiment; Samuel P. Davis wanted it because he was a soldier and a member of the Cumberland G. A. R. post. Bonge and Wasling both circulated petitions, which were sent to the department. Bonge finally secured the appointment and the old soldiers were knocked out.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

—NOBLESVILLE—The greatest dissatisfaction seems to exist up in Congressman Cheadle's district, where both the Congressman and the President are being severely criticised on account of a good many unsatisfactory appointments. Congressman Cheadle and a good many of his constituents were around the hotel yesterday afternoon and last night, and it was quite evident from their actions that there was not a unity of feeling.

State Senator Boyd, of Noblesville, is one of Cheadle's constituents who has become thoroughly disgusted with the congressman's appointments. Cheadle, it seems, recommended Jake Frybarger for postmaster at Noblesville, although Boyd and nearly all the patrons of the office wanted another man. Frybarger is not even a resident of the township in which Noblesville is situated, and does not get his mail at that office. At Westfield, where two old soldiers were candidates for the postoffice, Cheadle gave the place to the widow of a democrat, and at Windfall, where nearly a unanimous vote was cast for a man named Swoveland for postmaster, he gave the place to a man who wasn't thought of for the place.—Indianapolis News.

—Congressman Cheadle has withdrawn the name of Jacob Frybarger, whom he had selected as postmaster at Noblesville, and Nathan Royer, a resident of the place, has been recommended.—Indianapolis News.

—MITCHELL—Another of the predictions made in these dispatches regarding the appointment of an Indiana postmaster has been verified. Wood, the original purchaser, has been made postmaster at Mitchell. Soon after the meeting of the chairmen of republican county committees of Indiana, at Indianapolis, to confer with Harrison and the state bosses in September, 1888, when, it will be remembered, the county chairmen were authorized to auction off the post-offices in their counties in order to raise some needed ready money, Wood bid $250 for the Mitchell post-office, and it was knocked down to him. By some mistake—it is to be presumed it was a mistake—the county committee at the same time accepted a bid of $300 from a patriot named Hobbs for the same post-office at Mitchell that had been knocked down to Wood.

After the election a dispute arose between Wood and Hobbs over the office. Both had receipts showing that they had paid their good cash for the office.

The fight became hot and embarrassed the bosses greatly. To add to the embarrassment the local grand army post put forward a wounded veteran for the office, who was a very capable man. Because of the fight the democratic incumbent has been continued in the service up to this time. Harrison was appealed to personally, and told the Mitchell brethren that they would have to fix matters amicably among themselves before he took action. It was finally arranged that Wood was to pay to Hobbs the $300 he put up for the office during the campaign. The office, therefore, has cost Wood $550—he bid $250 himself originally, and had to give Hobbs, the other bidder, the money he put up, and which was fraudulently or mistakenly accepted by the county chairman.

Wood's name was sent to the senate a few days ago.—Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, Jan. 17, 1890.

—GREENCASTLE—Perhaps the most interesting postmastership contest now in progress in Indiana is to be found at Greencastle. The following list is supposed to contain the name of the next postmaster, together with the names of his defeated opponents: James McD. Hays, a merchant; Major Jonathan Burch, an attorney; Captain L. P. Chapin, a merchant; Private J. B. Sellers, of Putnamville; Mrs. Jeannette Preston; A. A. Smith, editor of the Times.—Indianapolis News.

—The office being of the presidential class, and President Harrison's experience with it in times past being somewhat educational, it would be strange if he were not disposed to profit by that experience. While a member of the Senate, he was required by a custom "more honored in the breach than the observance" to recommend the appointment of a postmaster for Greencastle by President Arthur. There was a long and bitter contest over the succession, which finally terminated in the reappointment of Postmaster Langsdale. The senator was besieged with letters, petitions, remonstrances, charges and countercharges, and visiting delegations with duly accredited spokesmen waited upon him at Washington and Indianapolis to lay their grievances before him. It is charged, and the President is doubtless led to believe, that the same influences are at work in the present contest.—Putnam Democrat.

The two candidates are A. A. Smith, editor of the Times, and James McD. Hays, a merchant. The latter represents the faction which stood by George J. Langsdale, now president of the state soldiers' monument association, when he was a citizen of Greencastle, being the postmaster and editor of the Greencastle Banner, and after he had aroused against himself the ire of about half the republicans of Putnam county because of his domineering methods, notwithstanding he was one of the brightest political writers and best political workers among the republicans in the state. Mr. Smith's paper was started in the interest of the anti-Langsdale faction.

—It has been several months since President Harrison appointed a postmaster for Greencastle, but many old soldiers of the town, and a good many other citizens, have not yet forgiven him for the way he went counter to the desire of the patrons of the office in making the appointment. Jonathan Birch, a maimed soldier, was indorsed for the position by three-fourths of the patrons of the office, and had the support of the old soldiers in Putnam county.

A leading Greencastle republican, who was in the city yesterday, tells this story of how Mr. Harrison treated Mr. Birch and his supporters: "Just before the time of the old postmaster had expired Alpheus Birch, the woolen goods manufacturer, went to Washington at the request of the old soldiers in the interest of his brother. After he had stated to the President the object of his visit, the President became irritated and demanded to know what was the matter with the people of Greencastle, that they were all the time quarreling about who should be postmaster. Mr. Birch said that if there was any quarrel his brother and his friends were not responsible for it. He saw the President would not give him a hearing, and he withdrew from the room. The friends of Major Birch were mad when they heard of the incident. In a few days the appointment of one of the civilian candidates was announced (Langsdale's man, Hays, was appointed). He will probably make a good postmaster, but his appointment was unpopular."—Indianapolis News.

—HAMMOND—Congressman Owen's postmaster does not give satisfaction to the editor of the Daily Tribune, the republican organ. It says:

The salary that is paid to the postmaster at Hammond is enough to secure the services of a qualified officer, who would be willing to give to its duties his personal supervision; but this is not done by the present incumbent, nor has he pretended to do so since receiving his appointment, subscribing to the oath of office, and drawing the salary; but he farms out the office to persons whose chief aim seems to be: To discriminate between the patrons of the post-office; to deliver mail to unauthorized persons; to disobey the special orders of the higher officials of the postoffice department; to intercept and delay mail matter which has been deposited for transmission to other destinations; to withhold mail matter from delivery to the persons addressed, sometimes as long as six and eight hours after its arrival; and to study to make the service as vexatious as they can for persons against whom they harbor petty malicious spite—in short, the postoffice at Hammond is in the hands of those who appear to strive to administer the duties in a manner so outrageous as to make the service wellnigh contemptible to the public. Meantime the public service which he undertakes and is sworn to discharge, and for which he is paid a liberal salary to perform, goes to the dogs, and "you be d—d." * * *

It is singular, even strange, indeed, that President Harrison is so partial in the disposition of public benefits. Perhaps, however, the cause may be "a little owen," to use a backwoods vernacular, to the misrepresentation returned to Washington from the tenth congressional district. Time enough has elapsed for this slipshod manner of treating the public service to be discontinued, and for salutary reforms to be introduced and enforced in accordance with the spirit and design of the law. Something different is required by a city of six thousand inhabitants and a numerous transient shifting population, from the rural, back-country, fourth-class post-office service.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

The appointment of William W. Johnson as postmaster at Baltimore terminates a bitter struggle for that place extending over months. Large delegations of Baltimoreans, numbering, in some instances, as high as fifty, have visited the White House by appointment and submitted arguments for and against Johnson.

* * The appointment, therefore, may serve as an indication of the material Mr. Harrison has a liking for. In the first place the President rejected a thorough-going business man and selected a very active politician. Mr. Johnson organized the republican league clubs in Maryland, and is president of the largest one in Baltimore. He was a member of the Maryland republican central committee for four years, and as its treasurer handled the campaign fund in 1884.—Springfield Republican.

—Victor L. Ricketts, editor of the Delphi Journal, was some days ago appointed clerk to the house committee on immigration and navigation, of which Mr. Owen is chairman. Mr. Ricketts, who is one of the leading republican workers in his district, has not yet arrived to enter upon his official duties, but is soon expected.—Dispatch to Indianapolis Journal.

—While the case against one Chairs, a democrat of Leon county, Florida, was being tried in the United States court at Jacksonville yesterday, C. C. Kirk, a deputy United States marshal, was put on the stand and reluctantly produced the following letter:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., July 5, 1889.

C. C. Kirk, Esq., Deland, Fla.:

SIR—You will at once confer with Mr. Bielby and make out a list of fifty or sixty names of true and tried republicans from your county registration list for jurors in the United States court and forward the same to Mr. P. Walters, clerk of the United States court, and it is necessary to have them at once, as you can see. Please acknowledge this.

I am, yours truly,

JOHN R. MIZELL, U. S. Marshal.

P. S.—Please get the names of parties as near the steamboat and railroad stations as possible.

The law provides that the names of jurors shall be selected without regard to political affiliations. Judge Swayne, however, would not admit the letter in evidence.

—The district attorney for the southern district of Iowa has made W. C. Howell, Mrs. Harrison's cousin, his assistant.

—A small fourth-class post-office in the town of Winters, Yolo county, California, was held by a poor widow, Mrs. L. W. McKinley. On the slender salary she supported herself, two children, and an aged father and mother.

Her appointment under President Cleveland was non-political. The office had been previously held by Mr. Moody, a distant relative of ex-President Hayes. Mr. Moody resigned on the change of administration in 1885, and his successor defaulted and was removed. On the petition of the people of the town, Mrs. McKinley was made postmistress and gave satisfaction to the department and the people, as appeared by the favorable report of the post-office inspectors and by a long petition for her retention. The third district, in which this post-office is situated, is represented by Hon. Joseph McKenna, who before his election had expressed his satisfaction with the efficiency of this lady as postmistress. After election came the payment of private political debts, and this poor widow had to be sacrificed to the political ambition of this brave representative.

The only breath of dissatisfaction that has reached her is the vague insinuation at the end of the following letter, addressed to her in reply to a request for reasons for her removal:

SUISUN, CAL., May 14, 1889.

DEAR MADAME—Received your letter. Engagements and absence have prevented answering sooner. With change of administration there is usually a change of officers appointed by the successful political party, and there is no blame necessarily implied by the removal. Of course there is more reluctance to remove a lady than a gentleman. You say I expressed this reluctance. Very likely; but there is some discontent of you into which I think I ought to inquire.

Respectfully, J. McKENNA,
TO MRS. MCKINLEY.

Notice the insinuation is that, after he has caused her removal, he is going to look into "some discontent of her." This is but one instance of thousands like it. Nor do we for this particular case lay any special blame on the President, apart from his allowing a method to continue which is sure to work such injustice to individuals as well as to corrupt politics.—Civil Service Record for January.

—Philadelphia, December 19.—A Washington dispatch to the Press gives the following statement of Representative Dalzell about the appointment of Mr. McKean to be postmaster at Pittsburgh:

I have long expected the appointment to be made. Mr. Wanamaker, at my first interview with him, openly announced himself on the side of Mr. Quay, as against me. The President, conceding the force of precedent, seemed to think that precedent could not stand against the demands of the chairman of the national committee.

I think the appointment an unfortunate one for many reasons, which I do not care to particularize; not because Mr. McKean is the man, but for other reasons. Mr. McKean has known all along that my feeling for him personally is of the kindest character, and that my fight against him involved, in my honest judgment, a principle for which I was morally bound to contend. Those who know me know that personally I care not at all for patronage, and that the dispensation of it is the most disagreeable part of my duties. The appointment does not change my opinion in the least. I stand now where I stood before it was made.

It is a wrong against the representative of my district. It is an indefensible violation of republican precedent. It is a wrong done at the dictation of a selfish grinding bossism, as to which the self-respect of the people of Pennsylvania will sooner or later (I think very soon) vindicate itself. Every wrong brings its own fruits. This one will prove no exception to the rule. I am glad that the suspense is over; I can now dismiss the subject from my mind and attend to what I consider the legitimate duties of a representative to try and legislate wisely for the country.

Senator Quay was shown Mr. Dalzell's statement. He read it over carefully, and then dictated the following reply:

In the first place the President is the absolute arbiter of all federal patronage. In the second place, in all presidential appointments the constitution gives the senate the right to advise and consent. Nowhere in the constitution or in written or unwritten law is there a single word requiring the President to consult representatives about presidential appointments; but in the nature of things the President can not be acquainted with the personal character or political standing of applicants, and he must, therefore, consult some one, it may be a congressman, or it may be a personal friend living in the district.

As to the Pittsburgh postoffice, no precedent has ever been established as to whether the senator or the representative should be recognized in relation to that office, for the reason that heretofore the people controlling the politics of Allegheny county and sending its representatives to congress have always been in accord with the senator from western Pennsylvania. The appointment of Mr. McKean does not violate, but establishes a precedent.

As to Mr. McKean, the circumstances attending my advocacy of his claim to appointment are briefly these: Gentlemen favorable to Mr. McKean waited on me in relation to his candidacy. I told them that I wished to know before committing myself whether the appointment of Mr. McKean would be satisfactory to Mr. Dalzell. Mr. Henry S Paul, president of the Americus Club of Pittsburgh, and Mr. McKean subsequently informed me that they had waited upon Mr. Dalzell, and that he had said that the appointment of Mr. McKean would be entirely satisfactory if he were sustained by the sentiment of the business people of Pittsburgh. If I am in error in this statement either of these gentlemen can correct me. Neither of them is unfriendly to Dalzell. I then said to Mr. Paul that I would do what I could to secure the appointment of Mr. McKean. There is no absolute difference between Mr. Dalzell and myself in relation to Allegheny county politics. What difference there is lies under and beyond him, as all men familiar with the politics of western Pennsylvania well understand.

Promptly after the announcement of Mr. McKean's candidacy Mr. Ford was produced as a candidate. He is president of the select council in Pittsburgh, and is in absolute accord with the gentlemen who returned Mr. Dalzell to congress, and who, as everybody knows in western Pennsylvania, are my opponents. I have no more objection to Mr. Ford than Mr. Dalzell seems to have to Mr. McKean. Mr. Ford is a former resident of Beaver county, where he has hitherto often assisted me in county conventions, but he was at least no better qualified for the postmastership than Mr. McKean, and he did not have the business backing which Mr. McKean produced, and I saw no reason, when Mr. Ford's candidacy was announced, to change my position.

The fact is that the city organization of Pittsburgh has until very recently been exceedingly hostile to me, and the Pittsburgh post-office embraces about 300 appointments, which, to put it mildly, I decline to have placed in the hands of my adversaries if I can prevent such a result. Therefore, I adhered very persistently to my original agreement to sustain Mr. McKean, and the President, though very anxious to gratify Mr. Dalzell, for whom he has a high esteem, could not, under all the circumstances, well avoid complying with my wishes.

The appointment is not antagonistic to Mr. Dalzell. If the gentlemen on whom he is now relying should combine to bowl him out of public life, he can make the Pittsburgh post-office his bulwark if he desires to do so. I regard Mr. Dalzell as a brilliant, accomplished, and scholarly gentleman, a thorough lawyer, and one of the most valued representatives we have at present in congress, and I exceedingly regret that any bitterness has arisen between us over this question.

I note what Mr. Dalzell says in his statement about bossism in Pennsylvania. The truth is that there is less bossism in Pennsylvania at the present day than there has been at any time in the last half century, and I think Mr. Dalzell brainy enough to know this. He is yet very young in politics, but it is my belief that before the brilliant future which now seems opening before him is concluded he will discover that it is not wise to allow political differences to interfere with personal relations.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS.

—Postmaster Sperry, of New Haven, declares himself a believer in civil service reform, and says the law shall be strictly enforced in his office.

—Representative Simond, of Connecticut, has secured the postmaster-general's indorsement for the reappointment of Postmaster Montgomery at Bristol. This postmaster is a democrat. Mr. Simonds proposes also to have the postmaster at Canton, Conn., kept in office, and he announces that he will not consent to the removal of any fourth-class postmaster in his district until he has served four years.

—Representative Greenhalge, of Massachusetts, will recommend the reappointment of Postmaster Bancroft, the democratic incumbent, at Concord. Mr. Bancroft was a brave soldier in the war, and has the indorsement of the grand army people as well as of Judge Hoar and other prominent republicans. Some of the workers are very angry, but Mr. Greenhalge is willing to brave their opposition for the sake of standing by a worthy veteran.

—Iowa furnishes a fresh illustration of the way in which the spoils system forces the best sort of men out of public life. Judge Reed, who had served with ability on the supreme bench of the state, was elected last year to the lower branch of congress. He already announces that "he will not run for congress again because of the discontent he made in distributing the offices, and his own discontent with the work of a congressman."—New York Evening Post.

WANTON REMOVALS.

For I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him (the President) to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. Such an abuse of power exceeds my conception.—Congressman James Madison, June, 1789.

—The statement originally made in these dispatches, several weeks ago, that First Assistant Postmaster-General Clarkson contemplated resigning, was verified to-day. Mr. Clarkson, in conversation with your correspondent, said that he had originally taken the office under the strongest importunities, and that he had accepted it then under the condition that he would not be asked to hold it more than a year. When he accepted the office he did so only for the purpose of ridding the party of democratic postmasters, so far as it lay in his power. He hopes to be through with this before very long, and then he will return to the more congenial field of journalism. He regards the time that he has spent in the office as the most instructive year of his life. He says he has learned more of the politics of every county and state in the union in the ten months that he has been in office than the rest of his life put together. There is not a county in the states but that has had its leading republicans here before him fighting out their local battles, and he knows now the exact standing and exact work of every republican politician in the country.—Dispatch to the Indianapolis Journal, Jan. 6.

—A number of fourth-class postmasters were agreed upon to-day for Washington county, and they are expected to be appointed to-morrow. Nearly, if not quite all the democrats holding the fort in that county will be dislodged by these appointments.—Dispatch to the Indianapolis Journal, Nov. 11.

—The Fostoria (Ohio) post-office matter is settled and off the hooks. Nobody at the postoffice department seems inclined to talk about it, and the air of mystery with which it is surrounded justifies the inference that there is something about the affair which will not bear scrutiny. Levi Wooster, the democratic hold-over postmaster, as may be remembered, refused to give Ex-Governor Foster unlimited authority to select four letter-carriers for him, although he had received orders from the department headquarters to do so, as the sole condition on which the town was to be given a free delivery. The controversy between the postmaster and his superiors in Washington waxed warm. He declared his willingness to appoint two republicans and two democrats, but he saw no reason why he should appoint all republicans and turn over their choice to an outsider at that. The department got the better of him by a process which has been steadily and most successfully employed since the present administration came in, whenever an obstinate office-holder was to be brought to terms. A detective of the department, politely known as a special agent, was sent to Fostoria with orders to find some flaw in Mr. Wooster's record. It is a familiar principle of postal management that there is no postmaster so honest and clever as to have entirely disarmed his enemies of a cause for censure. It may not be a great one, but there is invariably something—a letter gone astray through momentary carelessness, or a few technical errors in making up an official return, perhaps—that will form a groundwork for attack. The agent did his work well in Mr. Wooster's case, as nearly as can be ascertained, and, having contrived to bring some kind of a charge against him, practically gave him his choice between yielding his point and quitting the service. Mr. Wooster preferred staying in to going out, and the patronage plum was tossed into Mr. Foster's basket.

That Foster has made effective use of it for the purposes of the campaign just closed there is no room for doubt in the mind of any one who knows him. The case was effectively summarized by one of the department officers, who remarked to-day: "Yes, the Fostoria business is amicably settled. We put the special agent on the postmaster, and that fetched him."—Dispatch to the New York Evening Post, Nov. 6.

—Another post office outrage, on a par with that recently committed at Fostoria, Ohio, has just been perpetrated at Flushing, L. I., in the removal of postmaster Carpenter. The postmaster-general some months ago authorized the free delivery system at Flushing. This was preparatory to the late election, and postmaster Carpenter, being in a district represented by a democratic congressman, Covert, was ordered to report to Mr. Baldwin, chairman of the Queen's county republican committee, to have his four letter-carriers selected for him with reference to the needs of the party at the polls. This he refused to do, and was put on the black list at once and turned over to the tender mercies of an inspector. It seems to have taken the inspector all the fall to scrape together enough so-called charges to make a report on. But at last something was got which would pass muster. Yesterday off came Carpenter's head.

Your correspondent applied politely to first-assistant Clarkson, who has had charge of the case and knew all about it, to be informed what Carpenter's offense was. Clarkson, in his characteristically boorish way, snapped out a refusal, and threw responsibility for the whole matter on the postmaster-general, who was not in his office. As Clarkson was third in a line of officials, who declined to have anything to say on the subject, the public may draw their own conclusions as to the weight of the accusations which form the basis for the removal.—Dispatch to New York Evening Post, Nov. 22.

CURRENT ITEMS.

The civil service reform association of Philadelphia has presented a memorial to President Harrison protesting against Senator Paddock's bill to withdraw the railway mail service from the operations of the civil service act. This association has also printed for general distribution some 20,000 copies of a tract prepared by Mr. Henry C. Lea, giving the pledges of the republican party and the President upon civil service reform, and Senator Farwell's cowardly plan of killing the law by taking away its machinery.

The Massachusetts association urges the President to extend the operations of the law to offices having twenty five employees. Congress is urged to grant the $53,000 asked by the civil service commission necessary to carry on the work of the commission.

The association of Missouri has issued its eighth annual report. This association proposes to print a compilation of extracts from the Thanksgiving Day sermons for general circulation and by so doing to endeavor to increase its membership. The association also asks the President to put a check upon his headsman in his work of official decapitation in the post-office department.

The report of the civil service commission of the state of New York states that no complaint has been received that the examinations have not been fair tests, and that the testimony has been uniform that the persons selected from the eligible lists have been efficient.

Again, the statistics of the report of the civil service commission of the state of Massachusetts prove that the competitive system benefits those who have had the common school education rather than the college graduates. Out of 1,483 examined 1,016 passed the examinations. Of this number 989 had a common school education and 27 had attended college.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Civil Service Chronicle:

It seems to me something further can be said by way of answer to one of the questions of the disingenuous letter of Mr Wanamaker's private secretary about the civil service law.

He asks "Why are the laws and the commission subject to so much criticism?" Because the professional politician knows that his power largely depends on the spoils system, and consequently he and all his henchmen, his organs and those blind partisans who are his ready dupes, have combined to oppose, abuse and criticise that law, the extension of which would tend to overthrow machine politics. Was any serious criticism of the civil service law, or any opposition to a reform of the civil service ever heard, except from a professional or from a partisan, who is always—sometimes unconsciously—the tool of the professional?

For many years our political parties have had no reason for continued existence, except that furnished by the spoils of office. Since the disappearance of real difference on questions of governmental policy, the professional politicians, to whom belong the spoils, have only kept their respective parties alive by the aid of blind party spirit, and what the partisan says against the civil service law is but the echo of the fear of his master, the professional.

Who are the authors of some of the recent criticism of the civil service law and the commission? The Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, Frank Hatton's Washington Post and Clarkson's Iowa State Register are good examples of the newspapers, and A. P. Gorman, C. B. Farwell and J. B. Cheadle of the individuals. The men are all products of the spoils system and naturally attack its enemy. The newspapers are organs, and mainly live by partisan politics.

A thorough reform of the civil service would limit if not destroy the usefulness of the party organs. These organs approved the candidacy of Blaine; they applauded the Murchison letter; they have never denounced W. W. Dudley's election methods nor that appointee of President Harrison, who forgot his oath of office and said that to "divide floaters into block of five and put a trusted man with necessary funds in charge of this five, and make him responsible that none get away and that all vote our ticket," indicates "simply a patriotic interest in the elections." Surely criticism from such sources as these could not disturb any honest inquirer.

No man e'er felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law.

CINCINNATI, Jan. 3, 1890.

THE REPUBLICAN PRESS.

They are the opinions which will prevail, which will control the legislation and administration of the future, which will compel the extension of the reform principle to other branches of the public service, and make a much closer adherence to its letter and spirit than is now practiced the obvious and necessary course of every president and other official who has the power of appointment.—Worcester Spy [Rep.]

—When the higher offices of the public service—the postmasterships and collectorships in our large cities—shall also cease to be the rewards of party activity, the public will have confidence in the impartial administration of the civil service law, and not till then.—Philadelphia Record.

—The civil service law will not be repealed at the coming session of congress, as the mugwumps profess to fear. That is what they would like, but the republicans are too wise to gratify such a desire.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat [Rep.]

—The wrath of the office-seekers, who repudiate the republican platform, and "want no Chinese civil service," is one of the most encouraging testimonials to the sincerity of this administration that can be obtained.—Pittsburg Dispatch [Rep.]

—Civil service reform has come to stay and to grow, and the corruptionists, boodlers and manipulators of practical politics who oppose it may as well bear the fact in mind and remember that they are not masters, and that they can be servants only by obeying those who are masters.—New York Press.

—A remark of the Buffalo Commercial [Rep.], [one of whose editors has received an office], about "amusing phases of the civil service humbug," leads the Syracuse Standard [Rep.] to say that "the Commercial and other republican papers of its way of talking did not discourse in that manner during the latest or the preceding presidential campaign. Let us be honest and consistent, brethren of the republican press."

—The petty clerkships covered by the civil service law are not connected with the party organization, for the federal service can not be looked upon in the light of a party machine, and, in any event, the incumbents of these places can exercise little more influence upon the administration or on politics than do Kansas grasshoppers upon the government of Nova Scotia. So long as their work is well done, under the direction of responsible superiors, it matters not, either to the administration or the party, whether they are republicans, democrats, or prohibitionists.—Cincinnati Times-Star [Rep.]

—SPOILSMEN SHOULD "GET TOGETHER."—There seems to be an incongruity between the statements of various classes of spoilsmen concerning the civil service law, which breaks the force of all of them.—Washington Star [Rep.]

—The principle that merit, and not the mere complexion of a clerk's politics, shall determine the character of his tenure of public office, tends to give to the government better service for the money which it pays in salaries, tends to relieve the lot of the government employe of some of its features of harrassing and demoralizing uncertainty, and tends to convert a numerous and intelligent element of the capital's population from transitory guests into property-owning, reasonably permanent citizens.—Washington Star [Rep.]

—No one could describe the utter weakness of the spoils system more accurately than the secretary has in these few terse sentences. No word need be added to them to prove the imperative necessity of the reform law and the great value of the work which the commission is doing. As we have already intimated, Secretary Windom's opinions deserve attention because they are in the nature of expert testimony, and his hearty approval of the law, together with the powerful reasons he gives for approving it, far outweigh the clamor of the disappointed office-seekers and the twaddle of the spoilsmen who attack the law and the commission.—Cleveland Leader [Rep.]

—Honesty in politics.

Civil service reform.—Part of the Cedar Rapids [Iowa] Gazette Platform [Rep.]

—It is not presumed that professional political workers will be in favor of a law which opens the public service to all the people on a fair competition of qualification for specific duties. They prefer that the old regime when favoritism reigned should return. The reform law sets up a simple test of merit instead of favor, and allows an equal chance to all whether they have influential political friends or not. It is proper in this connection to remind the federation of republican clubs in Maryland that the highest republican authority—the national convention of the party—has repeatedly declared in favor of the reform law; and that President Harrison, in letters and addresses, is fully committed to the principles of this reform.—Rockport [Ill.] Register [Rep.]

—The Toledo (O.) Blade [Rep.] thinks the number of congressmen opposed to the civil service law very small. "The spoilsmen must go," it says.

—No one who has watched the party press during the past six months can doubt that the sentiment in favor of this reform is constantly growing. A few republican papers, following a few republican congressmen, have denounced the law and called for its repeal. But instead of exerting any influence against it they have simply succeeded in calling out the real opinion of the party on the subject.—Philadelphia Press.

—Valuable testimony as to the good effect of the civil service law, even in Maryland, is furnished by the Hagerstown Herald, a republican weekly. The Herald takes up and condemns the recent action of the republican clubs of the third congressional district of Maryland in calling for a repeal of the civil service law, declaring that "if the republican party should go before the country on the platform which these Baltimore politicians have laid down, it would be beaten out of sight." In arguing for the superiority of the merit system to the spoils policy, the Herald makes the following statement as to the operation of the former in Maryland under Mr. Cleveland, which is of value as the testimony of a political opponent: "Without the civil service law the democratic heelers in Baltimore would have held high carnival in the federal offices. With it we have had an honest management of the public business, and only in a few instances has the public sense of decency been shocked by the appointment of notorious rascals to responsible positions. If there had been no civil service law, so fair and moderate a man as ex-Gov. Groome would not have been made collector of the port, and certainly a very different class of men would have forced their way into all the subordinate places."—From the New York Evening Post.

"The common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it. It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration."—Washington's Farewell Address.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE begins its second year with the next issue. It will be of material assistance if its subscribers will promptly renew, as it can not afford to hire a collector. It aims to gather into compact shape the current facts in regard to the civil service, especially for those who desire to keep well informed, but who are otherwise too much engaged to get for themselves these widely distributed facts. The paper aims also to aid as far as it is possible in the effort to add to the list of believers in the merit system. Much has been accomplished the past year by sending the paper to lists of college and other libraries, to teachers, ministers and others throughout the state. To any who desire to subscribe for this purpose, we may say that the field is large and that a careful selection will be made.

President Harrison is reported to have said:

"If I take the advice of Massachusetts senators and representatives in making appointments in that state you have no right to blame me. If they do not represent public opinion among you, you should send men here who do."

Senators and representatives are not elected to advise the President as to appointments; they are elected as law makers. With the exception of a small number of his personal supporters, the people in voting for a congressman do not think of, or have reference to his capability as an office-broker; when they think of him as such their feeling is disagreeable and not to his credit. The need of the times is a President who will break up this congressional usurpation. President Harrison's predecessor talked in this way to Maryland democrats and then gave Gorman the full swing of the federal patronage which he used to keep those same democrats under.

THE signatures to the petition started in Massachusetts asking for a fit appropriation for the work of the civil service commission is a remarkable one. In order to show the significance of the names their political position has been indicated. It has often seemed that civil service reformers in Boston and elsewhere underestimated the strength of the reform sentiment in Indiana among the people at large; that they were unable to realize that the political leaders did not in fact represent the desire among the rank and file of both parties to be done with the spoils system. But when it comes to the matter of active politicians favoring the reform, this list shows that we are far behind Massachusetts.

THE Massachusetts legislature has passed the following resolution with one dissenting vote:

Our senators and representatives are hereby requested to favor such legislation as will extend the provisions of the United States civil service law to all persons employed in the navy yards of the United States.

ATTENTION is called to the office brokerage in Missouri, set forth in another column. These facts have been brought to light by the St. Louis Republic, and are believed to be authentic. It is much to be desired that the Civil Service Reform Association of that state should take the matter up and print the facts over their own name. They would then convince a class of people who feel justified in refusing to be convinced now because those facts have been unearthed by a party paper. The congressmen implicated have been peculiarly brazen and venal; but to sell an office for a small sum of ready cash does not differ in principle from sales by Quay and others for influence and for hire as a servile laborer.

IN an examination for firemen in the Brooklyn, New York, fire department was the following question:

"If you had a strong fire, and your steam was inclined to raise, what would you do?" The New York Sun (spoils) ridicules and condemns this question as not being up to a proper literary standard. The question was probably framed by a practical engineer who made use of the common colloquialism of his craft. How about the people like the Sun, who are always complaining that the questions are literary to an extent that none but the college-bred can answer them?

It is seriously "charged" against the civil service commission that there are now on the eligible list names of enough persons to supply clerks to the departments for several years. Civil service reformers have never been that hard pushed that they were compelled to urge as an objection to the spoils system that each congressman, by encouraging applications and making promises in regard to offices, had made a longer eligible list than he could use up if he were a congressman a hundred years. The competitive system need not fear a comparison. Under the spoils system place-hunters by hundreds go hundreds of miles to Washington. They stay there for weeks and months literally stopping the operations of the government. They are pests in Washington and are objects of derision at home. They go through a descending scale of living, beginning with the most extravagant hotel and ending with the place that sells "board by the day, week or meal." At best they become penniless beggars for a place; and yet they persist and some few succeed. This is the competition of the spoils system, and the eligible list never starts new. On the other hand, the applicant under the merit system, who has successfully competed at an examination near his own home, sees his name on the eligible list and goes about his daily business. He is proud of the fact, he talks about it, and if he applies for private employment, his successful competition is his strongest point, and is the one he urges the most. It helps him materially and it is an advantage in seeking other work, and not a disadvantage to him to be on that list; and the same is true of every other person on it, even though there may be enough to supply the departments for years. Importunity for place is useless, and they do not importune. If the year passes without appointment that is the end of the list and of their present chance. Justice to the new crop that wants public employment demands a new competition. No one can say that this is not an educational process of great value to the country, and which will render a great number of persons better fitted for public and private employment. And not the least of its advantages is its upbuilding of manhood in place of the cringing and humiliation which accompany ordinary office seeking.

After Mr. Pearson and Colonel Burt, it is perhaps not worth while to express surprise at the removal of Collector Saltonstall, which took place after the following correspondence :

I.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, }
WASHINGTON, January 17, 1890. }

The Hon. L. Saltonstall, Collector of Customs, Boston, Mass.:

MY DEAR SIR: The President is ready to make a change in the collectorship at Boston, but would be glad to do so in a way that would be most agreeable to you.

Very truly yours,

W. WINDOM Secretary.

II.

CUSTOM HOUSE, OFFICE OF THE COLLECTOR, }
BOSTON, January 20, 1890. }

The Hon. William Windom, Secretary of Treasury:

MY DEAR SIR: I have this day received your letter of the 17th inst. informing me that "the President is ready to make a change in the collectorship at Boston, and would be glad to do so in a way that would be most agreeable to you." In reply, I beg to say that, placing entire confidence in the declaration of the President concerning tenure of office, I am prepared to serve the term of four years for which I was commissioned on the 5th of May, 1886, unless removed by the authority of the President for such cause as he has announced to be controlling in such cases. If such cause exists, I respectfully request to be informed of the same.

In the conduct of this office I have endeavored to perform its important duties with fidelity to the government, in a manner satisfactory to the merchants of Boston, and to conform to the spirit as well as the letter of the civil service laws. I therefore can not stultify myself by any act which would imply the consciousness of dereliction on my part, and prefer to leave the decision of this matter in the hands of the President, to whom I forward a copy of this letter. I beg to assure you that I communicate this my conclusion with entire respect for the President and for yourself, and hoping that it may not be misunderstood, I am, very truly yours,

LVERETT SALTONSTALL, Collector.

III.

CUSTOM HOUSE, OFFICE OF THE COLLECTOR, }
BOSTON, Jan. 20, 1890. }

To the Hon. Benjamin Harrison, President:

MY DEAR SIR—I herewith inclose a copy of my letter of this date to Secretary Windom, in answer to his letter informing me that you were ready to make a change in the collectorship at this port. I take this course, deeming it proper that you should be informed without delay of my views as to the tenure of the office which I have the honor to hold, and am, with great respect, very truly yours,

LVERETT SALTONSTALL, Collector.

No criticism is made upon Mr. Saltonstall, as an officer. He has carried out to the fullest extent the civil service reform principles of the republican platform. The Indianapolis Journal says that Mr. Saltonstall has been sick for six months and therefore was removed. The Boston Journal says that the collector is called upon at dinners to respond for the President and asks us to "imagine a gentleman who had defied the President occupying such a position;" by "defied" it is meant that Mr. Saltonstall is a democrat. Senator Hoar says that the office is akin to a cabinet position and that the collector ought to be a protectionist; also that a free trader "can not interpret our protective tariff." In the variety of reasons the real one becomes apparent. The place was wanted as party spoil and it was so taken, and the President has added another to his broken promises. The removal was brought about by Senators Hoar and Dawes, whose greedy pursuit of this place marks distinctly the decline of Massachusetts republican statesmen. Senator Hoar will hardly expect his excuse to be treated soberly. The law and the rules of the department regulate the duties of a collector. With these as his guide one honest and capable officer produces the same results as another. There is no way to honestly "interpret our protective tariff" except according to law. Any other way is a system of tips and winks; and this shows that Senator Hoar can not mean what he says. It is a satisfaction to know that the course of the administration is reprobated by such republican papers as the Boston Advertiser, the Boston Traveller and the Boston Transcript.

PRESIDENT HARRISON'S FIRST YEAR.

In a few days President Harrison will complete the first year of his term. With this number the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE also ends its first year. It has been well known that those in control of the paper actively favored the election of General Harrison; but in commencing this publication, they laid down the principle that the standard of criticism which, in other fields, they had before applied to the management of the civil service should not be changed; President Harrison should be judged by the same rules by which they had judged his predecessor. And now at the end of the year they feel that they have kept to the mark. It would have been easy to say that the President has a hard row to hoe, that those at a distance can not realize the pressure upon him, that he can only reform the civil service as fast as public sentiment will support him, that he means well, but he is deceived by those around him, that he can accomplish nothing without his party, and if he goes faster than he can carry his party, he will sit down between two stools, and so on; but it has seemed better to say that he is the President, and he is to be held to his constitutional responsibility without evasion or excuse. And this course has met with an approbation both personal and in the public prints from all parts of the country that will always be an unalloyed gratification.

President Harrison closes his first year, leaving behind him some acts of which history will never be proud. He has a settled policy of keeping appointees after their unworthiness has become notorious. In this way he bids fair to make cases like those of McFarlane, Bagby and Chambers, in Indiana, rival those of Tompkins and Dowling under the late administration. His putting the federal patronage in Virginia into the hands of Mahone was an assault upon the rights of half of the people of that state, and its disastrous results do not seem to have taught him any lesson. His failure to dismiss the office-holders who attempted to collect money for Mahone does not indicate a determination to execute that part of the law. His removal of Pearson, Burt, Graves and Saltonstall indicate a spirit of putting his heel upon the neck of the reform sentiment of the country. His allowing the railway mail service to be looted while the eligible lists were being prepared, and the manner in which it was done were peculiarly in broken faith. His sweep of the fourth-class postmasters by Clarkson, his turning the census bureau over to be common spoil, his advance in the same direction with the Indian service, his subsidizing the press, his grudging retention of some democrats to the end of their terms, his greedy removal of others, like General Manson, his turning whole states over to men like Platt and Quay, his appointment of relatives to office, and his general use of the 100,000 places in the unclassified service to pay personal and party debts, unmistakably mark him as a man who believes in such use of a great public trust. That he has a constitutional right to so use it, he would not himself claim. Like other presidents, he has frittered away the golden opportunity of breaking up the spoils system. Yet he has not built himself up in other directions. He has refused to work in his one peculiar field, and no others are or will be open to him, except in a limited and routine extent. If he goes to the end as he has started, he will have been a common-place president whose term has had its full share of vicious administration.

There is one branch of this subject that must be treated by itself. President Harrison said that he would enforce the civil service law and, leaving out the Mahone assessments, he has done so. To begin at home, if a democrat in Indiana, examined by the Indianapolis local board, does not get upon the eligible list, it is his own fault. It may be stated with absolute certainty that any person coming before this board for examination will be treated exactly according to his merits, and will get the place on the list that he earns in open competition. And it may be added that if he secures a place upon the eligible list of the Indianapolis post-office, he will be appointed when his name comes to the top of the list. That office employs a large proportion of democrats, yet no one is dismissed without cause. We are glad to say this because we have been a severe critic of this post-office and we desire to give full credit to the present course of its management.

And elsewhere, and so far as we can learn, everywhere the law is honestly enforced. When the post-offices in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, Milwaukee and elsewhere are remembered, the revolution which has taken place becomes apparent. Possibly with a less courageous and less able man than Mr. Roosevelt in his place on the civil service commission, the result might have been different; but the President is to be given the credit due for a wise selection of a civil service commission and for then sustaining it. The result is that the merit system is vindicating itself on every hand. Never before did it overthrow so many enemies and so easily, and the general summing up must be that never has it made such rapid progress as during the past year. To such an extent does it now meet public approval that no party can safely go into a presidential campaign ignoring this subject, however much that party may be agitating some other question.

ROYAL DISFAVOR.

The President has again disregarded the wishes of Senator Farwell, and has appointed Mr. Clark collector of the port of Chicago. Goaded by his repeated defeats and by the unfriendly, not to say jeering, criticisms of the press, Senator Farwell has written the following letter:

To the Editor of the Chicago Tribune:

In your issue of the 24th, in the editorial columns, you have an article headed "What the Constitution Says," and indulge in some criticism upon the demands of the senators in regard to appointments, quoting the article of the constitution which refers to that subject. I fully agree with you in your definition of that clause, but the President is empowered and compelled by this to appoint postmasters having salaries of $1,000 and upward and thousands of other officers—in fact, all officers of the United States but those below that grade—and if he acts intelligently in making these appointments he must consult with persons whom he knows and who know the persons to be appointed. As far as I am concerned I claim that the people have the right to select the officers they want, and inasmuch as they can not all come to Washington to make known their wishes it is but natural that their representatives should speak for them in this matter as well as in all other matters. Indeed, the circumstances of the case render it imperative that the President shall consult—if he do his duty—with these representatives; and the only complaint I make against the present occupant of the White House in regard to appointments in Illinois is that he prefers to consult persons other than the people's chosen representatives. The congressmen and senators of one neighboring western state, whose delegation in the late nominating convention in Chicago swung first into line for him, have no trouble whatsoever in convincing the President that their nominees are proper persons to fill the offices in that state. On the contrary, the representatives of Illinois who did not support the present incumbent of the White House in the nominating convention, have found it impossible to convince the President that they are qualified to select anybody for official position in the state. I know of no other reason than this why we, as well as other United States senators, are not consulted in regard to important appointments.

The appointment of the collector of internal revenue at Springfield was made with the knowledge that it was against the wishes of the two senators. The President's refusal to appoint Mr. Campbell was an expression of that want of confidence in me above referred to, and impelled him to consult with private citizens. By this action the President has notified us that he does not wish to further consult with us in regard to Illinois appointments, and that he will rely upon other sources of information than the representatives of the people.

C. B. FARWELL.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27.

To make his record complete it is necessary to add some remarks of Senator Farwell in various newspaper interviews which are apparently authentic:

"I believe," he says, "that this is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. In the Chicago collectorship case the people wanted Mr. Campbell, the white-headed boy of the republican party of Illinois. I have nothing to say against Mr. Clark. I could no doubt, have defeated the confirmation, but it would have availed nothing; it would have resulted in punishing a worthy citizen; that is all. The President's nomination of Mr. Clark was a very astonishing and unusual proceeding, and in making it he wholly ignored the wishes of the Illinois delegation, and acted in a very strange manner toward them. He did not even consult any one of them.

Mr. Campbell was chairman of our campaign committee, and devoted months of his time and his whole energies for the election of Mr. Harrison. Mr. Clark did not do this. But, then, this is Mr. Harrison's way of rewarding political friends. I regret that he entertains such notions, for it results in a destruction of the party to which he and I belong. It seems to me that it is the duty of those holding important official positions to try and carry out the will of the people, but in this matter Mr. Harrison has wholly ignored them, and, so far as I remember, this is the first instance in which the wishes of an entire delegation in congress from any state have been so completely disregarded."

We have given space to this because when senators have ceased to exist as office-brokers the record will be curious and valuable. It marks the last stage of congressional usurpation of the appointing power. Only recently have congressmen become so calloused as to go into the public prints and claim office distribution as a right. It is fitting that the claim should be made by a man who could not stay in public life an hour on his merits as a statesman. In refusing him offices, the President knocks every prop from under him. The "people" whom Senator Farwell represents are the Illinois party machine. His party comprises about half of the people of the state, and the machine does not include one-fiftieth of this half. Congressmen are not chosen to distribute offices, but to make laws. So far as they interfere with the distribution of offices they are a common nuisance. They are the worst advisers a president can have, for with rare exceptions they distribute places according to the power and will of the recipients to help their renomination and reelection.

The President, however, can not be given any credit. It is no virtue in him to pull down Farwell and Cullom, giving them no spoil, while he builds up Quay and makes him virtually dictator of the distribution of federal offices in Pennsylvania. A peculiar emphasis is given to this impropriety by the fact that he puts the latter state under the heel of Quay, in face of the steady and indignant protests, not of independents, like Henry C. Lea, but of men whose republicanism is unimpeachable, like Wharton Barker, who represent a large body of people in that state.

"WORDS, MERE IDLE WORDS."

The Indianian-Republican is published at Warsaw in this state, and General Reuben Williams has long been its editor. In a recent issue of his paper General Williams says he advocated General Harrison as a suitable candidate for governor in 1868, but the republican press did not respond. In 1872 and 1876 he again urged the same point. In 1885, in a column and a half article, he presented General Harrison's name for the presidency, and kept it up until after the latter's nomination and election. The rest of the story can only be told in the Indianian-Republican's own words:

After the election was over and victory achieved, those who knew how warmly we had advocated the President's claims, insisted that we should become an applicant for some position under an administration for which our paper had fought for so valiantly; and yet, fully aware of the intrigues and disappointments so frequently occurring in politics, we hesitated, until, in reply to a dispatch of congratulations we sent the President the next morning after the election, we received the following reply:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., NOV. 28, 1888.

Gen. Reub. Williams, Warsaw, Ind.:

MY DEAR GENERAL—I know that you will understand that my long delay in acknowledging your kind telegram of congratulations is not to be attributed to any lack of appreciation of your cordial and constant friendship. I know how unselfishly you have supported me, and value very highly the many evidences you have given me of your confidence. I shall be glad to see you at any time. Very truly yours,

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

The letter deceived us, and we at once made application for the state pension agency, stating in the original application that we had neither time nor money to fritter away in making an unsuccessful race, and that a hint that such would be the case would prevent us from making one at all. Every individual to whom we showed the above letter, construing it, under the circumstances of the long support of this paper of Mr. Harrison, as an invitation to become a candidate for something, and it was this interpretation by our friends that finally induced us to ask Mr. Harrison for the place, we selecting that special position for the reason that it permitted us to remain within the borders of the state. We believed, too, that thirty-four years of as faithful service as any man ever gave his party, entitled us to some consideration at his hands, to say nothing of the twenty years of personal loyalty to the individual just elected to the highest position within the gift of the people, and we are free to say that under these circumstances we felt our defeat most keenly. The press of the state was practically unanimous in our favor, and certainly no one who ever obtained a position under the government was ever more enthusiastically or emphatically indorsed by leading republicans from every section of Indiana in private letters, while petitions in large numbers were also forwarded. It was a blunder of our own. During the thirty-four years of political service we have given our party, we have seen so much of intrigue, of insincerity, of double-meaning phrases, that we ought to have considered the above letter at its proper value. With our experience we should have interpreted its contents at what it really was—words, mere idle words. It was our blunder, and we exonerate Mr. Harrison wholly. We should have known better than to have expected anything!

So far as is possible sympathy ought to be extended to General Williams. Coming down to the level on which he and the President stand, he makes a very fair showing of "claims;" thirty-four years of party service, and at least twenty-two years of personal service in repeated nominations of General Harrison for public office and in urging his interest in column-and-a-half editorials clearly entitle General Williams to "recognition." By that is not meant a nod or a hand-shake, but a payment for the thirty-four years of party service and the twenty-two years of personal service in nominations and in column-and-a-half editorials, by handing over a good solid office like the pension office of this city, worth thousands of dollars a year in cash.

After all his experience, however, General Williams and Solomon have come to the same conclusion. All things are "words, mere idle words." We now invite him to a higher level and ask him to recognize the fact that the President has no right to give out public offices to pay Huston, Ransdell, Leonard, Hornaday, Bagby, McFarlane, Chambers, Dunlap, Ensley, nor even General Williams himself. All offices except the highest should be given upon a system of merit and promotion solely for business reasons and without any regard to personal and party service. This is the practice that is going to prevail in the state and national service, and General Williams can render his state and country a substantial benefit by helping to establish it.

SECRET CHARGES.

As soon as removals began to be freely made during President Cleveland's administration apparently without cause, civil service reformers began to complain and to question. They were met with various charges on file against these office-holders, and there seemed to be fair ground why they were not entitled to any special consideration at the hands of the administration or of reformers. It took a considerable time to realize how easily a post office inspector, though he be a republican under a democratic administration or a democrat under a republican administration, learns to feel that his own tenure will be longer by not kicking against the pricks, and that his duty to his superior officers is to aid rather than to oppose their desire for removals "for cause." This evil has thriven. Mr. Vilas's men knew what was wanted, and Mr. Wanamaker's men likewise. General Harrison was very outspoken regarding the impropriety of secret charges during the preceding administration. In a letter to the democratic postmaster at Mt. Vernon, dated December 19, 1885, he said:

The course pursued by the postmaster-general in removing republicans upon secret charges, embarrasses us, and may possibly embarrass some of his nominees, for I shall not feel free to consent to the removal of any efficient public officer upon charges, until he has been advised of their character and has had an opportunity—which I shall certainly extend to you—to meet and refute them.

But President Harrison has put no stop to secret charges. Faithful public servants are still harrassed by false accusations made by those who feel that though they may not succeed, they will not be known.

Mr. English, the democratic postmaster at New Haven, was removed by President Harrison at the end of four years of service, though he had been efficient and had enforced the civil service law in the teeth of the local democratic machine hungering for spoil. Out of the twenty-three clerks whom he found in the office, nearly one-half remained at the end of the four years. Of the twenty-three letter-carriers, ten were left. Of the whole forty-six, fifteen were removed, and, according to the postmaster's statement, every one of these for causes quite disconnected with politics. Twice during the four years the New Haven Civil Service Reform Association investigated the office, and each time it commended in the highest terms the postmaster's record. He refused to allow, during the last presidential campaign, certain democratic managers to "go through" his office, and he told them, moreover, that they had no business to ask for such contributions at all.

For months after the incoming administration reports were rife of "charges" against Mr. English. Last summer he was informed by the post-office department that he was charged with allowing party contributions to be collected in his office. He went at once to Washington and asked Mr. Wanamaker to see the charges. The postmaster-general drew a bulky bundle from a pigeon-hole and informed Mr. English briefly of the charges, but he refused to show the papers or to give the names of the accusers. It does not seem too harsh to infer that Mr. Wanamaker believed the charges to have been trumped up by local republican politicians, and that he sanctioned their course as one of the peculiar necessities of politics to an extent that he deliberately shielded them from exposure and from the odium of their fellow-townsmen.

The Indianapolis Journal, for January 27, has a careful statement of the nature of the examinations for department clerkships, letter-carriers and clerks in the railway mail-service, and gives samples of the questions asked.

The February Civil Service Record (Boston) contains illustrations of tests for penmanship required of applicants for the highest class of clerkships, and gives various examples with the marks and the reasons for the different gradings.

Richardson, a member of the Maryland legislature, has offered a resolution in the house of delegates instructing the Maryland representatives in congress to vote for the repeal of "that obnoxious, unconstitutional, undemocratic and unrepugnant measure, known as the so-called civil service law, which strikes at the fundamental principles of free government, which disfranchises three-fourths of the American people from the right of holding public office."

—The Kokomo Dispatch, of January 16, says that Daniel Webster Martin, recently appointed postmaster at Oakford [Fairfield Station, Ind.] was formerly postmaster there, but was superseded in April, 1887, by J. W. Croussore. That when the official envelope containing Croussore's appointment came, Martin laid it away, and for the next five months, until August 27, told Croussore repeatedly that there was nothing for him. That a second official package, registered, was treated in the same way, until January 6, 1888, when Martin returned both letters to Washington indorsed, "No such person getting mail at this office." That some weeks later Martin was trapped by an inspector and a decoy letter directed to Croussore and denied to him in the presence of the inspector. If these statements are true, it would be interesting to know what particular "influence" secured the reappointment.

The effect of the first session to-day of the house committee on reform in the civil service was to make the most favorable impression for the commission. Mr. Roosevelt made a speech which was a strong argument in favor of the most searching investigation, and Commissioner Thompson spoke equally forcibly. When Frank Hatton was called on he was evidently very nervous, his voice being beyond his control. His disavowal of any personal animus in his pursuit of the commission, his suggestion that the commission be reorganized under a single head, and that head be Mr. Roosevelt and his fears lest the witnesses he will produce may suffer some damage from telling the truth, caused a general smile.—Special Dispatch to New York Evening Post, January 20.

It is not surprising to see Hatton and his paper beginning to sing small. Politicians are trained to a warfare, always under cover. They make charges secretly, and they answer them secretly. Met in their underground fights they are adepts in all manner of knifing and are dangerous foes. But when they occasionally meet a man like Mr. Roosevelt who has nothing to fear and who insists that the fight shall be open and public, they dwindle into the most contemptible of opponents.

CATHOLICS AND CITIZENSHIP.

[From an address delivered before the Catholic Club of Baltimore, Wednesday, February 5, 1890, by Charles J. Bonaparte.]

In an address of welcome to the prelates of the Third Plenary Council some five years ago I said, speaking of the presidential contest of 1884, then just concluded: "The Catholic Church has no politics: she knows nothing of candidates or platforms, of administrations or policies, of tariffs or currencies; she is mute on every question as to which honest men may honestly differ, and no more tells her children what ticket they shall vote than what food they shall eat or what clothes they shall wear. But as she demands that they shall eat with temperance, that they shall dress with decency, so she requires of them to vote with an unclouded judgment, with an undrugged conscience, with the good of the country as their motive, with the fear of God before their eyes."

I avail myself of your very flattering invitation for this evening to recur to this subject and point out why and how the church, as one and the first of those forces which in modern society "make for righteousness," can and of right should affect the nation's political life. Macaulay claimed that to say of Charles I "He was a good man, but a bad king," involved a contradiction in terms. No one who violated in the discharge of public duties the principles of morality and honor could, he urged, be reasonably and justly thought of as "a good man." If this be true of an English king, it is no less true of an American citizen. His conduct as a citizen can not be ignored in any fair estimate of his character.

When, however, men were told that for every idle word or wantonness of wrath they should one day strictly answer, no exception was made for words spoken at a primary. The decalogue contains no clause suspending its operation while ballots are counted or votes returned or appointments sought. A Christian can not draw a sponge over his record as a member of civil society; that record will avail to fix his destiny, and if it does, it concerns the church. Even if she would, she can not limit her mission, can not escape dealing with evils by closing her eyes to their existence. Doubtless it is a delicate task to deal with those evils. Her serpent wisdom must endow with prudence and tact those who speak in her name. Zeal not according to knowledge, however well meant, may here be readily harmful, but all this amounts to saying that the work must be done wisely, not that it should be left undone. For be well assured that if this field is given up to the enemy, his tares will spread to those adjacent. You can not abandon a heart to sordid passions in the forum and hope that it will be pure and honorable and generous at the fireside. Burke has well said, "There never yet was long a corrupt government of a virtuous people." The church, then, must help good men to purify and elevate politics. But how shall the help be given? Not, I need hardly say, by participation in political struggles. Her kingdom is not of this world, she covets not the things of Caesar, and her ministers, while entitled to the unobtrusive exercise of their rights as citizens, and, indeed, in my opinion, bound in conscience to thus exercise these rights, can not be too rigidly or sternly forbidden to display any partisan activity. She can promote honest government, pure politics, sound and lofty public spirit, by teaching through the words and acts of her representatives that she believes in and prizes these things and does not hold them mere phantoms: by making those who fight for them feel that in spirit and sympathy she is on their side, and those who fight against them know that she counts as her enemies enemies to their country's welfare. When we read that mediæval barons bestowed on churches and monasteries wealth acquired as the spoil of a life devoted to rapine and bloodshed, we can be charitable to the imperfect manners of a barbarous age; but there is room for no such indulgence if the material interests of any enterprise, however laudable in itself, are advanced through agencies which imply a condonation for intrigue and corruption and suggest indifference to wrong-doing. The courage of consistency is the first virtue of a moralist. He will never lead others who is afraid to show by his life that he believes what he teaches.

"Those love truth best who to themselves are true,
And what they dare to dream of dare to do."

MR. ROOSEVELT ON POLITICAL ASSESSMENTS.

In a recent report on political assessments in New York, Commissioner Roosevelt says:

"Experience in a number of investigations of this sort has convinced me that the talk often heard about the injustice of not allowing clerks to make 'voluntary contributions,' which the law in nowise prevents, is all nonsense. Government employes do not, as a rule, contribute simply from a desire to help the political cause in which they believe. The so-called 'voluntary contributions' are, nine times out of ten, made from some personal motives, that is, either in the hope of being retained in office, or else with the object of gaining some advantage over the other clerks. In other words, the employes are coerced into making them, for fear that their positions will be jeopardized if they fail to do so. It is probably safe to say that 90 per cent. of the money collected for political purposes from minor governmental employes represents so much blackmail. This particular species of robbery is mean enough at best, and one of its meanest features is the fact that the men most apt to contribute money, the men most susceptible to pressure, are those of opposite political faith to the dominant party. Those who agree in politics with the party in control feel some assurance of protection if they refuse to be coerced into parting with their money; but the unfortunates of opposite political faith feel they have no power behind the throne on which to rely, are nervously afraid of giving offence, and yield helplessly when threatened. The amount paid is not absolutely very great in any individual case, but to a poor clerk just able to get along, the loss of 3 per cent. of his salary may mean just the difference between having and not having a winter overcoat for himself, a warm dress for his wife, or a Christmas tree for his children. Such a forced payment is a piece of cruel injustice and iniquity.

"Another fact to be remembered is that very much of the money so collected is never turned into the party campaign chests at all, being kept for their own private uses by the jackals who have collected it. If the head of the office is determined to have his subordinates contribute, the latter soon know it, and the fact that they must pay becomes common talk among them. In some offices the system of making political assessments has obtained steadily for so many years that many of the clerks have come to regard it as part of the established order of nature, against which they do not think of rebelling, but, whatever their own politics, regularly pay their contributions into the campaign chest of the dominant party; as one of them expressed it, 'They feel that the desk, not the man at it, owes just so much to the party in power.' Many politicians take this view as a matter of course. One of the witnesses in the present case, a strong republican, who was holding office under the last administration, testifies that he was advised to contribute to the democratic campaign by one of his friends, a New York republican district leader, as being the only thing to do if he wished to keep his place."

The result of his inquiries seems to show that in the naval office under Colonel Burt this disgraceful practice was broken up. But under Collector Magone there was widespread effort to collect money. There was, however, no active coercion. In the surveyor's office, under Mr. Beattie, the contributions were levied generally. Both democrats and republicans gave to the democratic fund. By means of covert threats even the most unwilling were forced to pay. Some who refused at first were made very uncomfortable by being removed from their posts to others less agreeable. After payment they were sent back.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of The Civil Service Chronicle:

In the current number of your entertaining publication I notice your offer of fifty dollars, given you by an admirer to "use in furthering the cause of civil service reform in Indiana," as a reward for the "best statement of facts of the use of federal offices as spoil in any district." You aid those ambitious to secure the prize by giving this sample question: "Why was the editor of the Delphi Journal given an office?"

Assuming the statement you require must be in answer to the query, I base my claim to the fifty dollars upon the following explanation: The Delphi Journal is a republican newspaper published in one or more of the important towns in the tenth congressional district. That district, one politically doubtful, is now represented in congress by a preacher politician named Owen, whose chief ambition at the present writing is to bring about his renomination and re-election. As the district is uncomfortably "close," a kicking newspaper might be able to create dissensions disastrous to the congressman's ambition. The Delphi Journal is of this variety, was a very rank Gresham organ previous to the nomination of Mr. Harrison, and was compelled to indulge in a number of feats of retromingency before it became finally and firmly adjusted to the situation. It was, therefore, excellent policy in Mr. Owen, by the use of the patronage allotted him by the President for that purpose, to secure the influence of the Journal in his own behalf, and, by so doing, spike another of the annoying Gresham guns.

Further, the Delphi Journal office was only recently purchased by the present proprietors, the purchase-money being advanced and secured by a number of local republicans who are, therefore, personally interested in the financial success of the paper. Ordinarily the prospects for this success would be clouded with doubts, but, through the aid of the editor's salary as a federal employe, the future is made to look perceptibly brighter, and, as the young editor's application for appointment was doubtless "backed" by these same interested local republicans, it is safe to assume that their interest in Mr. Owen's re-election has at least been revived.

Carroll county, in which the city of Delphi is situated, is a "close" county which has twice given a small republican majority, whereas, formerly it was good for at least a hundred the other way. Was it not, therefore, proper that something handsome should be done for the boys who converted a majority for Cleveland and a democratic congressman into one for Harrison and Owen?

I think the sagacious editor of the Chronicle will sustain me in the proposition that similar tactics in each of the towns in the tenth district would summarily dissipate any doubts as to the chances for Mr. Owen's renomination, and this would be demonstrated by the modern law that, though Mr. Owen is inconsequential in congress, indifferent to political principles, ignorant as to the tariff, silent concerning silver coinage, deaf to civil service or other reform, a "dummy," in fact, as a representative of the people, he is a success because he "gets there."

A personal acquaintance with the men and the circumstances, and a consistent regard for my own hereafter, prompts me to insist that there is no other reason why the editor of the Delphi Journal should have been given an office.

D. A. FAWCETT.

La Grange, Ind., Feb. 3, 1890.

To the Editor of the Civil Service Chronicle:

I have read with interest an article published in the CHRONICLE for January, entitled "The Loot of the Indian Service." Will you kindly grant me space in your columns for a few words in connection with this subject?

As secretary of the Indian Rights Association I have endeavored, so far as my power and opportunities permitted, to direct my course upon the lines of policy adopted by our society. That policy is one of impartial investigation into the condition of the Indian service, and an honest and frank statement of the facts concerning it, and the recommendations for such a reform of the abuses as in our judgment is called for by these facts. I called attention last summer, through various prominent newspapers, to a development of the spoils system known as the "Home Rule" policy of appointment, which the President and secretary of the interior were applying to the Indian service. By this policy the appointment of Indian agents for the various western reservations was to be placed in the hands of local politicians in the states and territories in which these reservations were located, thus removing the power from where it belonged—the executive at Washington. I protested against this policy as applied to the Indian service as false in principle and likely to be disastrous in practice, claiming that it was an absurdity to call that a "Home Rule" policy which restricted the selection of the managers of Indian affairs to localities often notoriously hostile to Indian interests. This protest, as might be supposed, had no influence upon the subsequent action of the President and the secretary of the interior. The removal of Agent Levy at the Yankton reservation, referred to in your article, is an illustration of the evil effects of the policy. An exceptionally excellent agent who had gained the confidence of both Indians and whites at a reservation which had suffered the blight of incompetent administration of the past, is removed to gratify a senatorial demand. In this instance a sound principle of administration, viz., the retention of a competent and faithful officer, is deliberately violated in favor of a vicious principle of administration.

I know another agency at which the question of the removal of the Indians located there, against the best interest of the Indians and in order to gratify the desire of neighboring whites to possess their lands, is being agitated. The agent at this reservation and another employe there were chosen under the "Home Rule" policy. Both these men freely admitted that they had accepted their positions with a view to securing lands on the reservation when it should be thrown open to settlement. How far men accepting their posts through such motives could be expected to take an impartial view of the question at issue, or in other ways to serve the best interests of the Indians, may readily be inferred.

A letter reached me this morning informing me of another instance where this same disastrous policy was to be put into operation, and the removal of a good agent was to be secured under its dictation. The "Home Rule" policy is but a phase of the spoils system, and as such is essentially vicious. You and your readers may rest assured that there will be no hesitation on my part in publishing whatever facts come to my knowledge showing the evils connected with Indian administration. Though our society in this matter can hope to be little more than a voice crying in the wilderness, we can at least have the satisfaction of rendering our testimony to evils which are so strongly entrenched that only a distant and brighter future is likely to see them corrected.

In closing, I should like to make one point clear concerning General Morgan, the present Indian commissioner. He is not responsible for the "Home Rule" policy of appointment, nor has he anything to do with the selection of Indian agents. These appointments are in the hands of the President and the secretary of the interior. I have had close experience with General Morgan's management of Indian affairs and I have never known him to make an appointment on any but sound reasons. Indeed, he has excited the wrath of some senators in his own party on account of his refusal to act at their dictation in making partisan appointments to offices within the range of the commissioner's jurisdiction. Gen. Morgan is wholly in sympathy with the management of Indian affairs upon reform principles and for this reason should receive the earnest support of reformers. His confirmation is now hanging in the senate on account of his fidelity to the principles for which reformers have fought. The violence of the assault made upon him—I say it after a careful examination of the facts—is the highest tribute to his courage and faithfulness as a public officer.

Respectfully, HERBERT WELSH.
Philadelphia, January 29.

The ideal citizen is always a disturbing influence in his own political fold. He is in the position of the missionary to a congregation of southern negroes, who persisted in preaching against theft, covetousness, and other violations of the ten commandments, while his hearers were longing only to hear of the wonders described in the book of Revelations and to exult in anticipation of rambling through the golden streets and stately mansions of the great hereafter. "Pahson," said one emotional and tearful brother, "ef you don' quit talkin' 'bout stealin' chickens an' bein' fon' of other men's wives, you'll knock all de 'ligious stuffin' out ob dis meetin'."—From Address on The Ideal Citizen, by John Habberton.

Speaking of civil service reform, Mr. Cleveland said it was quite apparent that many of the politicians of both parties would be delighted if they could smother it out of existence by withholding the necessary appropriations for its maintenance. Of course, they would not have the courage to kill it directly. There was little fear they would succeed even by indirection, for the principle had too firm a hold upon the country to be destroyed, and he looked for the time when its scope would be enlarged and its benefits extended.—Baltimore Sun, February 12.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE for May, 1889, printed the letter of A. C. Eubanks, of Missouri, a defeated candidate for congress, in which he said:

In thinking about the matter we were talking about last night, I concluded that an office like your P. O. ought to afford me $25—say $15 now and $10 when you get your commission.

The St. Louis Republic also has photographs of other letters, one of February 8, 1889, in which he said:

I was the republican candidate for congress, and hence by custom am measurably entitled to have the patronage to somewhat reimburse me for labor and expense incurred in the campaign, which was considerable.

And in an offer to sell an office to one C. F. Davis, he said:

Your district being but partly in this, you can suggest about what would be right in the premises, and if you have other recommendations you would wish to call my attention to you will do so.

The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE for September, 1889, printed affidavits showing that Joseph D. Upton, a defeated candidate for congress, had been given the patronage of his district, about 234 post offices alone, and had proceeded to realize upon them, selling the Warsaw office for $25, and that various applicants for other offices were commanded by Upton to meet him on a certain day at Warsaw, where he "assessed them all according to the amount of salary attached to the offices."

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE for May, 1889, also printed portions of a speech to a campaign committee by James Love, another defeated candidate for congress, in which he said that he should control the patronage of his district and that he would receive all applications for local offices and present them to the President or the proper department at Washington, and further, "Of course, it will be understood that there will be some expense attached to the proceedings, and applicants will be expected to contribute to this expense."

This open talk causing a scandal, Clarkson proceeded to "investigate" the facts which, so far as made public, we printed in June, 1889. Clarkson declared Love innocent of any "charge affecting your honor."

The St. Louis Republic, later had the following affidavit which we have delayed printing to see whether it would be denied or taken notice of by the administration.

KINGSTON, Mo., Sept. 12, 1889.—Wm. J. Ward, of Pattonsburg, Daviess county, Mo., deposes and on oath states: That he was an applicant for the Pattonsburg post-office, and that in the forepart of May, 1889, he made a visit to Liberty, Clay county, Mo., for the purpose of soliciting the indorsement of James Love, late defeated republican candidate for congress, called at his home between 1 and 2 o'clock, on the date of his arrival at Liberty, was introduced by one Martin, presented indorsements for Love's consideration. Mr. Love produced a clipping from the St. Louis Globe Democrat, which contained the statement that the department had made ruling requiring indorsement of the defeated candidate for congress, and he stated that no one would be appointed to office without his indorsement. After an inspection of the indorsements he said that he was going to Washington, said that the congressional committee had made considerable fuss over the speech that he had made at Gallatin, but that it would have no effect, as his relations with the department had been established, and nothing the committee could do would serve to disturb them. After some other conversation with Mr. Love, I left his home and did not see him until the next day. In the morning I met him on the north side of the court-house yard. He spoke to me, and after we had conversed a short time Mr. Love said: "Ward, I understand that you are a man of considerable means." I told him that I was only in moderate circumstances, and had had some reverses in financial affairs, and was not worth very much. In speaking of his Washington trip, said he would be to considerable expense. I told him that I was willing, if he made my case a personal matter, to contribute a portion to said expense, but that under no circumstances would I pay him for his indorsement. He said that he did not think there was anything wrong for a man paying for a favor, and that, in indorsing applicants' petitions, he was doing such a favor as would secure the appointment. I told him that I thought it was wrong to pay anything for an indorsement. I then left him, and was well satisfied with the conversation that I had that I would not succeed in securing his indorsement, as I was unwilling to pay anything, and he was unwilling to indorse unless I did.

The report as above detailed is substantially correct in every particular.

That the administration has not rebuked this office brokerage would appear from the following facts given in the St. Louis Republic, December 11:

In the fourth congressional district Mr. H. R. W. Hartwig was the defeated republican candidate in the general election in 1888. The elected democratic member subsequently died, and a special election was held, at which Mr. F. M. Postgate was the republican nominee. The quarrel between these two for recognition has given us some of the facts, and the knowledge of these has led to further investigation. Mr. Hartwig finding Mr. Postgate in possession of the spoils during his absence, on his return wrote President Harrison a letter, saying:

I passed through a long and exciting canvass, myself bearing all the expenses, amounting to a sum exceeding $20,000, used for local, state, and national purposes. . . . Taking into account the work done and the great sacrifices for the party made by me and my friends, it would be rankest injustice to ignore my claims for recognition—an act without precedent and calculated to destroy confidence in our party integrity, discourage party workers, and disintegrate party organization and effectiveness.

Respectfully, H. R. W. HARTWIG, Late Republican Candidate, Fourth District, Missouri.

—President Harrison has appointed John C. Kinney postmaster at Hartford, Conn. The New York Times says: "The contest over this place has been long and earnest between Senator Hawley and 'Pat' McGovern. The latter is the boss of the practical ward heelers of the party in Hartford, and he insisted that one of his lieutenants should be postmaster.

He wanted the men who did the party's work at the polls to be recognized, and long ago he announced that if he did not have his way he would transfer his force to the democratic side. Mr. Hawley insisted upon his right, as a senator, to name the postmaster in his own city, and he selected Mr. Kinney, a young man employed upon the senator's newspaper, who is said to control nobody's vote but his own. Mr. Hawley's claim has been allowed, and the party workers in Hartford will have a chance in the near future to vote as they please."

—HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S. }
WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 8, 1890. }
Captain Edward F. Phinney, South Farmington, Mass.:

DEAR SIR—You are well aware of the contest which I have had over the post-office in your town. I consider it settled, and your appointment has been made and sent to you. It gives me pleasure to congratulate you on having received it, and I think after the citizens consider it fully they will decide that my action was judicious. It is a satisfaction to me that, after looking over the ground with a great deal of care and doing justice to the claims of others, I have had the pleasure of indorsing an old soldier who has an honorable record in the service of his country. I feel that it is only a few years that we may recognize the veterans; they soon will pass off the stage; and, as you well know, whenever my judgment will permit me to do so, giving careful consideration to the claims of others, my preference is to recognize the members of the Grand Army of the Republic. I wish to say also that your conduct during this contest has been very dignified. You presented to me your petitions without reflecting upon any of your competitors, and left the matter to me to decide upon the merits of your claims. I have no doubt of your success in the office, and I feel interested that it shall be equal to any other in the district in prompt attention to business and in the courteous and careful attention to the demands of those who do business with it.

Very truly yours,
JOHN W. CANDLER, M. C.,
Massachusetts Ninth District.

—Ten days ago Robert I. Patterson was appointed postmaster here. O. J. Sturgis, editor of the Republican Standard, had been led to believe that he was to have the place, and had been indorsed by Senator Quay. Next day Sturgis charged in his paper that Patterson's success was due to the interference of Henry C. Frick, the millionaire coke manufacturer and partner of Andrew Carnegie. Frick, he charged, is a friend of Postmaster-General Wanamaker and buys goods from his store. The statement was also made that Frick had contributed $20,000 to the republican campaign fund.

Now Sturgis comes forward with another story. He says in his paper: "The first post-office appointment made in Fayette county under the new administration was at Bradford. Very shortly after the inauguration Congressman Ray recommended J. H. Flenniken, and First Assistant Postmaster-General Clarkson appointed him. Mr. H. C. Frick thereupon protested to Postmaster General Wanamaker, who at once recalled the appointment. Mr. Ray declined thus to be stripped of his prerogative by a private citizen living outside the district, and insisted on the appointment. Merchant Wanamaker refused to offend Merchant Frick with his twenty stores in the coke region, and so the matter hangs fire to-day—the office still in the hands of a democrat. What is the use to send representatives to Washington if they are to be overridden by outside interference?"—Dispatch to New York Times from Uniontown, Pa., February 9.

--Congressman Morse this evening filed the following dispatch at the Western Union telegraph office:

"Warren W. Adams, Quincy, Mass.—Upon my recommendation to the postmaster-general you are nominated by the President of the United States and confirmed as postmaster of Quincy by the senate to-day."

This is the end of the efforts of the citizens of Quincy to secure the retention of their competent postmaster, Mr. Speare. A popular vote, taken before the party screws were put upon the voters, would have given Mr. Speare a majority of the republicans. Mr. Adams has been a hard worker in the party ranks, and he gets his reward. President Harrison made some declarations once about fitness and not party service being a tenure of office. There are a few people in Washington who remember them.—Boston Post, January 31, 1890.

—The President to-day ended a long contest for the postmastership at this place by appointing Capt. W. Underwood to the position. Underwood was months ago selected by Congressman Ray, but Secretary Blaine recommended his cousin, Samuel Ewing, for the place, and the matter has been held in abeyance ever since. Meanwhile another cousin of the secretary, Col. William Ewing, has entered the lists for collector of the port at Pittsburgh, a soft berth, which Senator Quay had picked out for his neighbor, John F. Drapo of Beaver. Col. Ewing is also said to have the indorsement of his distinguished relative at the capital.

For some weeks it has been common rumor that the President was willing to accept one of these cousins, but drew the line on a double dose. As the aspirant for postmaster has fallen by the wayside, it is thought the other cousin will get the collectorship.—Dispatch to New York Times from Washington, Penn., February 13.

—Charles Emory Smith, of Pennsylvania, editor of the Philadelphia Press, has been appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Russia.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS.

--Congressman Bayne, of Pennsylvania, thinks that it would be a good thing if the appointment of postmasters of certain grades were regulated by the laws of the civil service commission.

—Congressman Moore, of New Hampshire, recommended the reappointment of the democratic postmaster at Franklin Falls. He was selected at a caucus by a vote of 178 to 38 because he had been an efficient officer.

—Congressman Charles H. Turner, of New York, has at his disposal a cadetship in the naval academy at Annapolis. Instead of following the usual practice of handing this place out to pay for personal service, or of letting a few of his personal followers compete for it, he has already asked the youth of his district to compete for the place.

—Congressman Greenhalge has formally recommended the reappointment of Postmaster Buttrick at Concord.

The Boston Post says: "He served with credit in the United States navy, and is a direct descendant of the Major Buttrick who led the Concord farmers in their assault upon the British troops. Mr. Buttrick has performed his duties to the satisfaction of the whole town, and, though a democrat, he is supported by the leading republicans of the place, including so staunch a party man as Judge Hoar."

--Congressman Morse says that unless the situation changes he shall recommend the reappointment of Postmaster Harlow at Whitman. Mr. Harlow is a democrat, and his term expires in March, but he has given such satisfaction that he has the indorsement of the republican town committee and nearly all the republican voters. Mr. Charles H. Edson, who is in town to day, had a talk with Mr. Morse, and assured him that Mr. Harlow's appointment would satisfy everybody.—Boston Post, January 29.

—Secretary Tracy's recommendation of Capt. Folger to succeed Commodore Sicard as chief of the bureau of ordnance is strictly in the line of civil-service reform. There is no abler young officer in the navy than Capt. Folger, and his specialty has been ordnance. His record as superintendent of the gun factory at the Washington navy yard has been admirable from a technical point of view, and he has especially distinguished himself by serving under two administrations, and allowing the adherents of neither to run his factory as a political machine.

The republican bums of the district have done their best for the last six months to drive him out of his place, because he would not let them dictate his appointments. But, instead of getting him sent to sea, or put on inferior duty they have succeeded merely in hastening his promotion.—Dispatch to New York Evening Post, Jan. 24.

—The interest which has centered in the choice of postmaster for Newtonville has been intense and outspoken. With remarkable unanimity the republicans in a village caucus held last September, voted for the reappointment of J. B. Turner, a democrat, who was appointed to the position when President Cleveland was at the helm. Mr. Turner has made a faithful official. He has introduced better business methods into the management of the office, has systematized the work, been accommodating and thoroughly efficient, and has thus given satisfaction to both republicans and democrats. The caucus did not seem to settle the matter satisfactorily to the opponents of Mr. Turner, so it was finally decided to hold another; and Congressman Chandler, in a letter to C. B. Coffin, chairman of the Newton republican ward and city committee, stated that he shall recommend for the place the nominee of the caucus. A call was issued and the polls were open at a vacant store in the village from 4 to 9 P. M. to-day.

The vote was taken by the Australian ballot system, six booths being set up, each of the three candidates being allowed two tellers. It was a quiet but interesting afternoon, and as the hour for closing approached the room was a place of attraction for quite a number of citizens. The names were plainly printed in alphabetical order. There were 240 ballots cast, as follows: C. A. Burgess had 25, E. S. Cotton 43, J. B. Turner 172. The result was greeted with applause, and will without question be final. The office is first-class, carrying a salary of $2,100 besides the rent and an allowance of about $900, which pays the salaries of the two clerks.—Springfield Republican, February 3.

—Postmaster Childs will remain in place for another four years. Such was the verdict of the people at this afternoon's caucus, called by the congressmen of the state to decide upon whom their benediction should fall. The vote has been counted, and Frederick W. Childs, the present incumbent, who was appointed by President Cleveland in 1886, wins by a vote of 467 against 401 for George A. Hines. Mr. Hines was the nominee of the republican managers, led by Col. George W. Hooker, who demanded the office as spoils for the victors. The home of Mr. Childs this evening is besieged by the people offering congratulations to the successful candidate. In one town in the United States to-night principle rather than bossism holds sway.

This struggle between the people of Brattleboro and the republican politicians has attracted wide attention. Given the most efficient, brightest and most enterprising postmaster the town has ever had, the business men and citizens generally, as early as last spring, determined to interpret literally the republican national platform and demand his reappointment, even though he be a democrat. Dea and Col. Estey of the Estey organ works were foremost in this crusade for reform, and, with others equally interested, had circulated the petition for Mr. Childs, which was signed by four-fifths of the republican voters. Col. George W. Hooker then came forward and, without impugning Mr. Childs's executive ability, popularity or brilliant success, declared that he must not succeed himself because he was not a republican. Not even a charge of offensive partisanship was laid at Mr. Childs's door. The most that the ex-sergeant-at-arms has said was that no government salary should swell democratic campaign funds while a republican administration was in power. But in Mr. Childs's case not even that objection holds, since he not only has never contributed to democratic funds but has a letter from Don M. Dickinson, the last democratic postmaster-general, informing him that to so contribute is a crime, and that failure to respond to any request from democratic committees would in no way jeopard his tenure of office. That letter was written during the heat of the last presidential campaign.

A remarkable feature of the contest has been the enthusiasm with which the best class of the republican party has rallied to Mr. Childs's support. That they have worked for him as for one of their own political belief is very clear. Why they have done so was concisely stated by Col. Julius Estey this afternoon: First, because Mr. Childs's retention is required on good business grounds; second, because such retention will give practical application to orthodox republican doctrines.—Special Dispatch to the Springfield Republican, Feb. 1.

—The Brooklyn Times prints the following letter from the republican assemblyman-elect for the second district of Queens county to the republican postmaster of Long Island City:

William Richensteen, Esq.: DEAR SIR—James Purcell informs me that he is an applicant for appointment as letter carrier, and states that you have promised to appoint him if Mr. C. W. Hallett and I will join in a letter asking you to make the appointment and designate in such letter the particular carrier now in position whom we would like to have removed to make room for him (Purcell).

Mr. Purcell is a republican and voted and worked for my election to the legislature last fall. It is alleged that all the present carriers are "democrats and consequently undeserving of consideration at the hands of republicans, and ought therefore to be summarily removed."

I do not believe that a man ought to be appointed to office because he voted for me, nor do I believe that one ought to be removed from office because of having voted against me.

I have reason to believe that several of these democratic letter carriers voted for me at the same time Purcell did, although they have not confessed to me that they did so. Others, no doubt, voted against me.

I have no means of knowing (without asking) who voted for me and who against.

If the claim of position is based upon the votes cast at the recent election, and the decision in the premises is left to me, I must confess my inability to select the carrier for removal to make room for Purcell, and therefore decline the honor of designating a victim for sacrifice in the interest of reform.

If there exist other than partisan reasons for the removal of any carrier I am not aware of them.

I have enough confidence in your judgment to believe you will make no removals without good cause, and enough faith in your republicanism to believe that in filling vacancies you will not refuse an appointment to an otherwise good man because he is also a republican.

I was once a republican postmaster, and tried to be a good one. I asked a democratic president to allow me to retain office under him to the end of my term, and the request was granted.

Under all these circumstances it is perhaps unfortunate for Mr. Purcell that I should be made the arbiter of his fate in connection with the office he seeks, and this I regret, for there is good reason to believe he would make an efficient carrier.

This long letter is prompted more by a belief that you want to share with your friends the responsibility of deciding embarrassing questions of this kind, than that you seriously think I will select a man from among your subordinates for removal for no better reason than to provide a place for a man who voted the same ticket that you and I did. Very respectfully yours,

HENRY C. JOHNSON.

Astoria, L. I., Dec. 11, 1889.

WANTON REMOVALS.

For I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him (the President) to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. Such an abuse of power exceeds my conception.—Congressman James Madison, June, 1789.

--John A. Pyle, appointed postmaster at West Chester, Pa., by President Cleveland, has been removed. A letter to the New York Times says (January 19):

Now, Postmaster Pyle is complimented on all sides by republicans, prohibitionists and democrats for the many reforms he has introduced for the convenience of the public. He has brought the office up to a very high standard, and it has been visited on numerous occasions by postmasters of other localities to gain information. There has never been a word of complaint against Postmaster Pyle or his assistants. Every patron of the office, excepting the office-seeking politicians, is satisfied with his management.

But Mr. Pyle is a democrat, and not even an "offensive partisan." He never fails to vote the democratic ticket, but beyond that he does no ward work except upon himself.

--After fifteen years of continuous duty in the Scranton post-office and four years in the railway mail service, A. H. Hartley, who has recently been acting as superintendent of mails in this city, has been summarily dismissed without cause, for the reason that, although a republican in politics, he has not been in harmony with the local machine. The Scranton Truth, of this evening's issue, calls the attention of Postmaster-general Wanamaker to the case, and asks if this is the sort of civil service reform the people may expect under the Harrison administration.

Hartley was appointed to a position in the Scranton post-office in 1871 by Postmaster Slocum. He became a most efficient clerk and soon mastered the details of the office. In the discharge of his duty some years ago he incurred the displeasure of Congressman Scranton, who was then postmaster of this city, and he has not been in favor with the local bosses ever since. His conduct was commended by the highest officials of the post-office department, however, and when the whirligig of politics precipitated his dismissal he obtained a responsible position in the railway mail service, where his ability was soon recognized and approved. When President Cleveland was elected Mr. Hartley was again offered an important position in the Scranton post-office under Postmaster Connolly and he accepted. It was thought that the guillotine would be applied to him as soon as Postmaster Jones came into office by the grace of Congressman Scranton, and there was some disappointment because this did not occur forthwith, but it finally came to pass when everybody supposed that Hartley's experience and knowledge of post-office affairs were sufficient to cancel the old grudge and make him a fixture.

The business men of Scranton, who have reason to appreciate Hartley's valuable services in the post-office, are indignant over his summary dismissal, which is a direct violation of the letter and spirit of the civil service law, and many wonder whether Postmaster-General Wanamaker would treat one of his faithful and efficient employes in that manner after nineteen years of devoted service.—Dispatch to New York Times, January 14.

SPOILSMEN'S METHODS.

Frank Hatton's Post charged Commissioner Roosevelt with having used a spoilsman's methods to secure a place in the census bureau for a friend. "Opposition was made to the appointment of Roosevelt's man. Trades and dickers were necessary. Roosevelt made them. The Wisconsin man was appointed and charged to the District of Columbia."

Mr. Roosevelt in answer said:

"I had no intention of noticing that attack till it could be made a subject of official investigation. Then I could have got the true story out under oath, and shown how unblushingly false some of these statements are. It is a fact that I have interested myself in procuring the appointment of a man from Wisconsin to a place in the census bureau, and with that the truth of the article begins and ends. I not only do not deny that part of the story, but I want to state here and now that I have nothing to regret, but shall take a precisely similar course whenever similar circumstances arise. When we went to Milwaukee to investigate the charges against Postmaster Paul, the principal, and, indeed, the vital witness for the government was a man named Shidy, who had been in the civil service about twenty years. He had begun life as a physician, but night work threatened to wreck his health, and he had to give up his practice and take a place far less profitable, but with easier hours, in the public employ. He had a family to support, and was dependent upon his salary; so at the last moment he came to the Commission and pleaded to be excused from testifying, on the ground that his evidence would surely cost him his position. We refused to let him off, but I pledged him my word that he should be protected in telling the truth. It was as he predicted. Mr. Paul lost no time in driving him out of office. The commission did its utmost to keep him in his place, and when that failed I got the postmaster-general to write a letter recommending him to a position in the census bureau. There was not a 'trade' or a 'dicker' of any kind. Superintendent Porter consented to appoint him if he could pass the necessary examination, and when the appointment was finally made out, Mr. Lyman went in person to Secretary Noble, explained the circumstances, and asked in the name of the commission that it might be confirmed. Now you see just what that assault in the Post has back of it.

"How about the assignment of this Wisconsin man to the quota of the District of Columbia?"

"I know nothing about that. When Postmaster

Paul heard that we were getting this place for Shidy, he did all in his power to block our efforts. From various quarters came protests, to which Superintendent Porter paid no attention, having given me his promise. Among the rest, the Wisconsin senators inquired into the case; but I assured them that I did not want to interfere in any way with their prerogative; I wished Shidy charged to the commission's account—not to theirs. Mr. Porter said that he should be appointed, not from Wisconsin's quota, but from the 'general list.' Whether matters are in such condition that the general-list appointments are all from the District, I'm sure I don't know. Now, as I said in the beginning, I have nothing to conceal or take back. I shoulder the entire responsibility, and am ready to do the same thing over again when a witness for the government is persecuted because he does his duty and tells the truth. It is the government's business to protect its witnesses from foul play. If it doesn't stand by them, the time is not far distant when it won't be able to command the services of a witness, except one who is moved by feelings of revenge or by some other impulse equally damaging to the value of his testimony."

When Mr. Roosevelt's remarks were repeated to Commissioner Thompson, and he was asked if the commission were ready as a whole to stand by them, he answered: "Yes, though Mr. Roosevelt is willing to accept all responsibility, this affair was really the commission's joint act throughout. Shidy is an educated man, and there is no reason why he should not make an efficient clerk in his new place. I fully approved of Mr. Roosevelt's conduct. Indeed, the commission discussed every stage of the proceeding. But there is one part of the story which Mr. Roosevelt has not told you, and which I think ought to be told, in justice to him. In the same letter in which Shidy was notified to come on and submit to an examination for admission to the census bureau, Mr. Roosevelt wrote that he must not let money considerations stand in his way; and that, if he should fail in the examination, the entire expenses of his trip from Milwaukee and back would be paid out of Mr. Roosevelt's own pocket. That involved, of course, a possible expenditure of $75 to $100; but it is my colleague's notion of the way to keep faith with a man to whom he has given his personal word."

The brutality of the spoils system is well known, and there has rarely been a more perfect illustration of it.

AN INSTANCE OF THE MERIT SYSTEM.

The Eastern Dispensary in New York city has for years carried on an invaluable work among the poor of the city. During the year 1889, it treated 61,228 patients 106,748 times. As an illustration of how invariably the merit system benefits the many while the spoils system aids a limited, privileged class, we quote from the account of the New York Evening Post Jan. 29:

"It is, perhaps, the only institution of its kind in the country where civil service principles are absolutely applied in the selection of physicians. Formerly the physicians were selected in the ordinary way, and the influence of friends always decided the matter where there was a question as to the appointment of one or another applicant. The employees gave such time and attention to the work of the dispensary as they could consistently with their other interests, attending upon alternate days and receiving no compensation. Three years ago the trustees adopted an entirely new course; when vacancies occurred, advertisements were inserted in the medical journals, public examinations were held under the direction of some of the most prominent physicians in the city, the applicants were graded strictly on the merits of their examination, and the appointments were given in every instance to the man having the highest rank. Care was taken, of course, to ascertain that the physicians appointed were men of proper character. The physicians were required to attend at the dispensary a certain number of hours each day, and were paid a small salary. This system has been strictly followed, and with most excellent result. Much good work was done under the old system, but the new one has been found so much better that no one connected with the management of the dispensary would think of returning to the old method of appointment. Much of the increase in the work done by the dispensary has been due to this new method of appointing physicians, giving them compensation, and requiring their attendance at regular hours every day. Even the very poor people, many of whom are by no means intelligent, but often quite the reverse, highly appreciate the superior character and skill of the physicians appointed by this civil service method, and the advantages of being able without fail to secure first-rate medical attendance at certain hours each day.

THE CLERGY AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

This spoils system must be destroyed, or the liberty of the American citizen will become a fiction. I am not an optimist, nor am I a pessimist; but I believe that this system will sooner or later subvert our republican institutions, unless it is itself abolished. And I very much doubt whether any other great reform or any considerable progress in any other direction will or can be made until elections and official life are freed from the baleful influence of patronage.—Rev. J. H. Crooker, in Problems in American Society, page 190.

Rev. Sydney Strong having delivered an address on the spoils system on Thanksgiving, Day at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, says: "I am glad that my eyes are opened. I think I opened the eyes of a few others. The fact is our partisan press and politicians keep the eyes of the people closed."

Most undoubtedly it is because the average citizen allows himself to be fooled and hoodwinked into thinking that the undeniable abuses will be corrected by the politicians; in other words, that this is a political question to be settled by the regular party machinery. Never was there a more disastrous blunder. The interest of the machine politicians on both sides is exactly identical, and it is inevitably and radically opposed to the interest of the people and the government. Do you still expect, after witnessing for years how the civil service reform plank is inserted in every party platform of both parties, as one of our great politicians forcibly but inelegantly said, "not to stand on, but to spit upon," do you still expect, after seeing how each administration differs from its predecessor only in the degree of shamelessness with which it betrays its pre-election pledges, do you still expect the politicians of their own free will to disgorge the control of more than $60,000,000 a year—which they have appropriated in common from the public, and shamelessly speak of as their "spoils?" Then either you must be an extremely unsophisticated person, or else you marvelously underestimate the power of a machine politician and the ease with which he can agree with his brother wire-puller of the opposite party. Why should it be hard for a democratic spoilsman to agree with a republican spoilsman to hold on to the spoils from which both get their living, at all hazards, and "divvy up" after election as best they can? Surely, New Yorkers do not need to be told of the notorious bargain entered into by the party bosses of opposite sides in the metropolis, by which a certain portion of the offices were allotted in advance to the heelers nominated by each ring, and the election was a mere farce to amuse the people, who might just as well have had no vote at all.—From the sermon of Rev. Benj. Wisner Bacon, Oswego, N. Y., November 27, 1889.

PETITION TO CONGRESS FOR LARGER APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The following petition for larger appropriations for executing the civil service law has been started by the Massachusetts Civil Service Reform League:

To the Honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

WHEREAS, The President of the United States in his last message to congress, speaking of the work of the civil service commission, says: "As a result of the revision of the rules, of the new classification, and of the inclusion of the railway mail service, the work of the commission has been greatly increased, and the present clerical force is found to be inadequate. I recommend that the additional clerks asked by the commission be appropriated for"; and

WHEREAS, The civil service commissioners, charged with the execution of the law, in their report, just published, say (pp. 4, 5): "The sum of money at present appropriated for the expenses of the commission is altogether insufficient for the purpose, in spite of the most rigid economy. . . . Therefore, the requirements to enable the commission efficiently to discharge merely its present duties will be about $18,000 over and above the sum appropriated this year, or a total appropriation of $53,000. To extend the system as it ought to be extended, the appropriation would need to be proportionately larger,"—therefore

We, the undersigned, citizens of Massachusetts, believing that the great importance of the work of the United States civil service commission demands ample appropriations from congress, earnestly petition your honorable bodies to appropriate not only the sum of fifty-three thousand dollars asked for by the commission for its present work, but also the additional sum needed for such extension of the system under the present law as the commission recommend, and, with the President's approval, may be able to make.

The seventh annual report of the executive committee of the Indian Rights Association [Philadelphia, 1305 Arch street] is a document that ought to be read by all citizens. It is a depressing and shameful record of the efforts made to secure the commonest principles of fair and decent treatment to a helpless people. The report says:

"A prominent feature in the work of the association during the past five years has been an effort to prevail upon the government to introduce the merit system into the Indian service. It has been shown in numerous publications and reports hitherto issued that it is impossible to conduct a satisfactory and efficient Indian service upon a system of appointment which violates every sound principle of administration; which makes appointment to office the reward of party service rather than of merit, and which dictates removals not for misconduct or inefficiency, but for partisan reasons. Abundant illustrations of the fruits of this pernicious system, as practiced by the Indian bureau during the greater part of President Cleveland's administration, were collected and published by the association. This vigorous and impartial action was followed by excellent results, since the offending commissioner and assistant commissioner toward the close of the last administration retired from office under the incessant fire of criticism which their course had brought upon them."

And yet in the face of this President Harrison is deaf to the appeal to put this service under the merit system, and he has inaugurated a so-called "home rule" policy against which, thus far, the Indian Rights Association has protested to no purpose. We quote from the report:

"The 'home rule' policy is the legitimate offspring of the spoils system. It removes the power of appointment from the federal authority in Washington, where it belongs, and places it in the hands of local politicians in the territories, by whom it has been usurped.

Having chosen his course with the experience of the preceding administration before him, President Harrison must challenge the criticism which does and will follow.

Last year at this time you gave us all the keynote of reform for the year, and whatever may have occurred since then that note has not flattened upon our lips. If it was hopeful then, it is not elegiac now, for the note of the reformer is always cheerful and in the major key, and in view of the steady advance of the good cause, it rises naturally and involuntarily into a triumphant strain. I should think it a happy year for reform if it had done nothing more for us than to give us the present national commission—whatever may halt or falter, that marches on. It offers us the stimulating spectacle of an aggressive contest for reform. It is not apologetic, nor hesitating, but its attitude is well represented by one of the commissioners, whose bold mien and crisp and conclusive dealings with the enemy remind me of Sir Philip Sydney's advice to his brother Robert, then upon his travels: "If you hear of any good wars, go to them at once." If there be any better war at present than that in which we are all soldiers, I have not heard of it; and if there be any better fighting than General Roosevelt's, it is yet to be discovered. When I enlisted I certainly did not expect to be wafted to success on flowery beds of ease. But neither did I suppose that, against tradition and prejudice, and ignorance and honest doubt, and party spirit and falsehood, and wrath and ridicule, and the huge organized political machine, the demand for reform in the civil service would make such rapid and prodigious progress as to become within a very few years one of the two or three chief practical questions of politics. I am sure we all agree that fighting in this cause is, as virtue is said to be, its own exceeding great reward. A genuine American likes nothing better than to attack monstrous public abuses, save that when, as in this case, the country begins to ask about them, it will ask more and more loudly and imperiously, until it answers itself by correcting them."—Letter of George William Curtis to the Maryland Association.

THE investigation of the civil service commission by a congressional committee seems to have exhausted the ammunition of Hatton and those who are secretly supporting him. It is better, however, to defer extended comment until the committee has finished its work and made its report. It ought to be understood that the friends of the merit system are in favor of a thorough investigation, not only of the acts of the commission but of the workings of the law. They challenge the spoilsmen to make their very best showing. So far their case is a fiasco. Slight errors of judgment on the part of the commission appear, as for instance, the retention of a relative of Mr. Lyman's in their employ, a mistake, no matter how fit the man. This fault belongs upon Mr. Lyman's shoulders. He had settled the matter before his two colleagues became members of the commission. They heard of the charge that this relative had improperly handed out examination questions, but they found that it had been investigated and the matter settled by the previous commission, and they very naturally did not reopen it. Mr. Lyman's re-appointment as commissioner was unfortunate. He is not equal to such a position. He had always been a clerk, and is filled with the technicalities of the clerical mind. His acquiescence under President Cleveland, in a misuse of the law by the heads of offices, proved him to lack entirely those fighting qualities which were absolutely necessary. The misdoings of the Milwaukee postmaster were known to him before the election of 1888, but he ignored them. If he had any duty, it was to denounce to the President the delinquencies of such a postmaster. The man fit to be a civil service commissioner is one who is not afraid to do his duty at the risk of losing his place. No blame can be attributed to President Harrison for this appointment, as it was urged by the great bulk of the civil service reformers.

When the commission was investigating the Milwaukee post-office, one member of the local board named Shidy told them that under the direction of Postmaster Paul he had manipulated the examination records so that Paul's favorites could appear at the top of the list, and that appointments had been made in accordance with this manipulation. He did not want to testify to this, and held up to the commission his certain loss of place and the certain destitution of his family which would follow. The commission promised to protect him. He testified, and was for that dismissed by Paul. Mr. Roosevelt explained the circumstances to Superintendent Porter, and the latter agreed that Shidy might try for a place in the census bureau. Mr. Roosevelt then personally guaranteed Shidy's expenses to Washington, where the latter came, and having passed the examination received a clerkship from Mr. Porter. He was pursued by Paul and the whole body of the Wisconsin spoilsmen as a traitor to the spoils cause. In the congressional investigation Shidy testified the other day:

If the superintendent of the census wants false reports he knows that matter. I am his servant. He can direct me in all matters. In regard to post-office affairs, Mr. Paul was my superior officer and directed me. In regard to the civil service commission matter he ought not to have been my superior or to have directed me in any way, but, unfortunately, it was impossible to separate the two I's.

This is the spoils system in its highest development. The New York Times has already pointed out that Shidy is its natural product. The fear of losing his place and of beggaring his family makes him manipulate records at the order of a postmaster. The same fear makes him beg to be excused from telling the facts. And so long has he been accustomed to seeing public affairs manipulated for the benefit of the Pauls and the Hattons, the Clarksons and the Wanamakers, that he declares the correct principle to be that a clerk must trick laws and records at the bidding of his official superior.

Postmaster General Wanamaker has taken a hand in the investigation, and his course is well described in a recent press letter by Mr. Foulke. It seems that Mr. Roosevelt obtained Wanamaker's consent to get Shidy a place in the census bureau. Wanamaker now comes upon the stand, smooth and smug, and says that Mr. Roosevelt never told him of Shidy's misdoings, or he would not have consented, but would have warned any head of department against appointing him. As Mr. Foulke says, he evidently makes his evidence as strong as possible; he has no hesitation or doubts of memory. By an unfortunate slip, however, Wanamaker admitted that he had at the time read the commission's report of the Milwaukee investigation. That report contained the following:

"We examined the secretary of the board, Hamilton Shidy, and the chairman, J. B. Johnson. Shidy is admitted by all to have done the work of the board.

* * * Shidy testified that he was compelled by the postmaster to give the latter free access to the list of eligibles, although such access was at that time strictly forbidden, and he further testified that the postmaster, knowing those that were eligible as well as their standing, appointed whomsoever he chose, and then forced him [Shidy] to torture the list of eligibles and certification book, so as to produce a certification which should bear the appointee's name."

* * * "As for Shidy, he, equally with his colleagues, Johnson and Fahsel, was certainly guilty of grave misconduct in permitting the board to become the tool of Mr. Paul, but he did it under fear of losing his place if he rebelled, being wholly in the power of Mr. Paul, and, unlike his colleagues, who were equally guilty with himself, he had the manliness to come forward and tell what had occurred when the chance was given him. It is manifestly unjust to visit him with any punishment not also inflicted on Johnson and Fahsel."

* * * "Shidy and Johnson testified before us, in Mr.

Paul's presence, that on one occasion he examined the papers of an applicant, which papers they had already marked, and forced them, against their own judgment, to re-mark them, giving them a lower grade. * * * Mr. Shidy testified that Mr. Paul made his appointment first, and then forced him [Shidy] to gerrymander the list of eligibles, so as to produce a stuffed certification which should contain the name of the already appointed man."

By some curious manipulation of his conscience Mr. Wanamaker, without qualms, retains Johnson in the employ of the post-office department. After Wanamaker's profession of ignorance of Shidy's conduct, the commission brought out a copy of his letter to Paul on receipt of the latter's resignation, which said:

"Before its receipt the civil service commission had submitted a report of an examination of your office, upon which I should have taken action before this but for your request for delay in order that you might submit a statement in your own behalf. After the examination by the civil-service commission, a post office inspector was sent to examine your office and his report has been submitted to me. Upon these reports your removal from office has been determined on."

The report of the commission upon the Milwaukee post-office was full of references to Shidy's conduct, and for Wanamaker to say that he had read that report and did not know of Shidy's misdoings, and was misled by Mr. Roosevelt into consenting to Shidy's employment in the census bureau is to the ordinary mind incomprehensible and had better be left to Senator Hampton to characterize. The evidence is very strong in support of Mr. Foulke's opinion, that this proceeding is an attempt, mainly instigated and supported by high administrative officers to break down Mr. Roosevelt. The result will be that he will be stronger than he was before.

In another column is set forth a portion of the public career of Quay, whose hands have been further strengthened by the handling of the vast patronage of Pennsylvania. In this case the following letter shows of how little avail are the protests of influential citizens when once an office baron gets his feet on the neck of the people:

General Benjamin Harrison: FEBRUARY 18, 1889.

MY DEAR SIR—I have your letter of February 12. . . . You must be sure that I, who have so long urged your election as President, do not now wish your administration to fail. I am therefore compelled to address you a further protest concerning the course which it is evident you have decided upon taking. . . . Senator Quay's status in Pennsylvania is repugnant to the men whose support you need. He has been and is a "machine" organizer and manager. His control of the politics of this state is already causing serious discontent. Yet you choose him and the agent whom he designates, and you practically decline to hear the voice of remonstrance raised by men of high character and influential position in Pennsylvania affairs. . . . You are therefore not merely taking a negative step, you are taking one of positive weakness, and sure evil consequences. You are depriving yourself of support which you ought to have, and you are making your administration the ally of those influences and practices in politics against which the republican party has more than once revolted. I am sorry this should be the case, and I can not therefore let the time pass of frankly telling you the truth.

I am, dear sir, very truly your friend,
WHARTON BARKER.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE will be glad to receive information upon the following points:

The name of any newspaper editor or owner who has or may receive a federal appointment, and the name of the office.

The names of all members of political committees or delegates given a federal appointment, and the name of the office.

The names of all federal office-holders who are members of any political committee or who act as delegates, naming the committee or the convention.

Statements regarding any political activity in primaries, conventions or political work done for any nominees by federal office-holders.

These accounts should be as explicit as possible.

DAVID ESSEX PORTER, a son of Admiral Porter, has been arrested in Washington on a charge of obtaining $1,900 in money and goods from a colored man, F. W. Johnson, for securing an office for Johnson, but which the latter never got. Porter admits that he received the above property and also other sums from other persons, but says it was for expenses incurred in trying to get them offices. There are some excellent people in Indiana who avoid the civil service reform agitators as jarring upon the evenness of their day and as jostlers of "the past." We ask their attention to the above specimens of dangerous degeneration, and suggest that these good people quicken their activities. Major Porter is said to have a brilliant military record and powerful social and political influence in Washington, where he resides.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE desires to call the attention of the commercial club of this city to a series of articles in the Civil Service Record (Boston) on competitive tests applied to the Boston police force. And further, the primary evil in the management of our city affairs is the spoils system. Thousands of dollars are spent every year upon the streets, and yet we have no clean streets. The first reason is that the men who receive the wages are not hired because they are good workmen, but because they have influence with some councilman. The Indianapolis News last year stated that Councilman Darnall had thirty men in the city employ. That means that they were employed not for their capacity to do work, but because Mr. Darnall wanted them employed. The commercial club should destroy this system, root and branch, and compel the substitution of the system of the Boston labor service, and this should be thoroughly tried before any additional direct taxation is proposed. Let us get the worth of the money we do spend before we add to the sum. This is one step in a revolution which ought to take place in our city government.

A POLITICAL CENSUS.

Superintendent Porter goes bravely on with the work of allotting the positions connected with the census, as spoils. He has taken to writing to postmasters for information as to the character of persons about to be employed. There has been no better chance lately for one local partisan to give another a lift. It is probably a pleasant fiction of Porter's to seem to inquire into the fitness of his employes. As a matter of fact he describes himself "as waist-deep in congressmen," and these really make the appointments. Each state is divided into districts, with a supervisor at the head of each, and each district has a large number of enumerators. In addition there are other offices, such as gathering the statistics of mortgage indebtedness. In Massachusetts this last position has been allotted to Senators Dawes and Hoar, as their share of census spoil; the balance goes to the other congressmen. The allotment is now well under way, and is of interest. In the Rockford, Illinois, district, two weeks ago, the supervisor had 700 applications for 265 places, and was just sending out in one mail 101 letters in relation to them. In Indiana there are six districts, and the supervisor of the first district is Francis Scholtz, of Evansville, described as "a prominent German republican." In the second district is Ambrose E. Nowlin, "clerk of the Dearborn county republican committee." In the third district the appointee is Sid Conger, for whom Wanamaker recently named a post-office, and of whom it is said "there is no more popular and earnest republican anywhere." In the fourth district is Wilson Soale, described as "one of the most active young republicans in the state." The qualifications of the appointee in the fifth district, Charles Harley, we are unable to state, except that he is a republican. In the sixth district is S. S. Beshore, described "as an active republican." In this connection we get this bit of information from the Indianapolis Journal:

Mr. Wilson H. Soale, census supervisor for the Terre Haute district, has referred the appointment of census enumerators to the chairmen of the several county committees of his district, and these in turn are referring them to the chairmen of the different township committees. That seems a queer way of getting official subordinates to perform an important executive work.

There is nothing queer about it except that some one let out the secret. The entire census establishment, including all its positions and the great sum appropriated to it, was as deliberately turned over to be divided among party workers as any pirate ever divided the cargo of a ship among those who had helped to capture it. It is time now for Senator Hoar to come forward and argue that these are political offices, and that the enumerators in their townships will have to respond to the presidential toasts at feasts. The result of the present process may be that we shall have a political census, in which on all economic questions affecting party doctrine no one will have any confidence. This is the logical end of the practice advocated by Senator Hoar when he says, in the Boston Journal of February 25: "I still think, as I have always thought, that the collectors of our principal ports should be men in political harmony with the administration, with whom the President and the secretary of the treasury may, whenever they find it necessary, establish the most confidential relations. I think this is specially true under an administration one of whose chief duties is the framing, reforming, construing, and administering a tariff."

A DOUBLE INSTANCE.

I.

"Only the Interests of the Public Service should Suggest Removals from Office."

Mr. Saltonstall's fellow-citizens desired to give him a dinner as a manifestation of their esteem, and in their letter to him, among other things, they said:

"We have seen that during your tenure of office, the administration of the custom house has been, for the first time in a generation, free from partisan influence; that it has been conducted upon business principles, by business methods, and by men trained in those principles and methods; that it has been just and considerate to importers and entirely faithful to the government."

In the Civil Service Record for March is the letter of Mr. Dorman B. Eaton to the Boston Journal taking up Senator Hoar's excuse for pressing the removal of Collector Saltonstall on the ground that the collectorship is a "political" office, and Senator Hoar's reply, which contains this astonishing statement in support of his opinion that the collectorship is a political office:

"I have been familiar with the leading friends and promoters of the policy of divorcing the civil service of the country from politics here in Washington since I served with Mr. Jenckes of Rhode Island in 1869, and was intimate with him and his plan. I believe that this has been the opinion of all of them without exception. I never heard, in private speech or public debate, an intimation to the contrary."

Mr. Eaton is well known as an urbane but dangerous adversary. After demolishing Senator Hoar on the above entirely incorrect statement, he proceeds to the assertion that that the collector must be in political harmony with the President, and closes as follows:

The simple answer is that the collector is in no sense a political officer, that he has no right to have any party secrets or party aims regarding the tariff, that he is as much bound as any judge in Massachusetts to administer the tariff laws openly and honestly in the common interests of the people, regardless of party. He is no more a political officer than the superintendent of the public schools, the chief of police or the judges of the supreme court are political officers. It is no part of his duty to speak for the President. He discredits his office in the exact degree that he interferes with party management, or attempts to use his official influence for party purposes. I believe the time is not remote when this view will be as universally accepted in this country as it was before Jackson's time, and now is in Great Britain. When Massachusetts took the lead in the general struggle for independence, all the collectors under George III, if not some of the judges, were political officers. I hope and believe Massachusetts will add to her glories by taking the lead in bringing in the triumph of those principles in public administration which will cause it to be utterly immaterial, in the estimation of her people, what are the party politics of the collector of Boston. Who can fail to see the great gain of making the collectorship of Boston a reward to be won in fair competition by the highest merit in the customs administration, rather than a prize to be contended and bargained for through a long period in the lottery of party by the rival leaders and politicians of the state—a contest in which the issues are as false and needless as they are perplexing and demoralizing. To repeal the four years' term and to take the collectorships, both of customs and internal revenue, tens of thousands of post-offices and many other miscellaneous offices of a purely business nature out of party contests and no longer allow them to be the subject of degrading intrigues, corrupt bargains and alarming bribery, would be an era in our politics which would enable presidents to discharge their proper functions instead of spending months on removals, open the way for the senate to regain its old dignity, and exalt republican government not only in our own eyes, but in the estimation of the whole civilized world.

This whole unfortunate matter is fitly summed up by Harpers' Weekly:

The whole country is indebted to Mr. Saltonstall for the demonstration that the collectorship of Boston is not, as Senator Hoar calls it, a political office, and for showing that the principles of the conduct of the public service which the republican platform of 1838 warmly commends with a demand for their general application, are not only practicable, but productive of the best results. The President, also, although consenting to make spoils of the office, in deference to the alleged persistence of Senators Hoar and Dawes, must yet feel grateful to the officer who has illustrated to the satisfaction of all men the wisdom of the President's declaration that "fidelity and efficiency should be the essential test in appointment, and that only the interest of the public service should suggest removals from office."

The removal of Mr. Saltonstall by the author of this truthful remark has had the good effect of illustrating conspicuously to the country the truth of another remark by the same author, in which he describes such acts as Mr. Saltonstall's removal as "the frank and bold, if brutal, method of turning men and women out simply for political opinion." The platform of Mr. McKinley bitterly reproached misguided citizens who thought it possible that a republican President could be capable of such conduct.

II.

"Fitness and Not Party Service should be the Essential and Discriminating Test."

When the President, last August, nominated ex-Gov. Warmouth, the Indianapolis Journal said: "The appointment of ex-Governor Warmouth as collector at New Orleans, probably indicates his purpose to engage again in active politics, and that means republican activity in Louisiana." Warmouth has just been confirmed after a determined opposition, in which his whole history was brought out. The Civil Service Chronicle gives a few facts. The New York Tribune said of him, December 28, 1874, "That his administration as governor was corrupt and bad, is unfortunately true." And again, July 12, 1877, "Most of the Louisiana gang were brought into prominence because they were great rascals." Warmouth was governor of Louisiana between 1868 and 1872, when he was impeached by the legislature for offering a bribe. He afterwards went from the republican to the democratic party, and, in 1877, back again. In December, 1874, Warmouth and an editor named Byerly had, on Warmouth's challenge, arranged to fight a duel. Before it came off they met on the street, and Byerly struck Warmouth with a cane. Warmouth said, "He struck me three times with the stick, when I clinched with him, in the meantime taking a knife out of my pocket. With my arms around his shoulders, I got my hands together and opened the knife. Just then I felt Byerly falling on me. Soon after we fell a policeman took the knife out of my hands, and some of the crowd pulled Byerly off. I understand Byerly has been cut, and I am accused of doing the cutting." In closing this account the New York Evening Post says, "Byerly had been 'cut' in six places in the abdomen, twice before he fell, one wound being six inches deep, and died in a few hours." The Civil Service Chronicle says there is a vast difference between Leverett Saltonstall and H. C. Warmouth.

THE RISE OF AN AMERICAN BARON.

The following account of Matthew S. Quay is condensed from the New York World, of February 10. He was originally a lawyer in Beaver (Pa.), but appears to have had no practice to speak of, and early turned his attention to all kinds of public offices. The account runs that in 1867, being a member of the state legislature when Simon Cameron and Governor Curtin were candidates for the United States senatorship, Quay was the Curtin candidate for speaker, and it was generally reported that he received $13,000 for his work for Curtin. In the midst of the contest Quay gave up his speakership candidacy, joined the Cameron forces against Curtin and nominated his own opponent for speaker. The charge was openly made that he received $20,000 for deserting to Cameron. When Quay entered the legislature he was poor, but soon after he began the erection of a building in Beaver costing $13,000. This, and other things, attracted attention, and the Pittsburgh Commercial commented upon Quay's malfeasance. He sued the Commercial before a Pittsburgh alderman as examining magistrate, and the World gives an amusing extract from the cross-examination of Quay, where, aided by the magistrate, he avoided answering every question which tended to elicit information as to where he got his money. After a veritable Dogberry session, the Commercial was held for the upper court and then Quay dropped the matter. Later a friend of Quay's bought the Commercial and it has ever since been an organ in whose sight Quay can do no wrong.

Quay became secretary of the commonwealth, and had now got, in certain fields, the control of the government of Pennsylvania, which, with occasional intervals, he has held ever since. He had the legislature pass a bill establishing the office of recorder for Philadelphia, and then had himself appointed to the place which paid over $40,000 a year. He lacked two votes of getting the recordership bill passed, and he secured one by a bribe of $5,000. In 1878 he removed to Philadelphia and entered upon his office.

Liking Harrisburg better, Quay in 1879 again had himself appointed secretary of the commonwealth. In that year a bill was introduced to indemnify for the damages caused by the Pittsburgh rioters. The grand jury indicted certain persons, among them Emil Petroff and William H. Kemble, for bribery in connection with this bill. Petroff was convicted and Kemble and others plead guilty. They were sentenced to the penitentiary, but somehow were extremely unconcerned. The bill which they had attempted to bribe through was Quay's pet scheme, and the excellent grounds for their unconcern soon became apparent. The board of pardons was made up of state officers, including Quay. He got them together and had them recommend the pardon of Kemble and Petroff, and then had the governor pardon them. Kemble became and is now the president of the People's Bank, Philadelphia, an institution noted as a depository of state funds, which it gets through the friendship of Quay.

Another similar instance is given in the case of A. F. Lynch, charged with forgery. Quay declared that he would secure his release if convicted. Lynch was convicted and sentenced, and then Quay, through the pardoning board, set him at liberty.

Quay had a crony in J. Blake Walters cashier of the state treasury. The account, runs that he and Walters and another state official speculated in stocks in the New York market until they had lost $260,000 of the state's money, which Walters had taken out of the treasury. There was about to be a change of treasurers, and an accounting must be had. Quay was considering ways of suicide when the matter came to the ears of Don Cameron, who, to save the reputation of the republican party, paid over $100,000 toward making up the deficit. Quay gave his notes, and one for $25,000 has not yet been paid. For a time after this transaction Quay kept in the background. Yet the astounding fact appears that in 1885 he had himself nominated for state treasurer, and he was elected. He entered upon the office in May, 1886, and held it until he caused the legislature to elect him a United States senator in 1887, which office he now holds.

The account of the World can be supplemented by saying that at the Chicago convention, which resulted in the nomination of General Harrison, Quay's first question to every proposed combination of delegates was, "How is that going to benefit me? I must have control of the federal patronage of Pennsylvania." He was not a part of the combination which finally made the nomination, but he has, nevertheless, gained his object. His control of the federal patronage of Pennsylvania has been absolute. From small beginning as a ward worker in Beaver, he has gradually enlarged his field, until he has to-day, without exaggeration, absorbed the legislative and executive powers of the state, as much as Julius Cæsar, although apparently only princeps senatus absorbed the powers of the Roman government. Quay is to-day only apparently a senator from Pennsylvania, yet he actually possesses an aggregation of federal and state governmental powers wholly at variance with republican government, and dangerous to the country, and the World is performing a public service in holding him up where the whole country can see him as he is.

ANNALS OF "PRACTICAL POLITICS."

It will be better to begin this account by describing briefly the chief characters who will figure in it.

Albert Daggett, commonly called "Al," appeared in Brooklyn about 1870. He "went into politics," and in 1875 was elected sheriff of Kings county, after an extraordinary factory to factory and house to house canvass. In 1884 and 1885 he was a member of the state senate. Between times he has been a manager of local campaigns, using money lavishly, with a reputation for using it corruptly. He was what is known as "execution proof." After the late inauguration he secured the government contract for furnishing postal cards. He had probably never seen a card factory, but he made a shift by some process of re-letting, and is now furnishing the country with postal cards under a steady charge of under size and poor quality. Being thus on his feet again, he turned to "politics" with new zest.

Michael J. Dady is also a Brooklyn politician. Of him the New York Tribune in 1882 said:

Mr. Dady is a contractor who devotes all his spare time and energy to Brooklyn ward politics. He has been a democrat and a republican by turns, and has always adapted his principles to suit the demands of the occasion. He was at one time superintendent of sewers in Brooklyn, and while holding that office was temporarily embarrassed by having five indictments found against him for felony and conspiracy. He extricated himself, however, by turning state's evidence, securing his own safety by convicting his companions in crime. He has recently returned to the allegiance of Mr. North, from whom he had separated politically while the stalwarts' chances for office were poor, and he has received his reward. He showed his appreciation of the service in which he had been appointed by driving at once to the navy yard, on Tuesday, and giving notice that a clean sweep in favor of the stalwarts was soon to be made."

Franklin Woodruff was chairman of the Kings county republican committee, and in addition held for a brief period the position of "patronage dispenser," having already, in 1889, spent three months in Washington performing the duties of that position without the title; but in a month he was forced out of his office, and when asked if he would take further part in the distribution of patronage, said, "Not much. I have all I want of such dirty business, and more, too. They gave me that office against my desire, and then put me out in a very indecent manner. I'll have no more of it."

Theodore B. Willis is naval officer at New York, having succeeded Col. Burt. He was chairman of the Kings county campaign committee in 1888, and is described as having done "Herculean work for the party." James W. Birkett is a member of the state senate from Brooklyn, and treasurer of the county committee. Greenleaf A. Smith is boss of the sixteenth ward in Brooklyn.

The object in life of these men and their associates is to be able to distribute to themselves and their friends the public offices which fall, or can be made to fall, to inhabitants of Kings county (N. Y.). In order to get and keep this power, they have to fight for places in the party machine. These places are chairmanships of county, ward or other committees, places of bosses of wards, controllers of votes, and so on.

Franklin Woodruff desired a re-election to the chairmanship of the county committee and was opposed by one Baldwin. Daggett "supported" the latter, and, votes being scarce, he cast about to meet the demand. He went to Greenleaf A. Smith, and, by a preponderance of evidence, bought nine votes of the sixteenth ward delegation, for Baldwin, paying Smith therefore $3,166.66 by giving him Senator Birkett's check on the committee funds for $416.66, and his own eleven notes, indorsed by Senator Birkett, for $2,750. The convention was held, Naval-Officer Willis and United States District Attorney Johnson being active spirits, and Woodruff was, with their help, re-elected, Willis casting the first vote for him. Afterwards the opposing factions criminated and recriminated in writing and from these sources the impartial historian may get much light.

Daggett says: "This campaign was inaugurated and carried to a successful termination by Franklin Woodruff, Theodore B. Willis, and Israel F. Fischer. It embraced bribery, forgery, the prostitution of the patronage of the government, lying, trickery, and every wicked device known or practiced by the worst specimen of pot-house politics."

He cites interviews in the public prints where these men claim to have secured places for over a dozen Baldwin delegates who afterwards voted for Woodruff. To this Naval-Officer Willis answers:

"The statement is an unvarnished lie. I never sought to bribe any delegate.

"It is true that at that time I, with Mr. Fischer, at the request of that organization, went to Washington to look after the status of certain recommendations that had been made some time previous by ward organizations; that they believed they had been overlooked in the excitement pertaining to the carrying on of the fall election; and, as a result, these omissions were corrected by the appointments being made. They were in the main minor positions, and at any other time would have attracted little if any attention."

It seems that Naval-Officer Willis, before the convention occurred, heard of the sale of votes by Smith, and with one Gilluly went to Smith's house on Sunday evening and found there Smith and his friend Buchman. Having been assured by Smith that the report was true, the talk, according to Willis, ran as follows:

" 'Well,' I said, 'what are you to receive? Are you to be given a position?' 'No,' he replied; 'they haven't given me a place, but they have given me what is better to me just now than a place. The fact is, I would rather have the "stuff," meaning cash. This was said in a very emphatic manner, and he continued, 'It will do me more good; I can utilize it if I choose, in business.'

"Silence came over the group upon this cold-blooded statement being made, and for a moment we were at a loss for words or thoughts with which to continue the conversation. While we were thus silenced Mr. Buchanan, to relieve the painfulness of the situation, wheeled around on the piano stool, opened the lid of a music-box on the piano, and started it going. As the melodious strains floated out on the air of the room, Mr. Smith said: 'Why do you want music?' 'Well,' said Buchman, 'it seemed to be getting so gloomy I thought some good music would have a cheering effect.' Then turning to me he said: 'Mr. Willis, do you play the piano?' Whereupon Smith said: 'You had better stop the music and let us talk business.' The music was stopped.

"Mr. Gilluly said: 'Has this thing gone so far that it is iron-clad?'

"Smith replied: 'I don't know as it has, but I suppose the Baldwin people consider the transaction closed. I wish that I had seen your people last night.'

"'When was the business closed?' said I. 'Yesterday,' he replied."

"'Smith, would you not rather have money for the notes than to retain them?'

"'Of course,' he answered, 'I would prefer cash to the notes.'

"Gilluly said: 'Suppose we can have the notes cashed for you; of course you will allow a good discount for so doing?'

"'Oh, yes,' said Smith, 'I will take $2,500 cash for the notes, their face value being something like $2,800. I would be willing to throw off $300 or $400 for cash.'

"I said: 'I should think $2,000 would be a very good sum for that amount of notes that might be repudiated, and so be worthless.'

"He said: 'No, $2,000 would not satisfy me. But I would split the difference and take $2,250 for the notes and the check.'

"I said: 'We are not in a position to cash notes or check.' Then Mr. Gilluly said: 'Would you object to calling at the sheriff's office to-morrow morning at 9:30?'

"He replied: 'No, I do not object. I and Buchman will come down to the sheriff's office at the time you have named.'

"We bade him good night and departed."

Greenleaf A. Smith describes this meeting as follows:

"The said Willis then opened the conversation by saying to deponent: 'Mr. Smith, I understand you are for Baldwin,' to which deponent replied: 'Yes, that's so.' Then Willis asked deponent if it was true that there were nine votes for Baldwin among deponent's friends, to which deponent said, 'Yes.' Then said Willis asked deponent how much he would take to swing those nine votes of the sixteenth ward delegation for Woodruff, to which deponent replied that he would take $3,000. Then Willis said that was too high a figure; then deponent said he would take $2,500, to which said Willis replied: 'Is that the very lowest you will take?' and deponent then asked: 'Well, what are you willing to give?' and said Gilluly then offered deponent $2,000, which sum deponent refused. That after a little lull in the conversation deponent said he would split the difference and take $2,250, to which Willis and Gilluly replied that was satisfactory, and told deponent to call at the sheriff's office next morning at 9:30 o'clock and the matter would then be arranged and he would get the money. That the said Willis then said to deponent: That in this transaction or transactions of this kind he generally had nothing to do, but he had other people behind him who would fix it up,"

There was a meeting at the sheriff's office, followed by one at night at Woodruff's house, where the notes and check were produced and handed to him. Naval-Officer Willis goes on:

"Then Mr. Woodruff said, addressing his remarks to Smith and Buchman: 'Well, gentlemen, do you say these notes and checks which you have given were given you by Mr. Daggett?'

"'Yes, sir,' they replied.

"'And for what purpose? Let us understand this thing clearly,' continued Mr. Woodruff.

"'Well,' said Smith, 'for nine votes of the sixteenth ward delegation for David A. Baldwin, for chairman of the general committee.'

"'Well, now, what is your proposition to me?' said Woodruff.

"'Well, for $2,250,' replied Smith, 'I will send the notes and check back to Daggett, and I will hold the nine votes for you, and you will find a letter in the envelope which I have prepared to-day, thinking I might have use for it, and in which I explain to Mr. Daggett why I send the check and notes back to him.'

The letter was as follows:

JANUARY 13, 1890.

Albert Daggett, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: After consultation with a number of delegates which I was to deliver, I find it impossible to do so, consequently, as I can not come up to my part of the agreement, it is not just that I should keep you to yours.

Therefore, inclosed you will find the check and notes which are returned.

Respectfully, G. A. SMITH.

Smith's version of the meeting at Woodruff's is as follows:

"Woodruff asked if deponent had been given a place by Daggett. That said Woodruff then asked deponent whether he had any objection to produce the papers he had received from Mr. Daggett and whether he had any objection to showing them to him. That deponent said he had no objection, and produced them; thereupon said Woodruff asked whether deponent would sell said papers or notes, and deponent said he would not sell them under any consideration. That said Woodruff then had said papers in his hands and pretended to examine them, during which time said Willis and Gilluly came into the room, and thereupon said Woodruff and Willis left the room for a minute, and upon their return said Woodruff opened the door and asked deponent and Buchman to step into the back room. Deponent there saw Sheriff Rhinehart, and then, in the presence of said Rhinehart, Willis, Gilluly and Buchman, the said Woodruff said that he would keep those papers, and if either Senator Daggett or Senator Birkett wanted them they would have to come for them. That deponent then and since strenuously demanded the return of said papers from said Woodruff, but said Woodruff has refused to deliver them to deponent. That among said papers so purloined from deponent by said Woodruff was a letter written by deponent addressed to Mr. Albert Daggett, but not yet sent to said Daggett or delivered to him, telling said Daggett that the deponent was unable to deliver the nine votes from the sixteenth ward to Baldwin. This letter deponent intended to send upon the strength of the cash offer made by said Willis and Gilluly for said votes as above stated, as advised by Buchman in the morning."

Having gained possession of the papers Woodruff appears to have sought interviews, as Daggett says:

He sent three messengers after Birkett, and agreed to meet him under a gas lamp on Remsen street. Birkett went there and found "Mike" Dady, who said that Woodruff's friends would not let him come for fear he would be "slugged." Dady told Birkett that the exposure would ruin the latter and drive him out of the senate, but Birkett did not beg for mercy. He did agree to go to Woodruff's house with me, and he went. The interview took place in the presence of Woodruff and Willis, but Major Hobbs and others were in the house.

Nothing came of the interview except threats and counter threats, and the rest of the time before the convention seems to have been occupied in "mutual checkmating," finally resulting in the defeat of Baldwin.

The business in which Naval-Officer Willis occupies his time can not fail to attract attention, and this will cause it to be re-called that his predecessor, Silas W. Burt, had been in the civil service twenty years, and during all that time had been known as a faithful and skilled officer, devoted to his duties. He had never given the government, or the people, or his friends any cause to feel that he had even the slightest connection with crooked people or crooked transactions, or that he in any manner used his public office or his influence as a public officer for purposes not connected with the transaction of public business, much less to force the election of a chairman of a political committee. It is inconceivable that he should have had to make a public apology like that of Willis, for connection with disgraceful and dishonest transactions. At the end of his years of service he was turned into the street, without notice or thanks, to make room for Willis, who was given the place because he had been chairman of a campaign committee and had done "Herculean work for the party" in the last presidential campaign.

There was recently held in this city a competitive examination for the vacancies in the staff of physicians for the city hospital and city dispensary. It is credited with having been the most rigid medical examination ever held here. There were five sessions extending over a period of three days. Thus the merit system makes its way.

Miss Sweet succeeded to the pension agency at Chicago upon the death of her father, General Sweet. She held the office one term. Then Mrs. Mulligan, the widow of General Mulligan, applied for the position. She had the support, says the New York Post, of nearly every influential man in Chicago of both parties and of the republican senators and representatives from Illinois, but Mr. Schurz, then secretary of the interior, insisted that a faithful and efficient officer should be retained, and Miss Sweet was re-appointed. Pension Commissioner Black attempted to remove her, but on account of the uproar she was allowed to finish her term. Then President Cleveland appointed Mrs. Mulligan. She, too, has proved faithful and efficient. A long leap downward has now been taken by President Harrison in the appointment of Col. Ike Clements, described as an active republican worker and stumper for many years in his end of the state, a busy adherent of Senator Cullom and useful to the republican state-house clique.

The house of representatives has passed a bill providing for the appointment of thirty new examiners for the pension office. The bill provides that the appointments shall be made without the intervention of the civil service commission, although the commission stood ready to furnish the men. A more vicious blow could hardly have been dealt the merit system. Mr. Bynum of this district voted for it, as did also a number of congressmen who pose as civil service reformers, and the latter have since been busy making lame excuses. The moving cause in this is the enmity of Commissioner Raum to anything which interferes with distributing places to his favorites as plums. The bill has not yet passed the senate; if it should, after the public disapproval which has been expressed, it will appear like a deliberate beginning to undermine the merit system as now established in the service. If President Harrison should sign such a bill he would become a party to a flagrant breach of faith.

The annual meeting of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association will be held at Fort Wayne in April. The proceedings will consist of an afternoon business meeting open to members of the Association, and an evening meeting open to the public. The evening meeting will be held in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the address will be by Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte, president of the Maryland Association. There will be an introductory address by Mr. Lucius B. Swift, president of the Indiana Association. The Association is much favored in securing Mr. Bonaparte. He is a strikingly brilliant and able speaker. The date will be announced in the newspapers.

The officers of the Association are as follows:

Lucius B. Swift, Indianapolis, President.
Charles R. Lane, Richmond, Secretary.
Arthur A. McKain, Indianapolis, Treasurer.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Hilton U. Brown, Indianapolis.
Noble C. Butler, Indianapolis.
Orrin B. Clark, Bloomington.
William Dudley Foulke, Richmond.
John H. Jacobs, Fort Wayne.
Charles R. Lane, Richmond.
Chester T. Lane, Fort Wayne.
Thomas F. Leech, Judson.
Charles S. Lewis, Indianapolis.
Arthur A. McKain, Indianapolis.
Albert E. Metzger, Indianapolis.
John W. Monerief, Franklin.
Rollo B. Oglesbee, Plymouth.
David A. Owen, Franklin.
Lucius B. Swift, Indianapolis.
Henry W. Williams, Fort Wayne.

The Bloomington branch of the Indiana association will hold a public meeting about March 26th, which will be addressed by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt. In both the State University and Franklin College there is a very healthy activity in favor of civil service reform, and Mr. Roosevelt's speech will not tend to diminish this.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

Services were free and base. Free service was to pay a sum of money, or serve under the lord in war. Base service was to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge or carry out his dung.—Blackstone.

—Col. Edwin A. McAlpin, who was one of the presidential electors in the last campaign, has been appointed by the President postmaster of Sing Sing, New York.

—Harris A. Barrow was, March 12, appointed deputy naval officer, by Naval Officer Willis. Barrow is secretary of the Kings county republican committee. He has always been an applicant for office.

—Collector Erhardt's deputies, John H. Gunning and Dennis Shea are active members of party committees.

—Ed Conway is a deputy in United States Marshal Dunlap's office, and, at the same time, one of the city committeemen of the seventeenth ward.

—The caucus of the republicans of Brattleboro, Vermont, to determine whether Postmaster Childs, the democratic incumbent, should be re-appointed under the management of the republican committee, opened at 3 P. M. The party workers applied the party whip. The voting was not secret, so that every one voting for the retention of the democratic postmaster ran the risk of losing favor with the machine. Colonel Taylor, the special treasury agent, was most active. The only government official in the place who did not take any part in the canvass, but who attended to the duties of the office, was Postmaster Childs.

—So it fell out that at the primary election held at Hildebrandt's hall, in Second avenue, on Tuesday evening, there was a large force of custom-house employes on hand to help Mr. Frank Raymond accomplish his patriotic designs, and not a few of these fit and faithful public servants were chosen as officers and members of the republican district committee, and as delegates to the county committee. Mr. Donald McLean, the general appraiser, was chosen president of the district committee, and Mr. Thomas W. Robertson, the chief clerk in the general appraiser's office, at a salary of $2,500, was elected secretary. Mr. McLean and Mr. Robertson were also made delegates to the county committee. Among the other delegates chosen were the following: James B. Kilsheimer, law clerk in Mr. McLean's office, salary $1,900; Peter Stieb, messenger, $340; John W. Love, opener and packer, $3.75 per day, and Henry C. Robinson, John Ellard, and Samuel Wallace, inspectors of customs. Kilsheimer and Robertson also appear as inspectors of election.

There were elected as members of the republican district committee, Daniel Leech, confidential clerk in the general appraiser's office, salary $2,200; Louis Spatz and Mortimer C. Lee, inspectors of customs; John Reilly, opener and packer, $3 per day, was made sergeant at arms.

The customs inspectors on this list are appointees of the collector and surveyor; the others were appointed by General Appraiser McLean without civil service examination. —New York Times, January 17.

—Schmidt and Nowland, custom-house deputies of this city, were delegates to the republican township convention, March 1. The former put the successful candidate in nomination.

The public will never be made to believe that the appointment of a relative is made on the ground of merit alone, uninfluenced by family views; nor can they ever see with approbation offices, the disposal of which they entrust to their presidents for public purposes, divided out as family property.—THOMAS JEFFERSON.

—Robert G. Blaine, brother of Secretary Blaine, who has for some years held the office of curator of the department of agriculture, has been appointed by Secretary Rusk superintendent of quarantine stations, under the bureau of animal industry.

—James G. Blaine, Jr., has been appointed clerk of the house committee of foreign affairs, at a salary of $2,190.

—S. V. Morris has been appointed chief clerk in the paymaster's office at St. Paul. He is a brother-in-law of the President, and at one time could have had a place in the Indianapolis post-office, but it is reported that he felt that "Ben ought to do something better for him."

—Pension Agent Ensley, of this state, has appointed his son, O. P. Ensley, chief clerk in the pension office to succeed Joseph L. Riley. The appointee has been bookkeeper for Eckert & Co., carriage manufacturers at Auburn, for several years.

—Postmaster Van Cott, of New York, has appointed his son cashier of the post-office.

—Congressman Elijah Adams Morse, who points to his middle name as evidence that he is connected with the John Adams family, has got his (Morse's) nephew appointed a page in the house of representatives.

—There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press. We have learned, too, from our own as well as the experience of other countries, that golden shackles, by whomsoever or by whatever pretense imposed, are as fatal to it as the iron bonds of despotism.

PRESIDENT WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON

—C. H. Gere, the editor of the Journal, has been appointed postmaster at Lincoln, Neb. It is now interesting to quote the following from the November (1889) issue of the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE:

In the division of the patronage last spring the Lincoln post-office fell to Congressman Connell, of Omaha. All the candidates for the place except one have cultivated his acquaintance in the hope of capturing the plum. This one, the Hon. Charles H. Gere, of the Journal, made his fight in another quarter, when it became reasonably certain that the Hon. Ed. P. Roggen stood highest in the estimation of the congressmen. Gere laid siege to Senators Manderson and Paddock and asked for a new deal. It is now currently reported that the senators have agreed to force Gere's appointment, they threatening to prevent the confirmation of any other appointment.

—Another editor has an office. It is Charles E. Fitch of the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, who was appointed by President Harrison this week to the collectorship of the twenty-eighth internal revenue district, with headquarters at Buffalo. The office is the most important and lucrative at the disposal of the administration in western New York, and a pretty fight has been waged to secure the plum.

—The State Journal, the official organ of the state and of the republican party of Wisconsin, was sold to Horace A. Taylor, of Hudson, Wis., formerly candidate for governor, then anti railroad champion in the state senate, and now holding a federal office at Washington.

—J. P. Clugage, editor of the Union, has been appointed postmaster at Sullivan, this state.

—Collector Beard has made Gen. John L. Swift, of the Boston Traveller, his third deputy.

CONGRESSMAN HITT AND "THE LEAN AND HUNGRY REPUBLICAN SHOATS."

[Compiled from the Rockford Register (Ills.), from November, 1889, to March, 1890]

I.

The Rochelle post-office fight is now on. There are some who may be inclined to ask, "Has it ever been off?" So conspicuous and hot and prolonged have been the struggles for the possession of that post-office that many people have gained the impression that the battle rages there perennially.

"There's never been but one post-office fight in this town," a Rochelle man said the other day, "and that's been going on ever since the office was first established down to the present time, without any indication of ever terminating."

The present fight is one of unusual interest, for out of it there is to be, unless all signs fail, a struggle for a position much higher than that of postmaster of Rochelle. Congressman Hitt is in danger of removal from the house of representatives as well as is Postmaster Furlong, the democratic incumbent, from the Rochelle post-office, as a result of the trouble which has arisen. Official patronage has frequently caused political death, and in this instance it has attacked Congressman Hitt. It has called forth the first outspoken opposition to his return to congress.

"I think Mr. Hitt is serving his last term," said an Ogle county republican, recently, to a Register representative. The speaker is one of the best political workers in that county, and is at present holding an official position.

"He has made himself unpopular in some places by not acting promptly enough in regard to post-office changes. I do not mean that he has not sought to have democrats ousted, but that he has apparently been afraid to select a postmaster where there have been more than one. His listlessness in pushing the claims of those seeking appointments has turned many against him."

II.

"The Rochelle post-office fight has led to war being declared on him. As usual, there were half-a-dozen candidates for postmaster. Hartong, the druggist is endorsed by Hitt. Nick Walters is the choice of the workers. The objections to Hartong are that he has resided there but a few years, that it is not known how he voted four years ago, and that he is not the choice of the people there, but seems to have gained Hitt's endorsement through the influence of Senator Farwell and Congressman Hopkins. If there is anything that will stir up Rochelle it is to have outsiders attempt to dictate who shall be postmaster. That has been done before, notably in the case of Gardner and his successor, the present incumbent, and the people there want no more of it. Walters on the other hand was born and raised there, was a soldier, is extremely popular, and has been a hard worker for the party. There has never been any question as to how he voted four years ago. A protest against Hartong's appointment was sent to Hitt. Among others who signed it were Joseph Parker, chairman of the town committee, and G. W. Clark and Colonel May, the two last named having been candidates for the office. They virtually endorsed Walters, thereby carrying out Hitt's suggestion that they get together and decide upon a man."

"Mr. Hitt acknowledged the receipt of the protest, and in a letter to Mr. Parker said he recognized the high standing and character of its twenty signers. They are, in fact, about the most politically influential twenty in Rochelle, and it is almost certain that, under conditions as they exist in that town, they will be easily able to control the next congressional caucus. It is believed yet that Hartong will be appointed, but whether he is or not the feeling is that they have had enough of Hitt. They are indisposed to accept conciliation, and inclined to spurn any advances in that direction from the congressman."

III.

"There is a sort of young men's movement over Ogle county, and the anti-Hitt twenty of Rochelle are in with the controlling ring. This made Deloss Baxter, Jr., mayor of Rochelle and state's attorney of the county; Frank Bacon mayor of Oregon, and Bishop sheriff of Ogle county. Speaking of Bishop reminds me of his candidacy for the United States marshalship, and the trouble Hitt will have in that connection. Bishop's friends say that they have no confidence in Hitt, and that while pretending to be working for the sheriff he has really done little to aid him. They propose to get back at Hitt for this. But the Bacon and Bishop crowd of Oregon and the anti-Hitt crowd of Rochelle, together with all their influential ramifications, can carry the county against Hitt. The positions that the leaders now hold show their power.

"And the feeling against Hitt is not confined to the Oregon and Rochelle elements, extensive as their influence is, but there is dissatisfaction all over the county. This is noticeable at Polo."

"There are men, and prominent ones, too, in Rochelle who say that they believe that Otis was really promised the post-office in that fight by Hitt, and that the latter broke his promise, as Otis claimed, and these are not men who felt friendly to Otis, either."

IV.

"As I look at it, Hitt is a goner. I am reliably informed that the feeling which exists in Ogle county can be found all over the district. I know that there are towns in Jo Daviess that are dead against him on account of post-office fights. There's Apple River as an example. He certainly hasn't strengthened himself in any post office appointment. Where there was a fight he has held back until both sides have got down on him, and where there was no fight neither the postmaster appointed nor his friends consider that they are indebted to Hitt. Do you suppose that Smith Atkins feels that he owes Hitt anything? Certainly not. Take it up at your city. Is Tom Lawler under any obligations to Hitt? Not much. If anything, Hitt should feel thankful to Lawler that he possessed such strength and had such a grip as to permit Hitt to escape being harrassed by any other candidate and his friends. In such cases as that of Atkins and Lawler the appointees know that they owe nothing to Hitt. They know that he was only too glad to find such smooth sailing. Now, if Hartong should be appointed he would certainly be under obligations to Hitt, as he has backed him against the wishes of the majority of the people of Rochelle."

"Outside of the post office appointments Hitt has done nothing for the seekers of patronage. While other congressmen secured places for scores of workers, Hitt has seemed to think that no one in his district wanted anything. The workers are the people, and they have decided that they want a man in congress who will do something for them. But as I said in the first place, Ogle county is the battle ground. If Hitt has a fight here he is beaten, and you can depend upon it he will have a fight. He can not be renominated."

V.

There were four candidates for the Lanark post-office in Carroll county, viz.: L. G. Burrows, editor of the Lanark Gazette; Joseph Yeager, an old settler, who made a close run for the office once before; Maj. G. A. Root; and Rev. H. D. Dennis, the latter now removed to Rockford as pastor of the Christian church, described in the Freeport Democrat as "an eloquent and polished orator, a gentleman popular with the people, and one who has rendered service to his party by making speeches during many campaigns."

The first three candidates finally combined against Mr. Dennis, and on the recommendation of Mr. Hitt the appointment was given to Maj. Root.

Again our member finds misery in umpiring the distribution of the spoils. When, after a long contest, he finally refused to recommend Mr. E. L. Otis for the Rochelle post-office, the latter charged with emphasis that a straight, unequivocal pledge was violated, and to this day there are numerous persons in Rochelle (who were not partisans of Mr. Otis) who insist that Mr. Hitt broke a plain agreement to give Otis the Rochelle office.

Now we have another like chapter, with Lanark as the scene, and Rev. H. D. Dennis, the new pastor of the Christian church of this city, framing the indictment against Mr. Hitt. The reverend gentleman was interviewed by the Freeport Democrat regarding the matter and from that paper we clip the following.

"Rev. H. D. Dennis was not in the best of humor when the newspaper man called upon him. In fact he expressed a decided contempt for Congressman Hitt, and the methods he claimed were employed in securing the appointment of Maj. Root. He said:

"All I have to say is that I have been greatly deceived by Mr. Hitt, and I have taken occasion to make him acquainted with that fact. I have no confidence whatever in him," continued the gentleman, "and I will soon give the public a statement of the case. Until I hear from him I do not desire to say much. This I will say: I was led to believe from what he had said to me that I was to receive the appointment."

"Several days ago Mr. Hitt sent me a brief of the recommendation he had sent in for Major Root, and then it was learned that the combine had certainly been made. When my friends learned the state of affairs, seventy letters from patrons of the office, many of them parties who had signed the petitions of Burrows and Yeager, were sent to the department protesting against the appointment of Major Root. But it was rushed through, and the nomination was confirmed, although I had assurance from Senator Cullom that there would be plenty of time left to enter a remonstrance before the confirmation would take place. I believe if a vote was taken I would secure a large majority of the patrons of the office over Root."

"I believe now that Mr. Hitt had all along intended to secure the appointment of Major Root. It is the worst kind of deception."

"Mr. Dennis is a gentleman who can understand the English language, and he certainly had assurance that he would be the next postmaster, or else he would have gone to Rockford long ago, where he has accepted a call to become the pastor of the Christian Church," said a gentleman who is a well-known Carroll county republican.

Among the prominent backers of Mr. Dennis are Representative Bray and ex Representative Emanuel Stover. It is said that at least Mr. Bray will make a determined fight against Hitt, and he will use his influence to secure an anti-Hitt delegation from Carroll county.

It is very evident if something is not done to satisfy Mr. Dennis, that both his voice and his vote will be against Mr. Hitt.

In a letter to one of the other candidates, December 29, Mr. Hitt makes the following statement, which, it will be observed, raises the issue of veracity between him and Mr. Dennis:

"I have never yet in contested cases thought it proper to express even an opinion before the time of action, as it is to be presumed always that the whole case, as then presented, will be considered and passed upon fairly. I think you know me well enough to believe that I will take great pains to do the fairest thing possible in the case, and what I believe will be most satisfactory to the republicans of Lanark."

VI.

Mr. Hitt has been acting as referee in an interesting post-office fight in Apple River, Jo Daviess county. The strife between the two candidates, Messrs. Serviss and Lamont, has raged with such bitterness that the department has decided not to appoint either, and it is said that Mr. Hitt has been directed to present a new name. This will naturally earn for him the enmity of the friends of both, who probably include the total population.

VII.

The Oregon Reporter renews its vows of allegiance to Mr. Hitt, declaring that, although the latter made a blunder in appointing Frank Tice to the Mt. Morris post-office, it will forgive him this time and hope for better things in the future. It insists, however, that Mr. Tice should divert the emoluments of the office to some "young republican worker," to be appointed as deputy. Mr. Tice, as a member of the "old political ring," is not entitled to any share in the spoils at this time, according to the Reporter.

The Oregon Independent takes its contemporary to task, as follows:

"Why should the Reporter censure Hon. R. R. Hitt for appointing Hon. Frank Tice to be postmaster at this place? Has he not appointed his friend Jewett in Oregon? Is not Mr. Jewett the choice of the 'boss delegate,' the 'boss of boss' of the immortal sixteen who resurrected Mr. Hitt to the position he now holds? Then, if consistent, why does the Reporter kick, unless to be inconsistent?"

VIII.

An Ogle county politician, who seems to have been sent to Washington to ascertain the cause of the delay in the expected firing of the democratic incumbent from the Rochelle post-office, has made his report in the form of a letter, which appears in the last issue of the Rochelle Herald. He states that on his arrival in Washington he called on Mr. Hitt, and considerations which call for a change in the Rochelle office were presented. Thereupon Hitt called upon Clarkson and received the assurance that he was ready and anxious to dispose of the Rochelle appointment at once. Mr. Wanamaker was then seen, and gave assurance that his views were in accord with those of Clarkson. The story of Hitt's further efforts and encounter with a rank snub from the President is told in the Herald letter, from which we quote:

"Elated by such frank confessions, Mr. Hitt then called upon the President and presented the case. He called Mr. Harrison's attention to the majorities from the northern districts that saved the state of Illinois from democratic rulers. He called his attention to the indifference expressed by leading republican papers of the district, and to the opinions of the republican war horses who openly acknowledged danger, to which Mr. Harrison made this reply: 'All this does not affect me one particle.' You can imagine the feelings of Mr. Hitt at the outcome of this interview. The interests of the republicans of Rochelle does not affect Mr. Harrison 'one particle.' The interests of the party in this district are of no concern to him. The election of democrats is nothing to him. And this is the man we worked to elect President. I ask the voters of Rochelle, why then blame Mr. Hitt? He has taken this particular case of Rochelle to the highest official, and has been promptly sat down upon. No explanation even is offered why the affairs of Northern Illinois are no of interest to the President. At the particular interview above referred to Mr. Hitt did not champion the cause of any particular candidate; he urged the appointment of a republican postmaster—a choice from the list of applicants. 'No, sir,' was the reply, 'your interests do not affect me one particle.'"

The editor of the Herald becomes philosophic under the visitations of disappointment and despair. When he advocated the election of General Harrison he supposed that the old Jacksonian doctrine that the spoils belong to the victors would govern the administration, in spite of the pledges of platform and candidates against partisan changes or removals not dictated by the interests of the public service. He finds now that he was the victim of a huge confidence scheme. The mingling of sorrow, disappointment and resignation is seen in the following editorial expression clipped from the Herald:

"It seems that the republicans fished out a mug-wump when they selected Benjamin Harrison for president. Cleveland gave us a good democratic postmaster, and we have made up our mind that we can stand him because we have got to during Harrison's administration, as his term does not expire until 1892."

IX.

[Extract from a letter to the Rochelle Herald.]

OREGON, ILL., March 3, 1890.—Now friend Morris, I know, and you know, there is a deep feeling of hostility to the actions of our congressman regarding the way he has acted towards your people regarding your post-office matter. Not alone at your place but at many other points throughout the district; and not post-offices alone, but I speak of them as that being your official trouble. I am credibly informed, and know there is no mistake about it, Mr. Hitt told some of your candidates he would require no petitions, that petitions were of little value, that anybody would sign a petition, etc.; saying to them, I will call on your people, take the case up, and decide on the party for the office. They all tell me he called, but whenever post office was mentioned he was "off," and his only reply was, Mr. So So has the best petition. The old party workers, those to whom in a great measure he owed his promotion, scarcely received a passing notice; and when their names were suggested by their friends, the reply was, "Can't recommend, too many down on them; can't do it, Mr. ———." Now I would simply ask, where can you find an active political worker anywhere who has not political enemies? A man without enemies generally amounts to but little.

I am informed Mr. Hitt told the people of Rochelle they must decide upon one man, or a change could not be made. I understand all the old workers in the party got together and recommended a party, nearly all the aspirants signed the recommend. He also said to the people of Rochelle months ago, "Agree on a man and he will be appointed in ten days."

Now, Morris, from all I can learn in Ogle, Jo Daviess, Carroll and Stephenson counties, there is something rotten in Denmark. If our congressman has no higher regard for the interests of his district than laboring to repair fences at the expense of his friends, those who have labored for years, is it not time to call a halt? As for Benjamin, he is a played-out nag already. In 1892 he will be consigned to a political grave from which there will be no resurrection.

What's the matter with Charley Works? He's all right. REPUBLICAN.

X.

The Rochelle Herald has come to the unwilling conclusion that there is a determined opposition to Mr. Hitt in Ogle county, and it undertakes to find its origin, and traces it to dissatisfaction with his course regarding "spoils" distribution. It says he has discharged his duties in congress with fidelity to the district and to the republican party. The Herald thus continues:

"If this question was put to those now in opposition to name their grievance we believe there could not a single person be found but that would say he discharged every duty. Office is the one great stumbling block which he has now to overcome, and that is making rapid strides to defeat him. Were we convinced that he is disregarding the wishes of his constituents then we should be ready to oppose his re-nomination as are the ones who are now out on the war path. We believe that he is trying to suit all aspirants for office in this district, but when we take into consideration the numerous candidates out for certain offices in the district, and many for the same office in every village, we discover how difficult is the attempt to please all. If he has promised any man that he would stand by him until he secured or lost the position, he does wrong in deserting him. Among the many conversations we have had with him we have never discovered him acknowledging any promises further than we would see that they had a fair show at Washington. If we did not admire his faithful care of the republican party of this district in congress, then we might be found among the kickers."

XI.

The Chicago News correspondent discusses the appointment affairs of this section as follows:

"Both the senators and nearly all the representatives from northern Illinois have recommended James I. Neff of Freeport for assistant treasurer, but he is not indorsed by Representative Hitt, in whose district he lives. The latter made a vigorous effort to secure the appointment of Mr. Avery, of Galena, as United States marshal, and is committed to him for any office that he can secure. While Mr. Avery is not an active candidate for the sub-treasurership, still he would accept the appointment, and as long as he stands in that position, with Mr. Hitt pledged to support him, the latter can not say anything in favor of Neff. The case is thus complicated, and there is no telling what the President will do."

XII.

There bids fair to be a bitter factional fight in the sixth district when the republicans are called upon to nominate some one to succeed Robert R. Hitt as their representative in congress. Mr. Hitt will have to answer to the charge of being an unsuccessful, untrustworthy distributor of political spoils. Unfulfillment of promises and bad faith in general are charged against him. The appointment of James G. Blaine, Jr., to the position of secretary of the foreign affairs committee, which was made by Mr. Hitt, was particularly unpopular in the district. Mr. Hitt's constituents argue that he should have given the plum to some capable young man of his own district.—Galena Dispatch to Chicago News.

XIII.

There has always been a latent hostility to Mr. Hitt down there and his course as an almoner of official spoils has not mollified the old opposition. He has in fact been peculiarly unfortunate in his relations with office-seekers. The necessity of disappointing some aspirant has not been the sum of his troubles. The issue of veracity regarding promises arose, and the tenacity with which unfavorable opinions regarding his course in such matters are held was illustrated a few days ago, when, in conversation with a county official, he asserted to the writer his emphatic belief that "Hitt did give Otis a fair and square promise of the Rochelle postoffice." Mr. Hitt positively denies that he made such promise to Mr. Otis, but, unfortunately for him, he has not been able to extinguish the belief that he did, and many Rochelle residents, not particularly friendly to Otis, take the latter's side in the veracity issue against Mr. Hitt.

There are noticeable elements of opposition to that gentleman in nearly every county of the district. The Galena Gazette, edited by J. B. Brown (Gen. Grant's old friend) is decidedly hostile. There have been unfavorable comments, by the editors of such republican papers as the Oregon Reporter, Polo Press, Rochelle Herald, and Rochelle Register, all published in Ogle county.—Rockford Register.

The Civil Service Chronicle desires facts regarding the so called "resignations" of fourth-class postmasters; who has requested these resignations, by what agencies have these been effected, and in what instances have resignations been practically forced to prevent loss on the post-office furniture by disposing of it to the would-be successor in office.

The Civil Service Chronicle desires information of all cases where the man at the top of the eligible lists for positions in the railway mail service has not been chosen.

The Civil Service Chronicle will be glad to receive information upon the following points:

The name of any newspaper editor or owner who has or may receive a federal appointment, and the name of the office.

The names of all members of political committees or delegates given a federal appointment, and the name of the office.

The names of all federal office-holders who are members of any political committee or who act as delegates, naming the committee or the convention.

Statements regarding any political activity in primaries, conventions or political work done for any nominees by federal office-holders.

OWING to pressing professional engagements of Mr. Bonaparte it is still impossible to fix the exact date of the annual meeting of the State Civil Service Reform Association, to be held in Fort Wayne.

THE letter of Mr. Henry C. Lea to the President is but the outward expression of a widespread indignation which among a large class has been smouldering and gathering force. The matter is not, as the Indianapolis Journal seems to think, an attempt to hold the President for the election of Quay to the senate or for his getting the Pennsylvania republican machine under his absolute control. The point is that the President is giving the distribution of the federal offices of that state into the hands of a man who stands silent when charged by a financially responsible newspaper with being a briber, a political corruptionist of the worst kind, and a colossal thief. The President is thus enabling Quay to distribute among his friends some millions a year and thus perpetuate his own power.

AND when Quay says that the President can not avoid complying with his wishes, and when the President says, as he does according to the Philadelphia Inquirer, that on account of his obligations to Quay he can not decline any request the latter may make, both of them put into words the President's humiliating position.

THERE is a striking analogy between this case and President Cleveland's subjection to Gorman. The latter was also the ruling spirit of his national party committee which managed the successful campaign. President Cleveland was also warned against Gorman by democrats whose word was not to be disputed. Yet to the end of that presidential term Gorman, by having control of the federal offices, practically deprived Maryland of free government. This was one of the potent influences which led to the defeat of Mr. Cleveland. Quay's nearly absolute influence is shown by the fact that only two Philadelphia daily papers, the Times and the Telegraph, dare publish Mr. Lea's letter. If continued in control of the offices, his hand will for some time be higher than ever. Gorman's was to the very end, and even during the elections after Mr. Cleveland's renomination. Deprived of his patronage after he has nearly made Maryland a republican state, Gorman can now probably be driven out of public life, and the people of Pennsylvania will sooner or later bring down Quay. The President by continuing him in control of the patronage may delay the day and they may both fall together.

THE records of the charity organization society of this city cover about 8,000 cases of individuals who have applied to the township embracing Indianapolis for relief. Most of these still apply from time to time. This great number have been traced back by the society from three to five generations, and with exceptions have been found to come from four hundred and thirty-seven original families. They monopolize the crime and the pauperism of this city, and their wits are devoted to getting supplies from the township. The necessity at once becomes apparent of having the township trustee's office equipped with clerks who know these people personally, and the office now has one such man in Mr. Frank Wright. He has for years visited them, talked with them, made up records of them and traced their lineage and migrations until he has obtained a mass of information that is priceless to the people of this city. Such a man is indispensable; his information can not be transmitted to another, nor could another acquire it in years, and without heavy cost to the people. This is a matter far above a party, and notwithstanding that there are a hundred applicants for the place, to remove Mr. Wright would not only do him an injustice but would inflict upon the interests of the city a severe injury. All but a few politicians will commend the new trustee, Mr. Gold, in refusing to take such a step.

WE reprint, from the Atlantic Monthly, part of Mr. Morton's article, "Some Popular Objections to Civil Service Reform." This is, without exception, the ablest article upon the merit system which has lately appeared; and this is true both in style and matter. In Indiana, especially, it will be given added attention, and have added weight from the fact that it comes from a son of the late Governor Morton. To destroy, in this country, the idea and practice of using its hundreds of thousands of offices for private or party benefit is a work for which no man is too strong. It is peculiarly fitting that as the father stepped into the breach in Indiana in the greatest crisis of his day, the son should now attack the present greatest evil of American civil government.

MR. DORMAN B. EATON should reprint in pamphlet form his recent valuable letters in answer to Senator Hoar's assertion that collectorships are political offices; the letter to Senator Allison showing the insidious attack upon the merit system by the vote to exclude certain pension examiners from the test of competition; and the letter showing the effect of civil service reform in Australia. They are just what is needed for distribution, and they should be put into those sections where little reform literature has been distributed. It is a great mistake to relax the efforts to arouse an aggressive feeling for civil service reform in the states where there has been no organization. Why do not civil service reformers seize upon Iowa as the tariff reformers have done?

As an illustration of how widely distributed is the wish to see the spoils system ended, we are permitted to quote from a recent letter of Rev. W. H. Kaufman, of Heber, Utah, to the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE: "I am constantly surprised at the enthusiasm of the people for this reform and that they are so responsive to appeals for independence of partisanship in the civil service appointments." And this paper has twenty-one subscribers in Utah.

THE TOWNSHIP ELECTIONS.

THE recent township elections seem to have been a surprise to the republicans, especially in Indiana. If ordinary prudence guided an administration the total defeat which followed the open and unstinted use of the federal patronage to secure the election of Mahone in Virginia, would have taught its lesson. The administration, however, kept steadily on in the impossible endeavor to strengthen its party by distributing spoil. In Indiana it could not possibly have made the distribution any faster, and before the election the clean sweep was practically complete, only scattering places being left. This distribution also has been preeminently in the hands of the men who ought to know where to place the offices to do the party the most good. The President has used his extensive personal knowledge of the workers. The three republican congressmen have devoted themselves to the task. Finally the chairman of the republican state committee, who of all men ought to know how to strengthen his party with patronage, has, in the distribution of the bulk of the minor offices, been practically dictator. Chairman Huston attended to this until he was succeeded by Chairman Michener, and the absolute power of the latter can not be better illustrated than by the following correspondence:

COLUMBUS, IND., April 1, 1889.

First Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR—I hope you will not overlook what I wrote you concerning the postmaster at Freedom, Owen county, Indiana. He is a one-legged soldier who has done his duty in the office, and I hope you will not remove him. Respectfully yours,

GEO. W. COOPER, M. C.,
Fifth Indiana District.

COLUMBUS, IND., May 16, 1889.

Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR—I wrote you some time ago asking that the present incumbent of the post-office at Freedom, Ind., be not removed, giving as a reason that he was a crippled soldier, and that he was doing good service to the public. While the heads of our boys have been rolling off all around, I believe he still holds his place, and this encourages me to present one more case equally as meritorious. Mr. L. H. Gamble, at Brooklyn, Ind., is a soldier. He served honorably through the war. Two of his brothers gave up their lives in the service—one at Brownsville, Tex., and the other at New Orleans, La. Mr. G.'s case is a hard one. He came out of the service without a scratch, but had the misfortune to lose his arm by an accident since, but he draws no pension.

Will you not please make an exception in this case? I am sure that while it may be a disappointment to the applicant for the place, the patrons of the office, without regard to politics, will fully sustain you.

Please do not forget or overlook what I wrote you regarding Mr. W. J. Suffall at Freedom.

Respectfully, GEORGE W. COOPER, M. C.

COLUMBUS, IND., May 16, 1889.

Hon. H. C. Duncan, Bloomington, Ind.:

DEAR CLAY—There are two postmasters in this district who ought not to be removed, viz.: W. J. Suffall at Freedom, Owen county, and L. H. Gamble at Brooklyn, Morgan county. They are both crippled soldiers. Mr. Suffall lost a leg, Mr. Gamble an arm. Mr. Gamble's case is particularly hard. He served through the war. Two of his brothers lost their lives—one at New Orleans, La., the other at Brownsville, Tex.; but Mr. Gamble lost his arm by an accident since he came out of the service, and so gets no pension. Now, Clay, I understand the applicants for both these places were never in the army. I have written the postmaster-general asking that these gentlemen be allowed to retain their places. Will you not aid me? I am informed that a word from you will settle the matter. I hope you will allow these poor fellows to hold their places. No complaint is made of their services. Please write the department and let me know what you have done.

Fraternally yours, GEORGE W. COOPER.

Hon. John Wanamaker:

SIR—Mr. Cooper is the present representative in congress from this district, and my opponent. I would take it a favor that this matter be carefully examined before removals are made at the places named. I know nothing personally of the men, and know that Mr. Cooper would not misrepresent matters. We made a strong fight in Indiana on the soldier question, and we can not afford to wage war against the sons of the democratic household of faith.

Yours, etc.,

H. C. DUNCAN.

Bloomington, Ind., May 27, '89.

OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL, }
INDIANAPOLIS, IND. }

W. W. Hart, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR HART—We have decided that Frank Watts should be appointed postmaster at Freedom, Owen county.

Please have it attended to at once. You may put this on file as a recommendation.

Yours truly,

L. T. MICHENER.

The change was made at Michener's direction. The new offices created for the census were filled as far as possible and always by republican wheel-horses. Numerous office-holders, including Treasurer Huston and Third Auditor Hart, came from Washington to give the party the added strength of officialism. The usual influence of the Indiana republican club of office-holders at Washington was at work. The Farwell club had run its anti-civil service reform career. Congressman Cheadle had introduced a bill to repeal the civil service law, and when unanimous consent was asked to amend a bill so as to have the medical examiners therein provided for appointed under the civil service law, as such examiners now are, Cheadle promptly objected. Congressman Browne had declared himself opposed to the civil service law. In short, not only the theory but the practice of the spoils system had with the republican party full swing, except in the classified service, which in Indiana embraces comparatively few places. And yet the republicans have suffered a decisive defeat. Never in Indiana has that party been in a more complete state of collapse.

It is indeed fortunate that such unbridled profession and practice of the spoils system can be followed by such party weakness. That it powerfully contributed to this weakness there is no question. The soldiers were in a state of open exasperation because more was not given to them. All the workers except those who got places struck for the non-payment of wages. Thousands of citizens looked at the appointments of the Ransdells, the McFarlanes and the Bagbys and observed the administration under the control of Quayism and Plattism, and did not vote or voted with the democrats. Happily for such strikers and for such lethargy there is no remedy; it is impossible for a president to divide the federal offices as spoil and produce any other result.

AN OPEN LETTER TO PRESIDENT HARRISON.

To the President:

SIR—No graver scandal has darkened our political history than the charges brought against Senator Quay by the New York World in its issues of February 10th and March 3d. It would be useless here to recapitulate them further than to say that, with full details of names, and places, and dates, the World asserts him to be a man whose political career has been a succession of flagrantly dishonest acts, including the temporary abstraction from the state treasury of $260,000 in one instance, and of $400,000 in another.

No such accusations, involving iniquity so varied and so continuous, and supported by such an array of minute detail, have ever before, I believe, been brought against a politician so conspicuous. If they are true, Senator Quay ought to be in the penitentiary. If they are false, he is a cruelly libelled man; his accuser is a journal of the highest financial standing, and no jury of his countrymen would refuse him exemplary damages that would put him beyond all future reach of want. Vindication and profit both await him as an incentive to prove his innocence, but, although two months have elapsed since the gravest of the charges were made public, neither solicitude for his character nor desire of gain has prompted him to break silence. It is his own fault if the public should regard him as acquiescing in the truth of the charges.

It is true that the crimes alleged against Senator Quay are connected only with his career as a Pennsylvania boss, but your close connection with him has rendered the scandal national. You were duly warned in advance from a friendly source of the dangers of such an alliance, yet by accepting his man, Mr. Wanamaker, as a member of your cabinet, you assumed responsibility for both of them. In pursuance of this alliance, you have enlarged Mr. Quay's importance by virtually giving him control of the federal patronage in Pennsylvania, thus rendering him the dictator of the republican party in the state. He boasted of your subserviency to him when, in explaining his triumph over Representative Dalzell in the struggle for the Pittsburgh post-office, he publicly said that "the President, though very anxious to gratify Mr. Dalzell, for whom he had a high esteem, could not, under all the circumstances, well avoid complying with my wishes." Even Mr. Quay's remarkable silence under the accusations of the World, does not seem to have lessened his influence over you. He signalized his return from Florida a week or two since by capturing the Pittsburgh surveyorship of customs against candidates urged respectively by Secretary Blaine and Representative Dalzell. Indeed, his power would seem to be as great in Washington as in this state, for the party organs now tell us that he has been endeavoring to buy off a superfluous candidate for the governorship with an assistant secretaryship of war. In thus entering into a political partnership with Mr. Quay, you must share the losses as well as the gains of the venture. It is not Pennsylvania alone, nor even the republican party only, that has a right to protest; every citizen of the land must feel humiliation at the smirch thus inflicted on the chief magistracy of the nation.

As a republican by conviction, ardently desiring the success of the party so long as it deserves success, let me request you, Mr. President, to take a calm survey of the situation and render to yourself an account of your stewardship. Thirteen months ago you entered upon the duties of the highest office which the world has to bestow; your party was supreme in the control of both houses of congress and of the executive; everything promised a prosperous and useful administration, in which you, by simply adhering to the pledges under which you were elected, might earn another term from the confidence and gratitude of the people. The only cloud upon the political horizon was your acceptance of a postmaster-general at Mr. Quay's dictation, ostensibly as a reward for certain services performed during the canvass. That cloud, then no larger than a man's hand, has spread till it covers the firmament. Look back now and reflect upon your work. You have sedulously devoted yourself to the distribution of "patronage;" you have turned out nearly forty thousand Democratic office-holders, and in this ignoble business you have filled vacancies thus made by giving "recognition" to the worst elements in the party. You have thus degraded it to the lowest level, till it no longer deserves or enjoys the public confidence, and its interest, as well as that of the nation, demands its purification by defeat. You have earned for it the denunciation of the Hebrew prophet:

"The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire, and the prophets thereof divine for money; yet will they lean upon the Lord and say, Is not the Lord among us? none evil can come among us. Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps."

But it needs no prophet to foretell the result. The elections of last November were a warning that the people would not tolerate your methods. You have refused to heed the lesson, and the elections of next November will emphasize it. The narrow republican majority in the lower house will be swept away, and your path for the latter half of your administration will be a path of thorns. You have rewarded the magnificent majority of 80,000 given to you by Pennsylvania by riveting upon her the chains of Quayism; you need not wonder that disaffection is spreading rapidly throughout her borders in a manner that may render even her allegiance doubtful. The outlook for 1892 is even darker. Were the presidential election to take place tomorrow, there could scarce be doubt of democratic success. Let me counsel you, Mr. President, as a friend, to reflect that this has been your work in one short year of misused power.

If this retrospection should bring with it repentance and amendment, you still have before you three years which may be fruitful for good. Bear in mind that "faithful are the wounds of a friend, but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful." Discard the advisers who are luring you to your downfall. Recognize that the truest political expediency lies in the application of conscience to public affairs, and that you can serve your party best by stimulating the nobler aspirations of the nation rather than by pandering to the baser appetites of spoilsmen. Cease to expect to gather figs of thistles, or to touch pitch without defilement. Apply to your public duties the high standard of morality to which you adhere in your private life. Remember that evil can give birth only to evil, and that you, as chief magistrate of sixty-five millions of free-men, have on your soul a charge for which you must reckon to posterity and to God.

I am, Mr. President, your obedient servant,

HENRY CHARLES LEA.

Philadelphia, April 8, 1890.

CONGRESS AND PATRONAGE.

To the Executive Committee of the National Civil Service Reform League:

GENTLEMEN—Your special committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the federal civil service and the operation of the reform law would respectfully report—

That on the 15th of February, 1890, your committee had its first meeting, in Philadelphia, and outlined its general plan of work.

Among other things it was determined to make inquiries, at as early a period as possible, in regard to the system of congressional patronage, and ascertain to what extent appointments to office were still controlled by members of congress, and to what degree this patronage interfered with their proper legislative duties. In regard to this branch of their investigation your committee is now prepared to make its report.

The chairman of your committee, on its behalf, addressed to each of the republican members of the house of representatives the following questions:

How many offices are there in your district or elsewhere where the appointments depend upon you?

How many applications for office have you received during the past year?

What is the average amount of correspondence which each of these applications requires on your part?

What amount of time, either your own or of your secretary or clerk, is required, as nearly as you can judge, for conducting this correspondence and for attending to appointments?

Have any elections been held in your district to determine who the appointees should be; and if so, in how many instances, where, and for what positions?

To these questions a number of responses were returned with the statement that the writers had not the data at hand to answer these inquiries, but some twenty-four answers were received, giving more or less completely the information asked for. A summary of these answers is as follows: To the question "How many offices are there in your district or elsewhere where the appointments depend upon you?" the following answers have been received:

1. About one hundred and twenty post-offices in the district I represent.

2. One hundred and seventy-nine post-offices and about thirty other places; also one hundred and eight census enumerators, with an endless number of applicants.

3. About one hundred and forty.

4. About two hundred.

5. A hundred and twenty.

6. A hundred and forty-six post-offices in the district, and under the rule I am expected to recommend a postmaster for each.

7. The federal offices are deemed of so much importance that the senator and all the party representatives from the state insist upon making recommendations for appointments, and no appointment, therefore, depends upon me alone.

8. Two hundred post-offices and probably three or four others.

9. No answer.

10. There are two hundred and fifty offices in my district where the appointments depend upon myself.

11. Nearly fifty.

12. About one hundred and twenty.

13. Probably three hundred or three hundred and fifty.

14. About six hundred and fifty, in which the two senators often unite.

15. No answer.

16. About eight hundred.

17. Six hundred.

18. None but the post offices; but a very general impression prevails that I can control others, which calls for many letters of reply.

19. About two hundred and fifty.

20. Can not say.

21. Not given.

22. Perhaps one hundred and twenty-five.

23. Ten or fifteen fourth-class postmasters.

24. Perhaps two hundred.

An average of the above (omitting numbers 7, 9, 15, 18, 20 and 21, in which numerical estimates are not given) would give about two hundred and fifty appointments depending upon each of these congressmen.

To the question "How many applications for office have you received during the past year?" the following answers were received:

1. I can not give you the exact number, but I am quite sure the number of written applications must be at least eight or nine thousand, to say nothing of the verbal requests.

2. About three hundred, in addition to home post-offices; five thousand applications for them.

3. About five hundred.

4. About one thousand.

5. Sixty.

6. There are one hundred and forty-six post-offices in my district, and under the rule I am expected to recommend a postmaster for each. I think there has been, so far at least, on an average, five applicants for each vacancy. During the first year of the present administration I was called on to recommend for office to the appointing power two hundred and forty-six applicants, exclusive of applicants for the position of postmaster. (This would make nine hundred and seventy-six in all.)

7. About two thousand.

8. Not far from one thousand.

9. Can not tell; hundreds, if not thousands.

10. There have been about fifteen hundred applications for office received by me during the past year. In addition to the applications of those who want office for themselves, numerous letters and petitions are received, in nearly every case urging claims of those who are applicants.

11. About four hundred.

12. Impossible to tell; hundreds, perhaps one thousand.

13. I think I can modestly say two thousand. Where there are ten candidates for the office, each man thinks he is the one most entitled to it; and it is generally quite easy to disappoint nine of them.

14. Approximately, about five hundred.

15. The number of applications for office during the past year is something over eight hundred, as appears on my docket, yet there are only eleven fourth-class post-offices in the district and ten presidential offices. The applications for these have been practically nothing. The great mass of applications are for positions in the unclassified service in the custom house, and every branch of the government service, and in the navy yard.

16. About two thousand; not less.

17. About two thousand.

18. About two hundred.

19. Could not guess; hundreds.

20. Something less than a million.

21. It is impossible for me to say how many applications for office I have received during the past twelve months, but they have been almost innumerable, and it has been impossible for me to favor a tenth of those who desire positions, and the most of the applicants I know to be worthy and deserving men, whom I would be glad to aid if it were possible for me to do so.

Taking an average of the above (omitting numbers 9, 19, 20 and 21), the number of applications made was something over 1700 to each member.

To the interrogatories "What is the average amount of correspondence which each of these applications requires on your part, and what amount of time, either of your own or of your secretary or clerk, is required, as nearly as you can judge, for conducting this correspondence and for attending to appointments?" your committee have received the following answers:

1. During the past year more than three-quarters of my time in the day was given to attending to appointments, and late every evening (except Sunday) was given to my correspondence, with the valuable assistance of a stenographer, and even then I found it impossible to answer more than half or two-thirds of my correspondence.

2. The amount of time is about one full day in each week.

3. About half the time of one man.

4. The probable average amount of correspondence is about five letters for each application, requiring about one-fourth, possibly one-third, of my entire time.

5. The average amount of correspondence is about six letters each; about two hours' time.

6. I think that attention to the demands of those applications consumes one-fourth of my working time.

7. About half my time. Perhaps two letters each.

8. Could give no light upon it; but quite a burdensome correspondence.

9. One-third of time of self and clerk. Several letters each; some of them fifty or a hundred.

10. These applications will require, on an average, two letters each. I should think that at least two hours a day have been required for conducting this correspondence and attending to appointments.

11. Nearly two hours daily during last summer; not so much now, and I can not easily give an estimate.

12. The average amount of correspondence which each of these applications requires is rarely less than two or three, sometimes ten. I have had cases of twenty. The amount of time required is more than any branch of my public duties since November, 1888.

13. Probably five letters each, all around. All the time I could get.

14. About four letters to each applicant. About one-tenth of my time.

15. A low estimate of the average amount of correspondence which each of these applications requires on my part would be five in each case, or between four and five thousand letters in all. If it were not for the distribution of these offices, it would be easy for me to conduct my official correspondence personally, but, as it is, a secretary is required, and the burden of the office greatly increased.

16. Eight to fifteen letters each; eight to ten hours per day.

17. An average of three letters each; one-half of my time.

18. About two letters each; about one hour each day.

19. About a dozen letters, on the average, to each; half of my time.

20. One prolonged and continuous correspondence; the constant and entire time of both myself and secretary would not suffice.

21. I think that during the last twelve months the lives of most of the republican members of congress have been made miserable by the post-office controversies in their congressional districts.

22. Each place filled on my recommendation has required probably twelve letters written.

23. Do not know what amount of time, but a good part of it.

It is not an extravagant estimate from the above answers to say that more than one-third of the entire time of these congressmen (time which should properly be devoted to their legislative duties) is consumed in the distribution of offices.

The condition of affairs in this respect does not seem to have changed very greatly from the time when General Garfield, in his speech at Williams College, said: "One-third of the working hours of senators and representatives is hardly sufficient to meet the demands made upon them in reference to appointments for office." The number of places withdrawn from congressional patronage by the civil service law has been about 29,000, but this has been counterbalanced by the growth of the service.

Your committee then proceeded to inquire more particularly into the extent to which this patronage interfered with the proper performance of the legislative duties which the constitution imposes upon members of congress. Your committee examined the records of congress, for the purpose of determining the relative number of measures which remain unconsidered at the end of each session from lack of time to give them proper consideration. Taking the last congress as an illustration, your committee found that the number of bills and joint resolutions introduced was 17,078, to wit: House bills, 12,664; resolutions, 269; senate bills, 4,000; resolutions, 145. Out of this total number of 17,078, your committee ascertained that the bills and resolutions passed were only 1,824, or a little more than ten per cent., leaving a balance of 15,254 measures introduced but not adopted. This, however, does not furnish a just criterion of the measures which congress was unable to consider, since some of these measures were passed upon adversely. Your committee, therefore, examined the indexes of the last congressional record of both sessions, and found that, out of the 17,078 measures introduced, more than 11,000 were referred to committees and never reported by the committees to which they were referred; that about 1,400 were introduced and reported by these committees, but never reached final consideration in the respective houses in which they were originally introduced; that something more than 1,000 passed the house in which they were introduced, but never reached final consideration in the other branch of congress, while less than 3,500 were finally acted upon. Your committee included in the measures finally disposed of all bills and resolutions approved by the President; all which became laws without his approval; all which passed both houses and were examined and approved, even though they finally failed to become laws through lack of proper submission to the executive; all measures which were vetoed by the President, whether afterwards considered by congress or not; and all measures which were withdrawn, laid on the table, or indefinitely postponed in either house. It is evident, however, that many of these measures, including bills which were laid on the table (from which they might be taken at any time), were not intended to be definitely rejected.

Why is it that the committees to which this proposed legislation is referred have no time to sort out the good from the bad; no time to consider more than a small fraction of the measures submitted to them? Why is it that so many bills reported fail to receive consideration in the respective houses of congress? Why is it that so many measures which finally pass are ill-digested and carelessly drawn and require expensive litigation to construe their meaning? It is not hard to find an answer when it is known that more than one third of the working hours of the members belonging to the party which is responsible for the legislation of the country is devoted to business entirely foreign to that legislation.

The system itself is inherently vicious. The union in a single person or body of men of different functions of government, which are distinct in their nature, is evidence of a low form of political organism. In a large community with complicated interests it is only where these functions are definitely distributed that we can expect to see them properly performed. It is just as inconsistent with good government for the legislators to appoint the officers who are to administer the laws as it would be for a judge to undertake personally the execution of the process which he issues, or as it would be for these lawmakers themselves to act as judges in administering and applying their own laws. It is only where the legislative, executive and judicial departments are kept distinct that we can expect efficient work from any of them. An encroachment by any of these departments upon the duties of the other is a manifest usurpation. The federal constitution has carefully distributed to each its own powers and duties. The duty of congress is to make the laws. The senate, as the adviser of the president, has a qualified right to pass upon his nominations for certain offices; but to the house of representatives no such right is given in any form, and yet we find members of both houses, in violation of the purposes of the constitution, controlling appointments in every branch of the public service, and demanding that their constituents and political friends shall receive situations, often as a reward for personal and political favors, and not on account of any qualifications for public office. So it has been common to find these appointees active in conventions, caucuses and primaries, working for the interests of the particular congressman to whom they owe their appointments, and often without regard for the public welfare; and it is for this work, or with the hope of securing it in the future, that the appointment is often given as the reward or the incentive.

It is sometimes urged against civil service reform that the head of each department and bureau ought to have the selection of his own subordinates; but under the patronage system he has no such selection at all. The men selected are chosen, not on account of the knowledge of their fitness possessed by the appointing officer, but because they are recommended by a certain representative or senator. The head of the department or bureau feels little responsibility for their acts. It often happens that he is not at liberty to discharge an inefficient man, lest he may offend the congressman whose influence secured the appointment of that man. The congressman, on the other hand, does not feel the responsibility for these appointments, for he is not nominally nor legally the appointing officer. In many cases it is not known on whose recommendation the appointment is made. This system "invades the independence of the executive and makes him less responsible for the character of his appointments. It impairs the efficiency of the legislator by diverting him from his proper sphere of duties and involving him in the intrigues of the aspirants for office." (Jas. A. Garfield, Atlantic Monthly, July, 1877.)

But not only does the patronage system impair the efficiency of the service, it actually weakens the party in power. As was said in one of the answers to the above questions, "where ten men apply for an office, it is easy to disappoint nine of them." The experience of the last administration, as well as of the present one up to this time, clearly shows that this irregular and unconstitutional mode of distributing public offices serves only to cripple the members who make the appointments and the political party under which it is done. Members of congress realize this embarrassment when they order an election or caucus among the voters of their own party in the respective neighborhoods where post-offices are to be filled. The effort in such cases is undoubtedly to cast from themselves the responsibility of making a choice, which is quite sure to engender dissension.

Such an expedient is not only unjust in itself, but it rarely affords the relief sought. It is manifestly unfair to make an appointment for postmaster in a certain town depend upon the votes of one political party only. These may be an actual minority among the patrons of that office. The service to be performed is public service, paid for without reference to the political affiliations of the patrons, and if the choice is to be made by the suffrages of those who are interested, it is not just that any should be disfranchised. The result of these elections often adds to the confusion and embarrassment which patronage entails, as your committee has learned in the course of its inquiries.

To our question, "Have any elections been held in your district to determine who the appointee should be; and if so, in how many instances, where, and for what positions?" the following answers have been received from congressmen in whose districts such elections have been held:

4. In two instances, for postmasters, resulting in both cases in difficulty and dissatisfaction.

6. Elections have been held in eight places in my congressional district for the selection of postmasters. No elections have been had for the purpose of designating any other appointment.

8. One election, to determine who should be the post-office appointee; we let all parties vote and confined it to one town; would not hold another election for that purpose under any consideration.

9. One election was held, so far, for postmaster, which was unsatisfactory on account of small attendance. There will be another on March 27th for postmaster.

11. In a few instances elections by petitions for the position of postmaster.

12. One last year for postmaster. The result increased strife.

13. None. At the solicitation of candidates and others I called three post-office elections, and I got into hot water. The very persons who had asked for elections protested most loudly against them, and I then appointed the postmasters, or recommended them myself.

15. In case of every presidential post-office in the district where there has been a vacancy since the 4th of March, 1879, a caucus of republican voters has been held to recommend the candidate for the office. These caucuses have been largely attended, and the result in every instance has been perfectly satisfactory, both in the character of the candidates elected, who have been, without exception, excellent men, and entirely removing the disputes and factious quarrels which arise from such appointments.

16. Two for postmasters.

17. Two for post-offices.

18. None. One was held without my knowledge, in which voters were excluded who had a right to be heard, and I paid no attention to the election.

21. I had a few post office elections in my congressional district, but, as there is no law regulating such elections, they have resulted in bitterness and strife, and did more to engender animosities and ill-will between the patrons of the office than any other method I could have adopted for settling post-office contentions, hence I have not favored them, and henceforth shall discourage them where I can.

22. Yes; I settled perhaps twenty post-office contests by a caucus of republican electors. It worked fairly well.

24. In one instance elected a postmaster.

The other answers state that no elections were held.

An amusing account of an election held in his district was given in an interview with one of the representatives. He said: "I have held one election only under this administration, and that had a most disastrous result. It resulted in several men losing their characters, one or two were turned out of church, and all was turmoil and confusion. Carriages were hired to bring voters fourteen miles distant, and citizens of another state voted. The doors of the polling places were broken in. Democrats were allowed to vote. There were no safeguards about the polls. No oaths were required, and there was no respect for the election. The judges certified the election of one man, but sent a statement with the certification that the election was carried by fraud, the same name appearing upon both papers. The consequence was, I went outside for the post master, and chose a man who had not voted and took no part in the fight. He moved into town and took the office (worth not more than $150 per year); but they would have torn the election nominee to pieces if I had recommended him. I look upon the elections as a party disaster."

Other members, as well as some of the above, have expressed their opinion of the patronage system in no favorable terms. One says: "This patronage business is a great nuisance." Another: "I gave two hours a day to candidates for office all last summer, throwing open a room to them six days out of the week. Of course it was an imposition, but I do not want to be put in the attitude of complaining of my constituents so long as the system exists." Another says that he regards appointments by congressmen as injurious to the best performance of their legitimate duties; but while the system exists, it is not possible for members of congress to avoid the responsibility, and their duty is to make the best possible use of the patronage which custom imposes upon them.

Another objection to the patronage system is the secrecy by which it is surrounded. Recommendations and petitions, which are signed upon solicitation and which mean nothing; charges and counter-charges preferred in the dark; political influence, which is often really exerted in favor of one man while it appears to be exerted in favor of another; intrigues and defamation of character—all these things are only incidents to a system which produces and nourishes them.

Another consequence of this system of congressional patronage has been the distribution of offices in many congressional districts by the defeated candidates for congress belonging to the party in power. This irresponsible and illegal apportionment of patronage has led to many scandals. In Missouri there are a number of instances in which these distributors of patronage have collected considerable sums of money from the men seeking their recommendations. These "donations or free gifts" (as they have been called by the recipients of them) are ostensibly made to cover "the expense attached to the proceedings" of recommending them, but it is evident that transactions of this character are essentially corrupt.

The object of your committee in laying these facts before the public is rather to expose the infirmities of the patronage system than to criticize the action of individual congressmen or of the party in power. These evils have existed under both political parties, and so long as the present system exists, it is difficult for any individual congressman to refuse to exercise that patronage which universal custom has thrust upon him, often without his consent or desire. The remedy lies in the adoption of general laws which shall remove these offices from congressional interference. In this connection we desire to call to the attention of the league the provisions of a bill recently introduced into the house of representatives by the Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, in respect to fourth-class postmasterships, offices which at present constitute the bulk of those subject to congressional patronage. This bill provides that the United States shall be divided by the postmaster general into postal districts, and that he shall designate for each district a post office inspector to act as examiner. (As these inspectors are now appointed in pursuance of the civil service law, there is reason to believe that they will not be greatly subject to political influence.) The bill provides that whenever a fourth-class postmaster is to be appointed the inspector for the district shall post notices in conspicuous places in the vicinity, stating the place where the post office is situated, the compensation, the amount of bond, the place where application papers may be obtained, and to which they must be returned, and any other proper information. At least fourteen days' time is to be given for returning the application papers. The inspector must furnish all applicants with blank forms of certificates, in which the applicant, in his own handwriting, shall state upon oath, his name, residence, post-office address, citizenship, time and place of birth, education, health and physical capacity for service, previous employment in the military or naval service, business and residence for the previous five years, whether convicted or under indictment for any crime, and if so, what, and the particular building where the applicant proposes to establish the post-office, and whether in connection with any other business. The candidate shall furnish a sworn certificate, signed by three reputable citizens, declaring their belief that he is a suitable person. No other recommendation shall be offered. No certificate shall be signed by any person holding office in the federal or state government. No application shall call for or furnish any information concerning the politics of the applicant. At the expiration of the time for receiving application papers the inspector shall post a list of the applications in the vicinity, and visit the place and make such inquiries as shall enable him to form an intelligent judgment on the qualification of the respective applicants. He shall then send to the postmaster-general all the application papers, together with the report, in which he shall grade the applicants in the order of their relative fitness, according to his inquiries, and giving the reasons. These papers are to be preserved for five years, and upon them the postmaster-general shall appoint one of the candidates whose names are reported and designated as fit to be appointed; but if he shall select any other than the one graded highest, he shall place his reasons upon record, and these shall be open to public inspection. No appointment shall be absolute until the appointee has served one year on probation. The postmaster-general shall not appoint upon political grounds, nor the inspector recommend any candidate upon such grounds.

This bill is an entirely new measure and is largely tentative in its character, but it is progressive, it affords to the administration a means of appointing fourth-class postmasters without the necessity of consulting members of congress, and it will help to remove this great mass of small offices from political control and restore to members of congress the dignity which ought to belong to the law makers of the country. It will help to abolish a system of patronage which leads to endless contentions and bickerings in almost every community in the United States, which paralyzes the legislative power of congress, and which holds these small prizes up as a reward for the lowest forms of political activity.

We would respectfully urge the league to take every measure possible to promote the favorable consideration and adoption of this or some other measure which seeks to substitute general rules for the individual discretion and self-interest of members of congress and their political supporters. If the fourth-class post-offices can be removed from the field of political strife, the reform of the federal civil service will be more than half accomplished.

SOME POPULAR OBJECTIONS TO CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.*

I.

"You gentlemen never weary of telling us that we are fallen on degenerate days; that during the first forty years of our government, before we lapsed from our sinless state, officials were removed only for cause, and incumbents held on good behavior; in other words, that civil service reform prevailed in all its purity. Now, it is philosophical generalization, founded on broad experience, that revolutions do not go backwards. Heed it, gentlemen, heed it! The revolution of 1820-29 is an accomplished fact. It is here to stay, for then did the people come into their own. The present status has endured for half a century; civil service reform is ancient history. You are chasing moonbeams."

*Such of these objections as are taken from the records of congress are indicated by marginal references and are quoted literally. The others—which reflect current lay discussion of the newspaper and the street—are repeated substantially, but not formally.

The fatalist entrenches himself in platitude, and warns reason beyond speaking distance. With him, what is must forever be; what has been and is not will never be. And thus is the controversy closed.

He forgets that much that is done remains to be undone; that political progress is mostly negative, consisting mainly in the repeal of bad laws or in the abolition of evil customs. In this sense history is reversed every day, and the process will continue so long as legislation is experimental and legislators are supine. It is true that some things in political history may be regarded as settled. But this can be predicted only of those changes which are based upon the immutable principles of right. The introduction of the spoils system into the administrative branch of the American government is not of these. That system is at war with equality, freedom, justice, and a wise economy, and is already a doomed thing fighting extinction. Its establishment was in no sense a popular revolution, but was the work of a self-willed man of stubborn and tyrannical nature, who had enemies to punish and debts to pay. He overrode a vehement opposition, disregarding the protest and sage prediction of the great statesmen of his time. He wielded a power that was arbitrary; his caprice was law, his rule was reign. If he wished to do a thing, it was enough that it seemed good to him to do it. His idea of government was a personal one solely. Every public official was a private servitor, who must take the oath of allegiance and do homage to his chief. In his view, no man could honestly disagree with him. He was always right; his opponents were hopelessly and criminally wrong. Here was a fit man to establish the spoils system, to explore the constitution for latent executive powers, to attach to the person of the president the high prerogatives of a monarch. That the king is the fountain of honor, office, and privilege is the theory of the English state; that the civil service of the United States is a perquisite of the presidency was the theory of General Jackson.

It is needless to say that the American commonwealth was not founded upon any such doctrine. Jackson's interpretation of the constitution was a gross perversion of the intent and meaning of that instrument. This was to be a government of laws, not of men; and so far as the presence of its framers availed it was made so. The liberties of the people were not to be left to individual scruple, but were secured by specific inhibitions upon the governmental agencies. Three departments were organized severally to make, execute, and interpret the laws, and each was to act as a check upon the other. With the adoption of the first ten amendments to the constitution, it was thought that every avenue of attack upon popular rights had been closed. But the power of construction is greater than that of legislation. The intention of the lawgiver is determined, not by himself, but by some other who construes the law; and with that other interpretation is purely a subjective matter. Madison held that "the wanton removal of meritorious officers" was an impeachable offense. But Jackson swore to defend and protect the constitution as he understood it, and not as Madison, one of its framers, conceived it. Regarding the right of removal the instrument itself is wholly silent, except as it provides impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors. When, therefore, Jackson organized the civil service into a gigantic political machine, proscribing office-holders because of his personal enmity to them or because of their political affiliations, it can not be said that he violated any specific provision of the constitution. That such action was an usurpation of authority and a wanton betrayal of trust needs no verbal emphasis. With equal propriety and moral justification, he might have used those other co-ordinate branches of the executive department, the army and navy, to perpetuate himself and his party in power. This he did not attempt to do. Perhaps he did not need their aid. At any rate, after securing his own re-election, and after naming his successor, his ambition rested—fortunately for the country. But what he did, he did thoroughly. The system of political brigandage inaugurated by him has subsisted even unto this day. But it is now upon the verge of dissolution. Its end is written and sealed. This last is the work of those who are grown weary of the spoliation of office—of those who are jealous of the encroachments of the executive, and who would tie the hands of that functionary for all time to come. With them it is not a question whether a clerk holds his office for four years or for fifteen years. They are determined that the great army of the civil service shall not be used by any man or by any set of men for purposes of personal or partisan aggrandizement; that the freedom of elections shall not be assailed by an intriguing, corrupt, and organized force; that presidential contests shall not be tumults threatening anarchy. Hereafter there will be no "prizes of victory," no carnival of spoil. Place-holders will attend to the business for which they are paid to attend; fitness will be the essential of appointment, not the accident and the incident. This is the popular revolution that is moving forward irresistibly, that is coming to stay. Already has a law been enacted which, though partial in its effects, is capable of large extension by the president alone, without further action on the part of congress. This measure leaves the power of removal for all except partisan reasons untouched. By regulating the method of appointment, it takes away the temptation to the abuse of that discretion. It is not a revival of a faded statute, nor has it its counterpart in early legislation. It is a new ordering of things; practically a reversal of procedure. Although, during the first forty years of the republic, there was no statutory restriction upon the manner of appointment and removal, nevertheless the power of removal was controlled by an unwritten law which depended for its enforcement upon mental sanctions. But this was a frail dyke with which to withstand the pressure of a hungry and inflowing sea, and it was only a question of time until it should be swept away. That congress did not strengthen it by positive legislation is to be deplored. But the omission is explicable. At the time of the formation of our government no law was deemed necessary. The civil service numbered but a thousand persons; to-day it numbers two hundred thousand, and not many decades hence it will increase to a half million. Again, congress had absolute faith in the executive. All presidents would be Washingtons, patient and moderate, patriotic rather than partisan. So highly was the first president esteemed that that body waived its consent to the removal of those officers whose appointment required their approval. Of course they did not contemplate the capricious exercise of this power; the causeless removal of an official being to them an unthinkable proposition. But events outran prevision, and in the course of years not only did a Jackson appear, but congress itself ceased to desire to protect the service. Such legislative changes as were made subverted a private and not a public interest. The immense patronage which was controlled by the chief executive, either directly by commission, or indirectly through the heads of departments, came to be administered for the benefit, not of himself alone, but of the representative politicians as well. This step was gained partly through a recognition by the president of the eminent utility of sub-allotment for personal purposes, and partly, in the failure of that persuasion, through the exercise of such coercive power as could be wielded by the senate in confirmation, and by both houses in the passage of acts regulating the term and tenure of office. Gradually, out of the chaotic scramble for spoil, there was evolved a system of distribution which was founded upon hoary precedent, and which, in nice precision and in perfect order of detail, lacked nothing of a scientific character. The whole country was staked out into districts, as many in number as there were congressmen. After a conquest, the enemy were driven from their holdings, and the victors took possession of the glebe. But the estates thus granted were made conditional upon the performing of certain services or upon the rendering of certain tribute. Each tenant held of some feudal superior, and all held, mediately or immediately, of the lord paramount, the president. The governmental offices scattered everywhere were so many baronial strongholds, and were filled with retainers who were chosen for their fighting qualities. The chief duty of these men was to check uprisings and to keep the people in subjection. Their places depended upon the faithful discharge of it. In other words, the civil service was a graded vassalage of a militant character. All offices were the private property of the head of the state, and were dispensed by royal favor. What is this but feudalism in new clothes, or, rather, the garbed skeleton thereof? By some fantastic jugglery, this mocking semblance of a dead and buried past has become a stalking figure in a new and progressive civilization. Verily has a revolution gone backwards, if it be not promptly relegated to the glass case of antiquities, there to remain as a curiosity for posterity to stare at.

The spoils system should have perished a quarter of a century ago, in the cataclysm which destroyed that other relic of feudalism, slavery. For they were twin evils, and were ever unfailing allies; and when the time shall come to write the history of public opinion in America during the nineteenth century, they will be classed together. John Morley suggestively says of the "peculiar institution," "Nobody has yet traced out the full effect upon the national character of the Americans of all those years of conscious complicity in slavery, after the immorality and iniquity of slavery had become clear to the inner conscience of the very men who ignobly sanctioned the mobbing of the abolitionists."^{*}

Adherence to the letter of a contract which was "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell" was due partly to an unfaltering instinct of union. But many were influenced by motives less worthy. Before the war the fidelity of most northern politicians to the south was a degrading sycophancy. Eager and grateful for the crumbs which fell from the southern table, and despairing of obtaining those crumbs elsewhere, they suffered themselves to become the supple tools of the slave power. These "Swiss guards of slavery fighting for pay" were a race of place-hunters, with whom office was the end, not the means, and whose statesmanship, like that of the Augustan senate, consisted in justifying personal flattery by speculative principles of servitude. They steadily prostituted principle to preferment, and came near involving this country in irretrievable ruin.

But the age of compromise—the era of "bigotry with a doubt" and of "persecution without a creed"—was succeeded by the age of blood and iron. The war was an ethical education; like a great storm, it purified the air. After it was over the people began to see more clearly and more truly; they learned to view things "in the visual angle of the absolute principle."

Before this keener vision the spoils system, a long-established practice claiming charter by prescription, has been called upon to justify itself. Until recently, the people of this country supposed that traffic in place, the unceasing clamor for office, the sack and pillage of the government by the dominant party, were a necessary part of democratic institutions. Many politicians, with selfish purposes to subserve, were interested in enforcing this view. To the principle that the majority must rule they added the corollary that all the offices are essential to that rule. They further inculcated the idea that every national election is a battle of enemies, instead of an amicable contest of friends, whose interests are the same, and "who disagree not except in opinion."

It must be confessed that during the rebellion, when the north was divided between the war party and the peace party, there was some foundation for this doctrine. He who was not with you was against you. But the intense partisanship engendered by that strife is relaxing into an amiable toleration. Happily, party fealty is not always to be a test of patriotism. The government is not the property of faction, and the minority have rights which must be respected. "Vae victis" is no longer the slogan of the fight. If civil service reform has not made that progress which idealists expect,—conquering all on the instant,—let it be remembered that the growth of moral movements is necessarily slow, especially in a democracy, where, it is scarcely hyperbole to say, the last man must be convinced. It is none the less sure, however: for "one man in the right becomes a majority," and the American people mean to do right when they know where the right lies.

II.

"I believe this commission to be undemocratic. I believe it favors certain voters in this country at the expense of other voters, and I know that if the rulings of the civil service commission were applied to the members of this house not seven eighths of the members would ever reach the floor again. [Laughter.] Now, sir, believing this to be undemocratic, and believing that it is in violation of the fundamental principles of the government, I move to strike out the whole section, and hope that it will be agreed to." †

To apply the rules of the merit system to the members of congress would be a cruelty indeed, and is altogether a harrowing suggestion. But it is beside the point. If civil service reform be undemocratic, and if it violate the fundamental principles of our government, the motion made in the house of representatives to strike out the appropriation to the commission should have prevailed. As a matter of fact, it was overwhelmingly defeated by a vote of twenty-five to one hundred and thirty-eight. This would appear to be decisive. It is evident, however, from the discussion that preceded the calling of the yeas and nays, that the scope and object of civil service reform are still profoundly misunderstood by some congressmen, and inferentially by their constituents. A restatement may therefore serve a useful purpose:

The doctrine of civil service reform as applied to the subordinate, clerical, or purely ministerial offices of the government is based upon the following self-evident propositions: that offices are created to fulfill certain necessary functions involved in the routine of government, and not to give some men a place; that offices are supported by non-partisan taxation; that taxation is an evil, and therefore it is essential that the public service shall be as efficient and economical as possible; that offices are public and not private property, and administration is a trust, not an ownership; that in a republic something less arbitrary than favoritism shall govern appointment and removal; that men shall be appointed solely on the ground of merit; and not in payment of personal debt; that an examination is the fairest means of ascertaining the qualifications of an appointee, because it insures that a clerk shall know how to write, a book-keeper how to keep books, and a gauger how to gauge; that such examination shall be competitive and open to all, not being confined to the members of any one political party; that a class system is opposed to the spirit of our institutions, and therefore offices should not be invested property of ward-workers and political henchmen, to the total and absolute exclusion of the great body of the common people; that an office-holder is a citizen of the United States, and is entitled to all the rights and privileges attaching to such citizenship: that neither the president nor any other executive officer has the right to proscribe such office-holder, remove him from place, or threaten his subsistence on account of his politics; that such a brutal procedure is un-American; that tenure of office should not be dependent upon the degradation of manhood and the prostitution of political opinion; that the practice of the president and his cabinet in changing two hundred thousand office-holders at will, for causes unconnected with good administration, is dangerous and despotic, and should be restrained; that under the present system these office-holders constitute a great standing army of paid servitors, ever ready to do the bidding of their patrons, to the perversion of the public will, and are a menace to good government; that political assessments, if paid unwillingly, are an extortion and a direct theft from the office-holder, and, if paid willingly, are generally a brokerage commission for appointment, or a bribe to the appointing power for continuance in place; that if salaries are so large that assessments can be endured without inconvenience, such salaries should be cut down to a saving of the people's money; that promises of appointment to office made, whether definitely or indefinitely, work a corruption of public opinion; that the enormous bribe of two hundred thousand offices, offered as a reward for party work, tends to obscure the real issues of politics, encourages the sacrifice of principle to selfish personal gain, and induces a laxity of political morals; that a "clean sweep" of the offices demoralizes the public service, and is the direct and indirect source of great financial loss; that skill in the manipulation of a caucus and in the packing of a primary is not presumptive evidence of capacity for the performance of official duties; that the constitution of the United States contemplates the election of a congressman as a legislator, and not as a patronage-monger; that such patronage is a burden to every honest, conscientious and able congressman, compels the neglect of his proper duties, creates petty factional disputes and wrangles among his constituents, and often defeats the re-election of a trustworthy servant of honorable record; that the statesman is thus rapidly becoming an extinct species, being succeeded by the politician, and the consequent loss inflicted on the people through crude and unwise legislation is incalculable; that the fear of losing the spoils of office is paralyzing the legislative branch of the government, makes cowards of political parties, and is the enemy of progress; that the retention of the vast patronage of two hundred thousand offices is becoming of more concern than the triumph of principle; that the mania for place-hunting is increasing; that the clamor of spoilsmen compels the creation of sinecures, thereby increasing the taxes; and finally that all the evils here before enumerated are growing with the multiplication of offices, and will ultimately, unless checked by a comprehensive and decisive enactment, undermine and overthrow the institutions of our country.

Such is an imperfect outline of the doctrine of civil service reform and of the abuses it is designed to remedy. By this showing, is it not the spoils system which is "undemocratic," and which "favors certain voters of this country at the expense of other voters"? What, to repeat, can be less democratic, less American, than persecution for opinions's sake? Yet this is the very essence of the spoils system, its guiding spirit and its crowning infamy. If this assertion need further explication, it may be found in a recital of what takes place in this country when one party succeeds another in the control of the government. The newly elected president goes (by deputy) through all the departments, and may be supposed to interview each clerk in a conversation of which the following is typical:

President. Whom did you vote for at the last election?

Clerk. That does not concern you. I am an American citizen, and have the right to vote for whomsoever I please, without being subjected afterwards to a governmental inquisition by you or any other man.

President. I asked the question in conformity with a time-honored practice, and shall insist upon an answer.

Clerk. Very well; I will answer the question, not because of your menaces, but because I do not hold my political opinions covertly. I voted for your opponent.

President. Then you must vacate this office.

Clerk. If you can show that I have not performed my duties properly, or that I have neglected them for politics or any other reasons, I am willing to go.

President. I have not looked into that; it is immaterial, any way. I want your place for some one else.

Clerk. For one of your partisan "workers," perhaps, whose qualifications you have also not looked into?

President. Possibly.

Clerk. By what right do you proscribe me, then? You are merely a trustee; these offices do not belong to you.

President. You are the victim of an illusion. These offices do belong to me. They are my personal patronage and plunder, to do with whatsoever I will. If you refuse to resign, I will remove you.

Clerk. Very well; I will yield the place as I would my purse to a highwayman who puts a pistol to my head. Nevertheless, I denounce your action as an outrage upon my rights as an American citizen.

If this conversation does not often take place actually as reported, its substance is at least tacitly understood. Generally the clerk stifles his protest and resigns, quietly submitting to a system that is an heritage of barbarism. Proscription of minor office-holders on account of political opinion is as completely indefensible as proscription on account of religious belief. It has no proper place in the United States. It is an anachronism, and belongs to the age of the crusades against the Catholics and the Jews.

III.

"Civil service reform is an English importation, upon which, unfortunately, there is no tariff. We broke with England and with her monarchical institutions a century ago, and set up a government of our own—a democratic government. It supplies our needs, and stands as an example to mankind. Servile imitation of foreign politics is unworthy of our pride of race or nation."

Anglophobia is in the American blood. A common law, language, literature, and religion do not of necessity constitute the ties of sentiment. Although the American people are the heirs of all the ages, they do not like to be reminded of their obligations, nor to acknowledge an ancestry. They will not claim kinship even with Shakespeare. To them their history knows no perspective; in the discovery of a new and virgin world was the beginning of things. England is the traditional enemy, and all the pretty speeches made over London dinner-tables do not alter this fact in the least. This prejudice seems to be enduring, and any appeal made to it by politicians is generally successful.

Happily in the present case, the retort is complete. The spoils system, with the stamp of feudalism upon it, was imported into this country from England, where it had obtained in the modern form for one hundred and forty years. It pervaded all departments of the English state, the army, the navy, and the church, as well as the civil service, attaining a growth which it has never known here. Offices were openly bought and sold, the purchaser acquiring a proprietary interest therein. There, as here, patronage was the active coefficient of corrupt elections. Rotten boroughs were exposed for sale in the market, and members of parliament were bribed to the support of the crown by sinecures, pensions, and money. At the time our government was founded, the spoils system was flourishing luxuriantly in England, and George III found it a most serviceable instrument in enforcing his policy of persecution against the thirteen colonies. It is a pity that those gentlemen who claim the spoils system as peculiarly "American" should have forgotten this. It embarrasses their argument. Per contra, the merit system is a democratic institution, and its practical application to our civil service was coeval with the beginning of our government. That England should have been before us in embodying it in the form of law proves nothing more than the immense progress which has been made in that country towards popular institutions.

IV.

"The executive power of Great Britain is hereditary, and changes only at the death of the monarch. The administration, however, changes at will, and may change every week. Therefore, the idea of life tenure for executive officers is consistent with an executive for life. Therefore, an official class of lifelong tenure is consistent with monarchical and aristocratic government, which is peculiarly a government of classes. But it is not consistent with a democratic government and a short-lived executive where no class is recognized by law and all men are equal." *

It happens, unfortunately for the consistency of this argument, that in England, under the modern system of parliamentary government, the administration is the executive. The executive powers of the crown are obsolete, having passed to the prime minister and his cabinet. But these officials "change at will;" they "may change every week." Consequently, tenure on good behavior—mis-called life tenure—is consistent with democratic government and a short-lived executive. If civil service reform is not adapted to the United States, where the president holds for four years, a fortiori, it is not adapted to England, where the tenure of the premier—the real executive—is the shortest and most precarious imaginable. Indeed, what we call civil service reform is the very life of parliamentary government. If, with every change of the ministry, a "clean sweep" of the officers should be made, the English civil service would soon be in a state of anarchy. Under such a system, rapid alternation in party control would totally disorganize the administrative machinery of the government, and would be a perpetual threat against the existence of the empire itself—a thing of course not to be tolerated. The situation in England was logically reducible to this: Either the spoils system must be abolished, or some one party must be continued in power indefinitely which would mean the destruction of popular government. There could be no hesitation in choosing. The new democracy achieved a victory over feudalistic privilege that was complete and final.

Even apart from any political principle, the reform has vindicated itself. When the administrative departments ceased to be asylums for decayed gentry, and were thrown open to public competition, there was an improvement in the morale and efficiency of the service. Reorganization upon the basis of the merit system was extended even to India, where the duties of officials are of a most delicate and complicated character, involving, as they do tactful relations with and control over two hundred millions of aliens.

But it has come to pass that civil service reform, which was denounced in England as "democratic," is opposed in the United States as representing exactly the opposite tendencies. "Aristocracy," "bureaucracy," and "insolence of office" are expressions as familiar as they are misleading. They deserve a brief consideration.

Aristocracy means the permanent exaltation of a few individual names. It implies great social dignity and distinction, and generally is based upon an hereditary succession of title and land. An aristocracy of department clerks and mail-carriers is an absurdity. However worthy such persons may be, they will have no more social distinction than clerks in business houses, whose tenure is the same as theirs. They possess neither title nor wealth, and are condemned to a routine of labor. The effect of service in a great government machine is to sink individuality, not to exalt it. The tens of thousands of school-teachers who are in the pay of every state do not constitute an aristocracy. In fact, they are rarely in the public view, and this for the reason that they are not "in politics." Fortunately, the spoils system has not been applied to our public schools. If, however, it were the practice to dismiss all the republican school-teachers whenever a democratic governor was elected, and vice versa, we should, without doubt, be feelingly assured that any other tenure would seriously imperil our institutions.

Bureaucracy is another chimera. It can not exist where the heads of administration are constantly changing, where admission to the civil service is open to all, and where the removal of the unfit servant is expeditious and easy.

Insolence of office is an a priori argument. It has been pertinently said, in answer to it, that, at the time tenure on good behavior was superseded by Crawford's four-year law and by Jackson's regime, it was never urged by the innovators as a reason for the change that the manners of office holders were contemptuous and overbearing. The objection is an after-thought. Of the insolence of bureaucracy and of the arrogance of aristocracy the American people have had no experience under any official tenure, and are not likely to have.

A civil service becomes formidable to the liberties of a people only when it seeks to perpetuate itself by interfering with elections. Inasmuch as this purpose (to override the public will and to create a bureau cracy) is the very vice of the American spoils system, speculation as to what may be, under civil service reform, can be profitably postponed to an observation of what is.

The countless minor offices of the United States are filled by a distinct class known as "professional politicians." These men live by politics, receiving place as reward for political work. Their control of public office is monopolistic. Mr. Bryce estimates their number at two hundred thousand, but this is probably an underestimate. They constitute a guild, although they are not organized under formal articles of association. With them office-getting (or keeping in office) is an industry, and the fees and emoluments are accepted as payment for partisan services rather than for the exercise of official functions. The influence which the office-holders wield is altogether out of proportion to their numbers or to their intellectual attainments. But they possess this advantage over all other classes—they are unified and organized. They make the management of primaries and conventions the serious business of their lives, and acquire a skill and experience in "wire-pulling" which ordinary citizens can not hope to cope with. The politics of the country is in the hands of these men. The people elect, but can not nominate, being reduced to a choice of candidates selected by the politicians of opposing parties. These politicians dictate nominations, high and low, and afterwards foreclose a lien upon public place which they claim to have earned. All others, those who can not show a certificate of this character, are excluded. The spoils system has been compared with a fairly conducted lottery, in which every one has an equal chance. But the analogy is loose. In all lotteries the prizes are limited to ticket-holders, and in the American political lottery the ticket-holders are few. The farmer, the shopkeeper, and the laborer generally have not the remotest chance of preferment, unless they can produce evidence of partisan work more or less technical or questionable. Of course the number who can offer such credentials is comparatively small. To begin with, all the members of the defeated political party (who, under our electoral system, constitute, as often as not, more than one half of the people) are rigidly debarred. Secondly, only that small contingent of the dominant party who have been of practical use to the candidates in convention and elsewhere, and who possesses the advantage of a personal acquaintance with one or more of them, receive any consideration whatever. The idea, therefore, that the offices are in the hands of the people is the shallowest of delusions. They are sold to the few for a price which the many are unwilling and are unable to pay. It is needless to say that, in this barter and sale of public place, the proper transaction of government business is lost sight of. Competency does not appoint an applicant, and can not save an incumbent. Other motives of a mercenary or selfish character control in both cases. Office brokerage is a shameless and conspicuous fact, as the newspapers and the congressional debates daily attest. It is the great object of civil service reform to restore these offices to the people, and to overthrow the bastard aristocracy who have despoiled them. Those good citizens who are apprehensive of government by "official caste" need not strain their eyes to the future. They should look about them.

V.

"The political disqualification of office-holders is an invasion of their rights as American citizens."

Civil service reform, as embodied in the Pendleton Act of 1883, does not deny to an office-holder any rights which properly belong to him as a citizen of the United States; on the contrary, it restores to him those rights of which he has been deprived. It protects him against partisan discrimination by the appointing power; it protects his salary from assessment by his official superiors; it protects him against removal for refusing to render any political service. It restores to him the right to think for himself, and to register his opinion at the ballot-box, free from the espionage of the informer. In this wise the law protects him. But civil service reform, in its gross and scope, within the statute and without, looks to the protection of the people also. There are certain things which a citizen as a place-holder may not do. He may not use his official influence to coerce the political actions of his neighbor, to wit: he may not neglect the duties of his office to do a henchman's work; he may not pack primaries, manipulate conventions, collect and disburse election funds, corrupt the ballot box, or tamper with the returns. Some of these things are forbidden by the federal and state criminal law; others not. But whether or not, any and all of them are grave breaches of his duty, both as a citizen and as an office-holder. Yet these are the things which, in varying kind and degree, many officials notoriously are doing. Is it necessary to characterize such partisan activity as a monstrous evil in a country where the triumph of right is a question of majority, or to justify the executive orders which have been issued to suppress it?

In England, more than a century ago, the interference of office-holders in elections assumed such proportions that the whole body of subordinates in the executive department were forbidden by law to vote for members of parliament. In 1868, after the introduction of the merit system, this law was repealed, as being an unnecessary restriction. If a man procures an appointment on his deserts, and not through political influences, the obligations of appointee to patron do not exist, and the temptation to indulge in corrupt election practices disappears. The American doctrine of the relation of the office-holder to the body politic was set forth (albeit little to the immediate purpose) by President Cleveland in an executive order issued July 14, 1886. In it he said:

"Individual interest and activity in political affairs are by no means condemned. Office-holders are neither disfranchised nor forbidden the exercise of political privileges, but their privileges are not enlarged, nor is their duty to party increased to pernicious activity, by office holding. A just discrimination in this regard between the things a citizen may properly do and the purposes for which a public office should not be used is easy, in the light of a correct appreciation of the relation between the people and those entrusted with official place, and the consideration of the necessity, under our form of government, of political action free from official coercion."

VI.

"Is a competitive examination the best or any test for official competency or efficiency? May not a man be eminently competent for official preferment, and not at all competent for a competitive examination?"

The system of competitive examination may not be perfectly adapted to ascertaining the comparative fitness of candidates for place; but it is the best that has been suggested, and it is infinitely better than a system in which fitness is not considered at all.

It accomplishes, within the sphere to which it has been limited, the chief object of civil service reform, namely, the removal of the ministerial offices from the domain of partisan politics. It tends also to increase the efficiency and to decrease the cost of the civil service—an important though secondary consideration. There are some kinds of officers who can not well be chosen by competition: the fourth-class postmasters, for instance, who live in sparsely settled districts, and who may be appointed by one of several feasible plans that have been suggested, and the higher grade of officers, such as chiefs of bureaus, whose competency would be better assured if they obtained their positions by promotion, based upon worth, fidelity, and long experience. As to the intermediate offices, the system of competitive examination works satisfactorily. The official duties are clearly defined, and it is an easy matter to test the qualifications of applicants. If it be urged that business men do not select their employees by this method, it may be replied that they always make searching verbal inquiries into the capacity of applicants, and that, in some instances, where large numbers of men are employed, written questions are submitted.

*Senator Call, Cong. Rec., vol. xiv. Part I. p. 498.

In fact, competition, in some form, is the unwritten law of the commercial world, it being a needful guarantee of the best service.

It is, of course, possible that a man may be "eminently competent for official preferment, and not at all competent for a competitive examination;" but the chances are greatly against it, if the examination be "practical," as the law says it shall be. The civil service commission have performed their duty in this matter judiciously. That part of the examination which is intended to test the general fitness of applicants will not greatly tax the mental resources of any one possessing a common school education, unless expert services are required. The standard set is low rather than high. Sir G. O. Trevelyan says that the opening of the English civil and military services to competition, in its influence upon national education, was equivalent to a hundred thousand scholarships and exhibitions of the most valuable kind. Whatever may be the influence of the system of federal examinations upon the education of the American people, there can not be two opinions as to the effect of that system upon the national character. It is needless to point out that a public contest of merit, into which any one may enter without fear or solicitation, induces high endeavor, and conserves manhood. On the other hand, it is equally patent that where offices go by favor thrift follows fawning. Women seeking an honest career are reduced to importuning, mayhap subjected to insult; young men are transformed into mendicants and sycophants; and the position of all applicants does not differ materially from that of the Elizabethan courtier, whose ignominy Spenser, in travail of spirit, has described so vividly:

"Full little knowest thou, that hast not tride,
What hell it is in suing long to bide:
To loose good days, that might be better spent;
To waste long nights in pensive discontent;
To speed to day, to be put back to morrow;
To feed on hope, to pine with feare and sorrow;
To fret thy soul with crosses and with cares;
To eat thy heart through comfortless dispaire;
To fawne, to crouche, to wait, to ride, to roue,
To spend, to give, to want, to be undone."
—Oliver T. Morton, in the Atlantic Monthly, April, 1890.

Congressman Ray contributes the following interview to the Washington Penny Press: "Senator Quay gets everything he goes after. He is very willing to sign the applications of office-seekers, but he has a special method of indicating the man whom he wants appointed. He will sign the papers of a dozen men who want the same place, but he will make a personal visit to a department for the man of his choice. Some time ago I went to the agricultural department to get a friend a place, and urged upon Secretary Rusk the fact that my man was warmly indorsed by Senator Quay. But the secretary told me, 'Bless your soul, I've already appointed a man for that place, and he was especially endorsed personally by the senator.' So you see Senator Quay has several degrees of indorsement, and the departments understand how to regard his name on a document."

John A. Sample, the present democratic postmaster of this city, has sent his resignation to the President. A number of worthy republican citizens are applicants for the office, and as a compromise, Congressman Browne has consented to allow the citizens to hold an election, by which means to choose from among the applicants the one to be appointed. The election will be held in the near future. Postmaster Sample's term did not expire until December next.—Knightstown Special to Indianapolis Journal, March 5.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

"What is needed is a Christian conscience vital and real enough to damn iniquity even when it would be more convenient to have it taken up into glory. So that if you are a democrat and hear a democrat lie, you will be prepared to brand it as a lie then and there. If you are a republican and know a man is a bribe giver, you will be prepared to brand him as a bribe giver, even though he be a republican and worth a good deal to his party."—Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst.

"The purification of politics is an iridescent dream. The decalogue and the golden rule have no place in a political campaign. The object is success. To defeat the antagonist and expel the party in power is the purpose. This modern cant about the corruption of politics is fatiguing in the extreme. It proceeds from the tea custard and syllabub dilettanteism, the frivolous and desultory sentimentalism of epicures."—Senator Ingalls.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana

The Civil Service Chronicle desires facts regarding the so-called "resignations" of fourth class postmasters; who has requested these resignations, by what agencies have these been effected, and in what instances have resignations been practically forced so prevent loss on the post-office furniture by disposing of it to the would-be successor in office.

The Civil Service Chronicle desires information of all cases where the man at the top of the eligible lists for positions in the railway mail service has not been chosen.

The Civil Service Chronicle will be glad to receive information upon the following points:

The name of any newspaper editor or owner who has or may receive a federal appointment, and the name of the office.

The names of all members of political committees or delegates given a federal appointment, and the name of the office.

The names of all federal office-holders who are members of any political committee or who act as delegates, naming the committee or the convention.

Statements regarding any political activity in primaries, conventions or political work done for any nominees by federal office-holders.

THE civil service commissioners have summed up their case before the congressional investigating committee. We have not received Mr. Thompson's argument, but it is spoken of as a remarkably eloquent defense of the merit system. Mr. Roosevelt answered the accusers point by point and conclusively. Whatever the report of the committee may be, it is a fact that the attack upon the commission was made and carried on because the commission enforced the law.

THE conclusion of Mr. Oliver T. Morton's article in the Atlantic upon "Some Popular Objections to Civil Service Reform," appeared in the May number and fully sustained the character of the first part. The Indiana civil service reform association should divide this article into tracts and send them broadcast over the state. What friend of the association will furnish the means?

THE annual meeting of the Indiana civil service reform association was held at Fort Wayne, May 16. The business meeting in the afternoon adopted the resolutions published elsewhere. In the evening the address of Mr. Bonaparte, which the CHRONICLE also publishes, was delivered to a large and closely interested audience. Both meetings were, in size and interest, the most successful ever held. Fort Wayne is perhaps the best instance of the notable progress made during the last year.

The individuals in favor of civil service reform became united in the association, and having taken upon themselves the arrangements for the annual meeting, they were strong enough to make it, as we have said, the best ever held. The same organization has been accomplished in other parts of Indiana, and it may be put down as a sure sign of the growth of the reform sentiment.

THE most important struggle yet had in regard to the merit system since the passage of the Pendleton act, and which has been going on in the house the entire session, reached its climax in the debate over the appropriation for the commission. The spoilsmen put forth their full strength, and were completely routed by a vote of 120 to 61. It is doubtful if they can again muster so many votes. The debate indicated the growing feeling among party managers that the merit system will have to be shouldered and advocated as a party measure. It was well known that Mr. Lodge would give it his best efforts, but when Mr. McKinley, the republican leader of the house, stood up and claimed the civil service law as a republican measure, and declared that it was good and wholesome for the whole country, and that no party will have the courage to repeal it, he gave proof that republican party management, whether from virtue or necessity, is actually taking its stand upon the principles of the merit system instead of confining itself largely to platform expressions. It will be remembered that when, some four years ago, Senator Harrison was criticising President Cleveland's shortcomings with the civil service, he expressly reserved his own opinion of the system. It is fair to state the claim that many leading democrats were anxious to speak in favor of the merit system, but could not obtain recognition. This may indicate the beginning of a race by both parties to get, in fact as well as in words, upon civil service reform ground. Our Indiana congressmen allowed Cheadle to make a sorry appearance for himself and the state.

THE Norfolk republican club, of Boston, has "banquetted" Clarkson. It was stated that this proceeding was intended to give an "impetus" to the campaign in that state. The scattered fragments of the tin-horn Farwell club might try the cohesive properties of a meal to Clarkson. If this worked well they might change their name to the tin-horn Clarkson club, and buy some more furniture and rent another room. Clarkson could give this club enough impetus to keep the constable off from their effects for at least three months.

Now is the time for civil service reformers in Ohio to bestir themselves. They are there in plenty. It only needs a little patience and enthusiasm to find one another out and to effect an organization. Ohio politics have been graded quite as low as the Indiana article, and it has been the fashion to say neither state wanted anything different. The fact is that the bulk of the people of both states have but little sympathy with spoils politics, but the intense partisanship common to both has been a hindrance to any reform that might require a reproof to the party in power. It is true that we have outstripped our neighbor, but surely now, after the stand taken by Congressmen Butterworth and McKinley, those who realize the dangers of the spoils system should for a time forsake ease and fight actively for a good principle. It ought to be matter for encouragement not to have a spokesman like our Cheadle.

WHEN the Civil Service Record, the first paper printed entirely for the dissemination of facts regarding the civil service and the reform of that service, was started in 1880 it was a paper of four pages. A look at its early issues shows how thoroughly its editors had searched for current news and how meagre the field was. The daily papers did not think it worth while to chronicle the quarrels and contests and happenings going on among the spoilsmen big and little. What is the place to-day of all facts relating to the civil service? There is no other topic the year through that occupies an equal space in the public prints. It was not that the facts did not exist, but it had not been discovered that under the surface of the ordinary political currents which ran in the shape of high sounding doctrines and platforms was a seething mass of corruption, engendered solely by the anxiety to get office and draw pay from the public treasury; and that this corruption had spread until, in the shape of political assessments, vote buying, perjury, mercilessness, and degradation of political character, it had gone far to kill out patriotism and stifle patriotic efforts, and had led the people in many localities to submit themselves, almost without protest, to the rule of Quays and Gormans—a rule which has no other foundation and no other development than the feudalism of the Middle Ages. Now all is changed; the cover has been torn away and all the reform papers in the country can not find space for the facts which prove the ruin to which the spoils system, unless broken up, will lead us; and this publication of the facts is remorselessly grinding that system to pieces.

MR. ROOSEVELT, upon his return to Washington from his western trip, made a favorable report regarding the enforcement of the law in this post-office. The following, from the report, is of interest:

The civil service board at Indianapolis has evidently been doing its duty well; and a special meed of praise belongs to Messrs. Fishback and Butler, who are outside of the post-office department, and who nevertheless have done valuable service as members of the board with no other motive than a disinterested desire to perform a public duty. We were able to appoint Messrs. Butler and Fishback because they were in the service of the government, though really outsiders as regards the special work to be performed. The faithfulness with which they have done their duty and the good effect it has had upon the outside public to know that two gentlemen of their character and standing were officiating as examiners, emphasizes the recommendation that we have made in our annual report to the effect that our local boards should contain members not in the government service at all who could not possibly be coerced by any official in the performance of their public duty. This would tend greatly to increase the public confidence in the fairness of the examinations. They are as a rule perfectly fair now; and the chief thing to do is to get the public to believe that this is the case. I am confident, however, that this belief is growing day by day.

THE people of this city now have an opportunity to note the warped views which prevail as to what constitutes a good fireman. There are twelve vacancies in the fire department, and the chief, Mr. Dougherty, thinks that seven democrats and five republicans are necessary. Now comes Councilman Hicklin and says that the people want a non-partisan fire department, and he therefore proposes that eighteen democrats shall be appointed, although this would make it necessary to dispense with some experienced firemen, while but three of the eighteen proposed have had any experience. Hicklin proposes to continue turning out experienced men and appointing democrats until the parties are balanced, and then he says we shall have a non-partisan fire department. The people will sometime put an end to this trifling with their vital interests. The law puts the nomination of men to fill vacancies upon Mr. Dougherty. If he wants to do his duty to the people of this city, let him call upon Messrs. Butler and Fishback of the federal examining board, and we venture to say that they will make up for him a series of tests for candidates for the position of fireman based upon the tests long in use in New York, Brooklyn and Boston. We venture also to say that those gentlemen, with the necessary teachers of gymnastics, and physicians, will, without charge, act as an examining board for him. These preliminaries settled, let Mr. Dougherty advertise that he has twelve vacancies to be competed for, and that the competition is open to all comers. When the board has held its examination and made out its graded list, let Mr. Dougherty nominate the highest twelve and let us see if the council will refuse to confirm them because their party or factional stripe does not happen to suit. The citizens who own the property in this city care nothing about the political beliefs of the firemen, but they do want firemen of the best physical and other attainments that can be obtained for that business; and in the effort to get such men they may well pray to be delivered from the Hicklins of all parties. There is one way to get them, and that is by competition open to all before an impartial board.

RESOLUTIONS

Passed at the Annual Meeting of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association, May 16.

The Indiana civil service reform association believes that the purpose of public office of what ever kind is of such a nature as to absolutely exclude the use of such office in any manner as personal or party spoil; and any such use may justly be considered as a violation of the trust undertaken by the acceptance of the office.

2. We desire to express our full appreciation of the present civil service commission whose fearless and efficient performance of its duties has secured the enforcement of the civil service law and has gained many victories for the merit system.

3. A great improvement, however, in one department makes it not the less our duty to point out great evils in the rest of the civil service, comprising more than 100,000 places; nor is it any excuse to say that the present is following in the steps of preceeding administrations.

4. In general this vast number of public offices with annual emoluments of many millions are being parcelled out by the President to congressmen who in turn divide them among their most active personal followers. This is feudalism, and being such it is undemocratic and un-American and is in direct contradiction of the letter and the spirit of the constitution. It is a direct violation of the promises of the platform upon which the administration was elected. As one of the many scandalous and humiliating results of this system we note the boasted displacement of more than 30,000 postmasters in a single year, and the proposed displacement of 10,000 more.

5. We thank our western congressmen, McKinley and Butterworth, and those who joined with them, for their able and successful assistance in beating back the recent attack upon the civil service law. This, and other attacks upon the merit system, we regret to say, were fostered and encouraged by the distribution of offices by the Administration until the appetite for spoils, always insatiable, became too sharp to be controlled.

6. We respectfully request the President to bring all cities having free delivery, within the operation of the civil service law at an early day. And we earnestly insist that the present practice with the unclassified service cannot continue. The offices cannot remain in part spoil and in part competitive.

Believing that the merit system must overcome its opponent, we ask the President and congress to take such measures as will soon bring the operations of the government to an exclusively business basis. Toward this end we ask a careful consideration of the bill introduced by Mr. Lodge to regulate the appointment of fourth-class postmasters.

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

[Address before the New York Association, May 8.]

It is very droll that a practice which was gaily satirized in Steele's Tattler nearly two centuries ago as an absurdity in the local life of London should be gravely defended as a proper and characteristic policy for the greatest and most intelligent of republics. A friend of the Tattler's describes certain solicitations for employment. "Mr. John Taplish, having served all offices and being reduced, desires your vote for singing clerk of the parish." Another "has had ten children, all whom his wife has suckled herself, therefore humbly desires to be a schoolmaster." In this country if Mr. John Taplish, who is reduced in circumstances, or the worthy father of ten children, will both add to those qualifications for public employment a willingness to get up at any hour of the night and ride thirty miles upon the private business of a senator of the United States, we have the senator's own authority for saying that he should consider it a service which ought to be paid for out of the public treasury.

The humor of this proposition, which would certainly have seemed to Dick Steele to require another bottle for its adequate celebration, is greatly heightened by its grave advocacy as a peculiarly American proceeding. But as the distinction of America is self-reliance and fair play, it might be supposed that a system which makes public agents of private servants, which fills the public employment by personal servility and not by proved merit, which practically excludes nine-tenths of the people from all opportunity of such employment and effects a general corruption of politics by patronage, would be considered especially un-American.

DEMOCRATIC STRAWS.

HARRISON is the last president who will ever use the deputy president and patronage boss system to distribute the offices as prizes to the scalawags who do the "dirty work" of the campaign. Members of congress will be compelled to resign as deputy presidents. They can not be congressmen and patronage bosses both. Some of them will be convinced of that before the year is out, but in the mean time they may accept or reject as they please the assurance that the decent people of the country are heartily sick of patronage brokers and patronage bossism.—St. Louis Republic, April 26, 1890.

"I feel the deepest interest in the movement which looks to the success of civil service reform, and would make any reasonable sacrifice to promote its progress. The unfair assaults which have been made upon it will prove abortive if its friends will persevere in their advocacy and good work. It may be my duty to have something to say in the senate, if the enemies of the reform should endeavor to cripple the work."—Senator Butler, of South Carolina.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

The vassal, upon investiture, took an oath of fealty to the lord, and in addition did homage, "openly and humbly kneeling, being unigrt, uncovered and holding up his hands, both together, between those of his lord, who sate before him, and there professing that he did becomes his MAN from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor, and then he received a kiss from his lord."

—An intensely bitter fight has been raging for some time among the republicans at Stanberry, Mo., over the postmastership of that place, in view of the fact that the term of the democratic incumbent expires on the 29th of this month. A few days since the name of Vinson T. Williams, the editor of the Stanberry Herald, was sent to the senate as the successor of Postmaster Dunn. The confirmation followed swiftly, being made on Friday last, but on Monday Al Tomblin, of Stanberry, and one of the leading republicans of the city, appeared here to contest the selection of Williams, and at his request the confirmation of Williams was reconsidered so as to give him an opportunity to present the case to the President. To-day the President issued an order recalling Williams's name, which makes the case interesting, as many republicans of that vicinity have wired the President in Williams's behalf, among them C. O. Patton, a Harrison elector for the third congressional district, and A. R. Stockton, the chairman of the republican county central committee.—Washington Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, March 14.

—He [the President] found, for instance, that the national committee, hoping to win the election without Indiana, was disposed to insist that Indiana should pay its own way and secure the electoral vote of the state for its not very favorite son. Platt, Quay, Clarkson, and Dudley were believed to be willing that Harrison should be beaten in his own state if they could elect him in other states and so put him in the White House with a black eye. Then it was that a conference of the Indiana leaders was called at the Denison House in Indianapolis to hear the candidate's appeal for help. The leaders were implored to raise money. The chairmen of county committees were at the conference addressed by Harrison. After the candidate, with tears in his eyes, had personally told the workers about the refusal of the national committee to furnish any funds, Huston, New, Michener, and other members of the state committee saw them privately. The chairmen were assured that if they would raise the needed money, and get out the vote of their counties so as to carry the state, they should control the patronage of their counties when the President had been safely landed.

In Daviess county a half dozen formed a pool, raised $100 apiece, and bid off the post-office at Washington to M. L. D. Sefrits, proprietor of the Washington Gazette, the arrangement being that the pool men were to be recompensed out of the proceeds of the office after it had been given to the winner.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Nov. 19.

—The ring's candidate for postmaster had not been a soldier, and up came the Grand Army Post with one W. P. Ellis, an old soldier, as an applicant, and the war began. The Grand Army veterans made it very hot for the administration. They demanded the fulfillment of the promises made during the campaign to the soldiers, and threatened vengeance in that locality if one of their number was turned down for a civilian. The contest raged for a considerable time and finally Ellis won, and now the members of the ring who put up the funds have nothing to show for it, and a feeling as though they possessed the proper anatomy if some person with a No. 10 brogan would volunteer to do the kicking.

Mr. Sefrit's organ, the Washington Gazette, recently raised the howl. It said:

Before the Chicago convention the party organizers were all right. They were begged to interest the people in the candidate that the state managers had decided upon. They were implored to manufacture a sentiment which would send the Indiana delegates to Chicago, practically a unit for General Harrison. How well this was accomplished we all know. After the Indiana man had been chosen by the great convention, further responsibilities of the gravest character fell upon the "workers." They cheerfully and unhesitatingly accepted the burden and unstintingly devoted their time, influence and money to the interests of the party's nominee.

Daviess county republicans have been miserably treated, and there is no county in the state that showed better work for the national ticket last year. Yet the organization here was unable to secure the appointment of a postmaster at a village in the north part of the county for a man that the whole neighborhood wanted in the office, and who was a soldier, a reputable gentleman and a good-working republican. Some hidden influence defeated the wish of the whole community, and the persons interested were not even given the satisfaction of knowing how it was done.—Washington Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, Nov. 18.

—PLATT has arranged for taking the census of his state. Superintendent Porter had recommended a man named Doremus, whose services in the taking of the last census fitted him for the position of general superintendent of the 1,000 men necessary for the work in New York City. Platt, however, caused his henchman to be named by the President. The New York Times, March 31, gives the following description:

An illustration of how this little scheme of Platt's works was furnished in the twenty-third assembly district Friday evening. Frank Raymond is the republican boss there. In response to instructions from Mr. Murray (or Platt) he had the stuffy little republican headquarters at 2250 Third avenue packed with such of his henchmen as desired to be appointed to do this census work. The crowd was not a pretty one. It smoked, was profane, and shed tobacco juice profusely.

These patriots were in exact proportion to the number of census enumerators to be appointed. All had filled out applications in advance. Raymond was there, and, taking the applications, he seated himself at a table on a platform where his portly form could be admired by his assembled satellites. Raymond had beside him a couple of workers who examined the republican enlistment roll of the district and checked off the names as the appointments were made.

The process was very simple. Raymond would call off a name. The man who was its proud possessor would go to the platform. Then Boss Raymond would say:

"Are you on the roll?"

The question was purely a perfunctory one, for Raymond well knew that every name he called was on the roll. Then he would ask:

"What district would you like?"

The applicant would choose a district, which, if it had not already been selected, would be assigned to him. Some of the names were not responded to in person, but by men who were supposed to hold some sort of proxies. These men would inform Raymond that the absentees could not possibly attend, but "it was all right."

Thus one hundred or more men were appointed, and the meeting was adjourned to neighboring beer dispensaries. Many of the appointees were respectable-looking, but the majority were henchmen of the most approved type. If the one thousand men to be appointed in this city are to be of the same general variety, the citizens of New York will do well to caution their wives and daughters not to get frightened if, on answering the door during the time that the census is being taken, they encounter rough-looking men.

The capability for the work that these appointees possess, at least in the majority of cases, is very much in doubt. The spirit with which they will enter into it was shown in at least one instance last evening. A person known as "Joe" approached another whom he addressed as "Pete," and said:

"Hello, Pete! Youse don't want this job, do ye?"

"Well, yer can bet I wants the coin in it," was the reply.

"But have yez got the time to do it?"

"Well, I don't waste no time on it, see? If I can't do it nights I don't do it at all, but it's a cinch, a perfect snap."

Both Pete and Joe were appointed to districts.

—The adherents of the Woodruff-Willis [naval officer] faction in the Kings county republican general committee undertook last night to begin the fight for control of the third congressional district. They succeeded in drawing out an adverse vote of nearly two to one. The test came up soon after the general committee met in the Athenæum on Atlantic avenue, when Secretary Barrow read a petition from about two hundred residents of the twenty-third ward, asking for a re-enrollment.

This ward is now controlled by Ernst Nathan, and he thought the fight of last night so important that he attended in person, and from a seat in the gallery directed his subordinates. He recognized that a re-enrollment might mean the loss of his control in the ward, which in turn would signify the defeat of Congressman Wallace's demand for a renomination and the selection of Robert D. Benedict.

The petition called out a number of speeches and propositions, which finally dwindled down to a motion that the whole matter be referred to the delegates of the ward affected. This meant a decided triumph for Nathan, and through him for Wallace. It was adopted by a vote of 114 to 58. It is safe to say that Wallace will get the full vote of the twenty-third ward.—New York Times, May 14.

—The two republican factions held six conventions in this city to-night. It was the culmination of the contest which began on Monday.

The "ins," led by Postmaster W. W. Johnson, and other recent appointees, and the "outs," by William Henderson and other leaders who did not get offices, held separate primaries on Monday, each claiming to be the lawful organization. There were earriagcs for voters, and workers were out in full force. In some wards each faction returned a vote several times larger than the combined vote of both, and each claimed that its delegates were elected. Last night the city convention was opened by Postmaster Johnson. The Henderson faction was not given representation, and it went off and held a convention of its own. To-night each faction held a separate convention in the three legislative districts and adopted resolutions against the other.—New York Times, May 7, Baltimore Dispatch.

—A red-hot post-office fight is on at Clear Lake. To adjust matters Congressman Sweeney has consented to an election, and is to appoint the one receiving the greatest number of votes.—Dispatch from Mason City, Iowa, March 11.

—I am wholly unacquainted with the duties of the office, and do not know when I shall take hold. It is not a civil-service office, and will probably be more or less under the control of politics.—Interview with Collector Mamer in Chicago Times.

ANTI-FEUDALISM.

Mr. Lodge [Mass. Rep].—Now, Mr. Chairman, what is really un-American and un-republican are the favoritism and the nepotism of the patronage system, which must be destroyed by some such means as this law if by no other way. I think it is un-American to see the representatives of the American people hunting up and down the corridors of the department to obtain an office for some friend. * * * It is this which is not American, nor anything else that is respectable or decent or manly, this practice which compels the great officers of the government to give hours and days when a new administration comes in to personal appeals and political appeals and everything of that sort, and which makes senators and representatives wait hour after hour in the hope of picking up a clerkship or messengership for somebody.

Mr. Chairman, the patronage and spoils system is an un-American system. It is a system that was practiced by Sir Robert Walpole one hundred and fifty years ago, and carried by him to the highest point of perfection. It was the system by which the French monarchy sucked the life blood of the people of France. There is nothing American about it. There is nothing American or republican in anything which is all favoritism and personal influence. What is American is fair play and an open field. I do not mean to say that the system that we have substituted is perfect. I have no doubt it has many imperfections—most things have. But it is infinitely better, in my opinion, than the system which it has replaced. We hear in private on every side complaints from gentlemen who belong to the party in power of the way in which their time is taken up, and of the quarrels with which their districts are filled on account of the distribution of offices. Patronage never benefited any man or any party.

As I said in the last congress, your side of the house had the patronage in the last election and there is no evidence that it helped you very much. We had it in the election before. There is no evidence that it helped us then. We have had it since the last election. How much has it helped us since that time? [Laughter.] We have been distributing the patronage of office with a free hand. How much good has it done? Talk about humbug and fraud! I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, where the humbug and fraud come in. They come in in the party conventions which meet and resolve one thing, meaning another. Gentlemen go there and never lift their voices against those fair-seeming resolutions; they do not strike them down in the party conventions or protest against them then and there like honest men. They take them to the people of the United States to build upon and to ask votes upon, because they know that down at the bottom the masses of the people, without going into any great detail as to how it is done, approve civil-service reform and dislike to have these revolutions in office. They know that the people dislike to have the offices made the spoil of party victory.

The people are not greedy for changes in office, and the clamor in your ears is that of a few and not of the many. * * I accepted my party platform in good faith. I accepted that pledge about the civil-service law, as I did others. I do not think it is a sham or a fraud for a party to undertake to uphold that which it has solemnly pledged itself to uphold. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States, in his message, asked increased appropriations for the purpose of carrying out the civil-service law. The gentleman who has stood twice at the head of the democratic ticket as their candidate for the presidency said in a speech in Boston not three months ago that in his judgement the civil-service law was all that stood between the civil-service of the government and political degradation. Those are the opinions of the the two leaders of the two great parties. The platforms of those parties are before you. The fair and honest thing to do is not to stand here and bicker as to who has lived nearest to the law, but to try and make that law better if possible, to try and put these offices on some better footing, upon something more American than a system of back-stairs influence and political intrigue.

One other point. The argument is made over and over again with reference to what is done with the offices which are not under the law but which are filled by patronage, as if that had anything to do with civil service reform. It has nothing in the world to do with it. As to the offices that are filled by political patronage, whether their occupants are turned out and men of a different political faith take their places in one year or in three years makes no difference. It is going to be done on a change of parties. We all know it is going to be done. You did it. We have done it. You can not help it nor can we, for we are bound hand and foot by a vicious system. The only way is to take offices and by law put them out of the reach of patronage. When you talk about the people who are excluded from office by the civil service law, I answer that one in three of the list of eligibles reaches appointment. Now compare that with the old method.

Before the railway mail service went under the civil service law I had sixty applicants from my district for clerkships. Neither I nor any other congressman could have gotten over five of those places. That is one in twelve. The number of people who get office does not depend on the method by which they are selected. It depends on the proportion between the number of places and the number of applicants. With the law you reduce somewhat the number of applicants. With patronage you multiply them. Under the law you cause less of the waiting that maketh the heart sick. You are fairer at least to the people who come here seeking offices, and you have a system which, whatever may be its defects, is, in my judgment, more manly, more honest, more respectable, and more American than hanging about and begging for offices as a personal favor from those who for the moment are supposed to hold them in their gift. [Applause.]

Mr. Henderson [Iowa, Rep.].—Mr. Chairman, civil service has come to this government to stay [applause], and the political party that deserts it will not stay, and ought not to. [Applause.] * * * I say to my associates on this side of the house, that I helped to make the platform in 1888. I believed in it then. I believe in it now, and I am here to act upon my convictions. Upon that platform we carried the country in 1888.

We carried the best thought and sentiment of the country, and I say to my associates, do not now in this indirect way desert that great standard of principles and turn your backs upon the people of this country who put you into power and responsibility in the weighty issues of that great campaign. I do not want to go back to the old spoils system. I want to get further away from it. I want the lawmaker to be able to make laws and to equip himself for doing so, and not to become a mere lackey for the spoils system. In the name of progress, now that we have advanced the standard, let us keep hold of it, stand under it, fight for it, and perfect a law which was born of much thought, of much conflict, and which, whatever any political party may desire, the people of this country will never desert. [Applause.] * * *

PRO

Mr. Perkins [Kansas, Rep.].—I believe that the administration in power ought to stand by the men who have conferred honors on it and made it possible for it to administer the affairs of this great nation. I would not have it reward those who are unworthy or who have been guilty of unlawful or corrupt practices; but I know there are men who have been active day after day in working in the interests of their party, who are just as honest, just as faithful, just as efficient and capable to perform the duties that might be assigned to them in the service of the government as the men who pass civil-service examinations, and who are without political convictions.

* * *

Mr. Cheadle [Indiana, Rep.].—Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of striking out this section because I am opposed to the whole theory of the civil service reform law. It is un-American in all its provisions. Its purpose is to build up a class of office-holders for life who will be exempt from all the burdens and obligations of citizenship. * *

Mr. Tracey. Did you not promise to sustain the civil service law?

Mr. Cheadle. I may have made a quasi promise, but I did not consider it an essential factor of my political faith. I want to tell my friend from New York [Mr. Tracey] that I believe this is a government of the people, and I am opposed to class legislation, and because this civil service law is class legislation I am opposed to it, and the people that I have the honor to represent here are just as much opposed to it as I am.

[The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the objects of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.—Republican Platform, 1884.]

[The men who abandoned the republican party in 1884 and continue to adhere to the democratic party have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finances, of freedom and purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs or because their candidate has broken his. We therefore repeat our declaration of 1884, to wit: "The reform of civil service, auspiciously begun under the republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided."—Republican Platform, 1887.]

Mr. Spinola [New York, Tam. Dem.].—This scheme has proved to be infamous. That is what I mean to say, and the longer it continues the more obnoxious does it become to the people. As I told you before, the reasons are that it is absolutely un-American, and it is absolutely in conflict with the principles upon which our government is founded. It creates a class in this country, and will ultimately lead to a burden upon our posterity by the creation of a civil-service pension-list. You can not avoid it. They will tell you that whenever a man has served the government his whole life he ought to be put upon the pension-roll to be taken care of in his old age.

FEUDALISM.

Representatives, April 23, 25 and 26, 1890.

FEUDALISM.

Mr. Grosvenor [Ohio, Rep.].—The republican platform adopted at Chicago in 1888 did not approve and indorse the present civil-service law and this faulty system of administration, nor did it promise to stand by the present civil service commission. It is the general principle of civil service and the purification of the civil service that that platform speaks about. * * *

Mr. Clements.—I only want to ask the gentleman from Ohio what civil-service system it is that the party at Chicago was in favor of?

Mr. Grosvenor.—To turn the democratic party out of power and put the republican party in. [Great applause.]

I do not believe that under the system of government under which we live there ought to be a power subordinate, or collateral, perhaps, is a better word, to the responsible administration of the government, that shall be permitted to have anything to do with the control of appointments, or the establishment of a system of civil service in the country, or the promotion of a class of individuals to be favored by a permanent occupancy of the places under the government. [Renewed applause.] That is my view of this whole business; and Mr. Chairman, I have no time to elaborate upon the principle underlying my views. I believe that the present organization of the civil service commission is faulty, feeble in administration, unworthy of the high place that it occupies in this government, and I couple together the effect of its administration and the administration itself * * *.

[Under the constitution the president and heads of departments are to make nominations for office; the senate is to advise and consent to appointments, and the house of representatives is to accuse and prosecute faithless officers. The best interest of the public service demands that these distinctions be respected; that senators and representatives who may be judges and accusers should not dictate appointments to office.—Republican platform, 1876.]

[The republican party, adhering to the principles affirmed by its last national convention of respect for the constitutional rules governing appointments to office, adopts the declaration of President Hayes.—Republican platform, 1880.]

* * * I am told that there are to-day on the eligible list persons who have had an examination before this commission in various portions of this country, young men and young women who are certified to be eligible to office, sufficient to fill the places for twenty-five years to come under the reasonable expectations of accidents and casualties of death and resignation; and yet hundreds of men and women in my congressional district and all over the country are being inveigled and cajoled or urged to go to Columbus, to Parkersburgh, Cincinnati, or elsewhere and spend their money and time to be examined before this commission when there is not one chance in a thousand that one of them will get a position, and all of which is known to the commission when it sends out its invitations. * * *

Take my district. It is a district with plenty of schools and colleges. My constituents, as a rule, are educated people; people of refinement and character. A large number—I do not know how many—have applied, been examined, and passed successfully for high positions under this system, and yet outside of two or three who have found their way into the postal service under the restrictions and limitations as to geographic location, which aided them, I have not been informed of one who has found a place in the classified service from my congressional district. I know that my district far excels in education the districts which have produced at least two of the civil service commission. I know that ten thousand of my people are better educated than the people of their districts are in like numbers, and yet after having been marked up to the highest grades they have been allowed to go on until they have lapsed, and so far as I know not one clerical position has been assigned to my congressional district.

ANTI-FEUDALISM.

Mr. Moore [Rep., N. H.].—I believe thoroughly, in the first place, that every element of patronage, no matter how high or how low, should be eliminated from connection with the American house of representatives. I believe, secondly, that the constitution does not warrant, that it never did warrant, and that it never was contemplated that representatives in congress should have any connection whatever with the patronage of the government. I challenge any man on this floor to point out to me one single word uttered in any of the conventions that discussed the original constitution, whether it be the convention that sat in Philadelphia or whether it be the conventions that sat in the several states, where any speaker ever suggested, directly or remotely, that the American house of representatives should have any connection with patronage. * *

There has grown up in this country a perversion of the constitution by which a connection has been established between the law-makers and appointments. This is wholly outside of and in direct violation of the plain letter, spirit, and genius of the constitution itself. * *

The assaults made on the civil service law, and especially on the civil service commission, are without parallel in our history. The law has been derided and held up to public contempt, by politicians and journalists, in and out of season, and the commission has been pursued, maligned, and persecuted in the very capital of the nation, in a manner and to an extent that have been a scandal and a disgrace to journalism and justice.

The civil service law has now been upon the statute books for nearly seven years. Its work can be measured and weighed, and the friends of the law only ask that it shall thus be treated. The following statement shows the work achieved by the law and its execution for the six years ending June 30, 1889:

It was stated by the distinguished representative of the fifteenth Ohio district. General Grosvenor, in his remarks on Wednesday, that he knew of no person who had secured an appointment in the classified service from his district. The misleading and astonishing character of this statement must go with the fact that the commission have made eight such appointments, aside from four appointments in the railway mail service. As there are twenty-one congressional districts in Ohio the absolute fact is that the fifteenth Ohio district has had more than its proportion of the 113 to which the state is entitled.

So as to Minnesota. The distinguished gentleman from that state, Mr. Dunnell, said he knew of but one appointment to the classified service from his state. The absolute fact is that under the operation of the law the enterprising youth of Minnesota have secured twenty-six appointments in the classified service, only two less than her quota. * * *

Mr. Greenhalge [Mass., Rep.].—I stand here as a civil service reformer, if I am only one of a dozen in this house. I did not expect to be called upon to defend this principle, in which I believe there is life and energy and immortality. I did not expect to be called upon by my republican associates on this floor to defend what I supposed had been written into the political law of the republican party. I did not expect to hear these attacks from the other side when I remembered that the same political principle had been written into their platform.

Why, Mr. Chairman, are we to stand here as mere hypocrites and humbugs? Are we to listen quietly to these statements that when we write a declaration into a party platform we do not mean it, but that we consider it is put in for "buncombe"? * * I certainly do not believe it of the republican party; I have faith that every word about civil service reform was honest and true, yet we have gentlemen sitting here who say these declarations were meant simply for "buncombe," for sound, for show. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me tell you why that declaration was put there in both platforms. They put it there because the politicians who attended these conventions heard the voice of the American people demanding that it should be put there! These sagacious gentlemen, these practical politicians, never put anything in those platforms unless it means business; unless it is going to count; unless it is the sentiment which will do the most good with the voting population of the country. I say, Mr. Chairman, it is encouraging to hear on this floor; not direct and manly attacks upon this principle—it is encouraging to hear only attacks upon the manner in which the principle has been carried out and applied. I like to hear the charges and the countercharges hurled from side to side—criminations as to the manner in which the principle was violated under the last administration.

I like to hear the charges of violations of this principle under the present administration. It means the health, the welfare, and the salvation of the law. All we have to do with the matter to-day, Mr. Chairman, is to say this: "The principle of civil service reform has been written into the political law of both parties; it has been written upon the statute books of the United States."

Mr. Hill [Illinois, Rep.].—No one who has seen, even from a distance, even with this civil service law on the statute book, the tremendous pressure for office upon this and the preceding administration, can for a moment doubt that some method of relieving each incoming administration from that pressure should be provided.

This is not the occasion, nor have I now the time, to point out the evils of such a system, but, Mr. Chairman, I hope to see the time when great political parties will be organized and run, and when political campaigns will be fought and won, on great principles, questions of policy affecting the well-being of people at home and abroad, and not for the purpose of dividing the spoils of office.

Mr. Chairman, political patronage is an element of weakness, and not of strength, to a party. All experience shows this. Every member on this floor knows that as a fact. The history of this as well as the preceding administration demonstrates its truth. Look at it, sir. Reflect for a moment upon the reverses which overtook the Cleveland administration four years ago, and which have now overtaken this administration at the polls.

What does it mean? Simply this. That five out of every six, yes, nine out of ten, candidates for office are disappointed and show their resentment by staying away from the polls.

The republican party is now experiencing the ruinous effects of that appetite for office. It is, as I said, an element of weakness and not of strength, and will ruin any party that tolerates or encourages the system. * * *

ANTI-FEDERALISM.

Mr. Cutcherson [Mich., Rep.] The question before us is, shall we abolish the civil service commission and return to the old system of appointments through the influence of members of congress, or shall we continue in its present or some modified form the civil service commission?

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this motion. I am opposed to it at the present time, and in its present form; and I am opposed to the abolition of the civil service commission at any time or in any form. Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to be understood by that to say the present system is not to be criticised or that it can not be improved; but I do mean to be understood that the appointments to office should be continued in the executive departments of this government, and ought not now or ever to be again remitted to the control of senators and members of congress, who are the legislative department. There is an ancient instrument, not yet forgotten or entirely obsolete, called the constitution of the United States. * * *

In brief, the constitution of the United States provides that appointment to office is an executive function; that it is not a legislative function; that it belongs to the president and to the heads of departments; and that it does not belong to senators and members of congress. I am opposed to this indirect nullification of this provision of the constitution of the United States; I am opposed to this proposition to give to senators and members of congress the powers that belong solely and legitimately to the president of the United States and the heads of the departments. I am opposed to it, first, because it is unconstitutional; because it is an attempted nullification of that ancient instrument. I am opposed to it, in the second place, because it interferes with the proper and orderly discharge of the duties of members of congress. We are a legislative body, and we have no business with the appointments. We have no cause to meddle in this matter of filling the subordinate places in the government.

Our business is here, to make laws; and it is the function of the president and heads of the departments to fill the offices in the executive departments and to execute the law. I am thankful to be able to say that since I have been a member of congress, now nearly eight years, I have never yet secured the appointment of a clerk in any department of this government. It does not belong to me and I do not covet it. Neither do I believe in the benefit of having the appointment of fourth-class postmasters. It has always injured the member who does it. Almost invariably there are from two to half a dozen candidates. But one of them can have the place, and the others are dissatisfied. I would gladly see the law so modified that it would extend to the appointment of all executive offices, so that representatives should not be called upon to recommend or advise appointments. Now, because these men and women are appointed to office by the advice or influence of members of congress they cease to look to the faithful and proper performance of their duties that the law imposes upon them, but look to their "congressional influence" for retaining their places. How often have we heard that expression in Washington? "Congressional influence!" I have heard it here over and over again until I am nauseated with the word.

Congressional influence! What ought congressional influence have to do with keeping a man or a woman in some clerkship in one of these departments? Nothing! The tenure of office ought to depend upon the faithful discharge of the duties which the law imposes upon the incumbent, and not upon congressional or other official influence. [Applause.]

Mr. Butterworth [Ohio, rep.].—Mr. Chairman, I want to endorse every word that my honored colleague [Mr. McKinley] has said in this behalf. The civil service system which is assailed is not of recent origin. It is the result of a healthy evolution. It has come to stay and grow.

Sir, the campaign of 1882 was won by the democracy because we were charged, and it was believed, that we were filling the offices, not with free and intelligent men, but with mere political retainers. "Monarchical!" There is nothing that smacks of "monarchical" forms so much as the "spoils" system, under which a man stands here, not the representative of the people, but the special representative of retainers who go at his beck and nod—political "bummers" who become stronger than the free intelligent citizens who stand by his side. In other words, we expect to return to our places, not upheld by the virtue and intelligence of the constituents we represent, but by gathering together retainers and packing the conventions with all that that implies.

We can, as my colleague here suggests, trust the republican boys and girls of this country to win their way by merit. If not, our government is a failure altogether.

One gentleman says that we knew nothing of corruption under the old system. Why, he has forgotten the history of his own country. Has he read the Covode investigation, under the administration of James Buchanan, showing that there was hardly a congressional district, there was not a navy-yard, in fact there was not a place in the country where there was not a host of mere political retainers, not employed to discharge any duty in which the people were interested, but appointed simply for political service? And at that time the land was filled with men who served no other mission upon earth than to be the mere political pimps of men who were a political power in the nation.

Sir, we went out of power on that issue. We are in power to-day because we promptly passed this civil-service law. My colleague has well said that that law is here to stay, and stay it will.

Mr. McKinley [Ohio, Rep.].—Mr. Chairman, if the republican party of this country is pledged to any one thing more than another it is to the maintenance of the civil service law and its efficient execution—not only that, but to its enlargement and its further application to the public service.

The law that stands upon our statute books to day was put there by republican votes. It was a republican measure. Every national platform of the republican party since its enactment has declared not only in favor of its continuance in full vigor, but in favor of its enlargement so as to apply more generally to the public service. And this, Mr. Chairman, is not alone the declaration and purpose of the republican party, but it is in accordance with its highest and best sentiment—ay, more, it is sustained by the best sentiment of the whole country, republican and democratic alike. And there is not a man on this floor who does not know that no party in this country, democratic or republican, will have the courage to wipe it from the statute book or amend it save in the direction of its improvement.

Look at our situation to-day. When this party of ours has control of all the branches of the government it is proposed to annul this law by withholding appropriations for its execution, when for four years under a democratic administration nobody on this side of the house had the temerity to rise in his place and make a motion similar to the one now pending for the nullification of this law. We thought it was good then, good enough for a democratic administration; and I say to my republican associates, it is enough for a republican administration; it is good and wholesome for the whole country. If the law is not administered in letter and spirit impartially, the President can and will supply the remedy. Mr. Chairman, the republican party must take no backward step. The merit system is here, and it is here to stay, and we may just as well understand and accept it now, and give our attention to correcting the abuses, if any exist, and improving the law wherever it can be done to the advantage of the public service.

PRO

Mr. Houk [Tenn., Rep.].—I do not believe in this "fifth wheel to the wagon;" but this commission is inconsistent with the teachings of American institutions, unrepresentative of anybody except the gentlemen who presume they are sanctified politically and have a right to pass on the rights of everybody else. * *

Mr. McMillin. Did you vote for the civil service bill heretofore?

Mr. Houk. I think possibly I did. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMillin. I merely wanted to refresh my friend's memory in that connection, for I think he did vote for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Houk. If he had taken the trouble to look at what I previously said at that time, the gentleman would have found that I did not want to allow anybody to be any bigger hypocrite than I was, for I considered there was much hypocrisy on the part of the professional civil service reformers. [Laughter.]

* * * They ought to see that the boys who carry the torches, who hand out the tickets, who go out into the highways and hedges and compel the voters to come in, should have the places and have the courage to say so. The people of this country will never sanction a policy that authorizes a public man to say, "I am elected to congress," "I am in the White House," or "I am in the cabinet; I have got a good position, but you boys who rallied round the polls and sent me and others into these high places, you may stand back; there is nothing for you unless the civil service commission prescribes it for you." [Laughter.]

[Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing.—Republican Platform, 1872.]

* * *

Mr. Coleman [La., Rep.].—Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the motion to strike out. I am opposed to "civil service reform," and feeling that way I feel justified in striking at it whenever I can and wherever I can, for the purpose of helping to kill it if I can.

* * *

Mr. Dannel [Minn., Rep.].—It can not be said for the republican party that it has in all respects observed the spirit of the civil service law.

We are treating fourth-class postmasters very much as Cleveland treated them. I am aware that these offices are not within the civil service law. * * *

We have been having examinations for places in the various departments now going on for a number of years past. Young men and women in Minnesota have gone to St. Paul, to Des Moines, and to Chicago to be examined for these places, but from all of these examinations but one young man has been appointed from my congressional district under the civil service system.

These young people have spent hundreds of dollars to little avail, for hardly a man has been appointed. It has been to them a delusion and a snare.

Mr. Chairman, let me ask you whether the postal service is any better to-day than it was six years ago. No man can say that it is. It is no better than it was two years ago. [Applause on the democratic side.] It will be no better two years hence than it is now. The young men who now get in are not better than the young men the members of congress took from the farms and the workshops, intelligent young men, and brought into the mail service in the years gone by. There is a man in one of the departments here to-day that I put there nineteen years ago, who stands exceedingly high in that department. I took him from the farm; he was an upright, earnest young man. He could not have passed, perhaps, the civil service examination; he could not tell you when the next eclipse of the sun would occur. [Laughter.]

FEUDALISM.

Representatives, April 23, 25 and 26, 1890.

FEUDALISM.

Mr. Biggs [Cal., Dem.]—Sir, Thomas Jefferson was the author of the doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils. [Cries of "Jackson!" "Jackson!"]

Mr. Biggs. No, sir; Jefferson was the author of the doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils. If any one denies it I will send my authority to the clerk's desk and have it read. Thomas Jefferson was the author of that doctrine, but General Jackson and Governor Marcy gave it a more defined and wider application. That is what the historian says, and I challenge any man, republican or democrat, to deny it. [Laughter.] I am that kind of a civil service reformer. [Laughter.] I will tell you what is the fact: I never visited that civil service reform office but what I felt as if there was something in the atmosphere that inspired a desire in me to steal something. [Laughter.]

Those are the facts. I tell you this civil service was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity. [Renewed laughter.] Who was the father of it? George Pendleton was the father, George Curtis was the granny, Dorman Eaton was the nurse and elout, washer of this infamous bill. [Laughter.] Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon! If there ever was a corrupt measure, a measure that is demoralizing, and that has received the condemnation of the American people, it is this iniquitous, accursed, civil service reform law. [Great laughter.] Sir, I have had one hundred to two hundred men in my employ, and I insist that I was a more competent judge of their qualifications than any civil service reform commission ever could be. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. Biggs. I ask for about two minutes more.

The Chairman. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California, that he be allowed to proceed?

There was no objection.

Mr. Biggs. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this bill, but I ask this house, republicans and democrats, to come to the front and wipe out the appropriation made necessary by this odious, iniquitous law. The idea of having three men sit up there at the city hall and pass upon the qualifications of people seeking office! What do they do? I will tell you. I sent a lady friend of mine there, a native daughter of the golden west. I sent her there and they promised to give her a position. She stood 87 high on the roll in her examination. They kept her here eleven months and twenty days and gave her no position at all. [Great laughter.]

I will tell you a little incident that occurred between Mr. Cleveland and myself. I have got time have I not? [Laughter.] [Cries of "Yes." "yes!" "Go on!"] I was here in Washington before I was a member of congress, and as I had been a presidential elector, Mr. Cleveland sent me a note requesting me to call and see him. I went and called on him. He met me very cordially. There were some one hundred or two hundred gentlemen there waiting, and I said, "I will not trespass on your time, Mr. President." "Oh," said he, "you have come as far as any other gentleman, and you have a right to be heard."

Mr. Spinola. And that was about all he did for you? [Laughter.]

Mr. Biggs. I will tell you about that. Says I, "Mr. President, I want no office."

Mr. Henderson, of Iowa. That was a great relief.

Mr. Biggs. Says I, "Mr. President, I want no office, nobody turned out or put in, but," said I, "I differ with you, Mr. President, upon the civil service reform question. I admit that it is the law; it was in the platform on which you were elected, and in your letter of acceptance also; but you have a right to construe it in your own way." "Major Biggs," the President replied, "what would you do if you were in my place?" "Well," said I, "Mr. President, it is infinitely better to obey a bad law than to violate it; but if I were in your place I would put a very liberal construction on that law." [Great laughter.] I went a little further than that, and I said to him: "If I were in a water melon patch I would get all the best melons I could." [Laughter.]

ANTI-FEDUALISM.

Mr. McComas [Md. Rep.]—The republican party has never been able to break its pledges without paying the penalty. This is a cowardly attempt to nullify the existing law. Why do I say it is cowardly? The republican party are not ordinarily nullifiers. If we face something as a party, we march forward, take our ground and stand upon it. But this back-door way of attacking the civil service commission now established by law by attempting to starve it out is dishonorable and unworthy of a great party that won a glorious victory on a dozen pledges, in the front of which it puts its solemnly repeated pledge that it would stand by this reform when the democratic party failed to stand by its pledge for civil service reform.

What is the result of this proposition? For seven years under the existing law and by its invitation you have sent a hundred thousand men and women and young girls from the farms and villages up to the cities of the country where you have held your examinations; and they have been placed on the eligible list—one hundred thousand of them last year—many of them poor. They are hoping that you meant what you said when they went to be examined. They found that 22 per cent. of those examined had been placed on the rolls of government employment last year, and they thought that they had one chance out of four this year of appointment if you should keep your pledge. They are relying on your honor, your party's honor, to give them the opportunity which was promised them under the law. * * *

I now say, Mr. Chairman, that we as the republican party, on that distinct and unequivocal pledge, the most distinct and explicit that ever was made by any party, would stultify our party and humiliate ourselves if we dared to attempt in any such manner to sneakily try to evade the responsibility of the law. [Applause.] We dare not. This system has come to stay, and ours it is to faithfully administer it.

Over and above the clamor here, over and above the desire for office that many men have, over and above the natural desire I have in common with other men in behalf of the aspirations of men who are good and true, I say when it comes to forfeiting my honor and that of my party I would rather leave public life and be a decent private citizen than to surrender that over and despoil my party and its pledges made twice in the terms I read. I had rather go home and preserve my self respect than to undertake to repudiate those pledges by accepting the proposition made here and vote out of this bill an appropriation which we are in honor bound to sustain. [Applause.] * * *

Mr. Tracey [New York, Dem.]—Mr. Chairman, I wish to allude to the President of the United States only in respectful terms, and I am well aware that human endurance is sorely tried by constant appeals for places which can only be supplied by removals, and I make some excuse for the executive not having lived up to his professions; but his failure to do so has been a great mistake, and that he has failed is most distinctly shown in the numerous cases where he has removed worthy officials before the expiration of their terms, such instances of removal being by his direct personal act. In my own district two presidential postmasters were removed in this manner, entirely without cause, so far as I am informed.

The president should be credited with having made two admirable appointments to the commission. Messrs. Roosevelt and Thompson are gentlemen of the highest character, who, with their colleague, will, I am sure, carry out the requirements of the law without fear or favor; but, Mr. Chairman, what will it avail to have made these men commissioners if the postmaster-general, his first assistant, and the superintendent of the railway mail service are to be allowed to conspire to violate both the spirit and the letter of the law? It has been done in the district which I have the honor to represent, where excellent railway mail clerks have been removed and men illegally appointed in their places.

Mr. Chairman, the President, in looking back upon the first year of his administration must realize that members of his cabinet and subordinate officers have either forced or induced him to act contrary to the line of duty his promises as a candidate called for; and he may well question whether these persons have been unselfish friends. His predecessor, and opponent, to my mind, had earnestly endeavored, under much more trying circumstances, to elevate the civil service, and as a consequence had alienated a portion of his party, while at the same time losing the support of many former friends, who were attracted by the unexpected proffer made by the present executive to take even a more advanced stand for civil service reform than was demanded by the most enthusiastic advocates of its cause.

Indeed, many hold to the opinion that in the states of New York and Indiana this course attracted a sufficient number of voters to the republican ticket to account for its success in both those states.

The cause of good government is dear to us all, and laws which have been enacted to benefit the people should not be obstructed by a refusal on our part to give the necessary amounts for enforcing them, nor by short-sighted political tricksters trying to evade their requirements.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, if any change be made in this appropriation for the civil service it should be an increase, and that congress should encourage and direct the commissioners to carry out the law and assist them in efforts to secure punishment for all who violate it, even if heads of departments or cabinet officers are made to suffer. Let those officials, whether in this city or in any part of the country, who sneer at the law, not forget that severe penalties, including fine and imprisonment, may be inflicted upon those who transgress, and that the president of the United States, after all, may not have the desire, if he has the power, to shield them from the consequences of wrong-doing.

The friends of reform owe a great debt of gratitude to its enemies in congress for recently establishing this fact still more plainly. If any man doubted the hold of reform upon public opinion the doubt was removed by the late debate in the house of representatives upon the appropriation for the civil service commission. The pricking of the bubble of reform, the overthrow of lunar politics and sentimental quackery were duly announced as about to occur. The field was chosen, the charge was sounded, but more ludicrous skirmishing was never seen. "I have led my ragamuffins where they were peppered," ruefully exclaimed the perspiring Falstaff, and surely never were recruits more sorely peppered than the spoilsmen in the house. They were first overwhelmed by the weight of ability and political standing, then crushed by the vote of two to one. The good cause was maintained, not doubtfully and with hesitation, not apologetically and reluctantly, but aggressively and without reservation. The argument was placed where it belongs, upon the public and party advantage of reform. Its advocates gladly professed their faith in it as truly American and reasonable. They spoke as patriots and honest men, conscious of a host of patriotic and honest men behind them.—George William Curtis.

—There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press. We have learned, too, from our own as well as the experience of other countries, that golden shackles, by whomsoever or by whatever pretense imposed, are as fatal to it as the iron bonds of despotism.—PRESIDENT WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

Failing and John A. Place, both of this city, were being urged for the position, letters were sent by all the clergymen of Oswego and many of the most prominent citizens, representing the pre-eminent fitness of Mr. Failing. On the other hand, strong protests were sent in against the unfitness, on moral grounds, of Mr. Place. No candid person in Oswego will deny that the respectable people of Oswego entertained the strongest preference for Mr. Failing. THE SCOPE AND DIFFICULTIES OF CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

[An address by Charles J. Bonaparte, delivered at the annual meeting of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association at Fort Wayne, May 16.]

In any enterprise it is a condition of success to know what we want; mistakes, disappointments and discouragement are inevitable if the results really sought are imperfectly understood. I believe that many, perhaps most, civil service reformers err in that they underestimate the magnitude of their undertaking; they recognize this to be the destruction of the "spoils" system of politics, but they fail to appreciate how this system has become interwoven with almost every phase of our national life. Some of them said, probably a majority thought, when their agitation first took definite shape through the formation of local associations and of the national league that when a statute such as they wished had been enacted by congress, their work would be virtually done; the law thus obtained would work automatically and its benefits be so obvious that similar legislation by states and municipalities would follow as a matter of course. I need not pause to point out their error; seven years of experience have done this so clearly that no one, however predisposed to optimism, certainly no one living either in Indiana or Maryland, can now believe that this law has power (any more than any law which the wit of man ever devised) to work "automatically," or that our politicians admire and would extend the effects of its practical working. But that such should have been, as it unquestionably was, the expectation of many earnest reformers proves them to have very inadequately appreciated how complete a revolution their success would work, not merely in the dispatch of our public business, but in the entire machinery of our politics, proved indeed that they failed to realize what are the political institutions under which we live.

This failure is neither so surprising nor so blameworthy as it might seem at first sight; even intelligent and well informed Americans have some excuse for not knowing who are

THEIR TRUE RULERS.

No doubt it is a trite saying that the English constitution was not made but grew. We all know that agencies and customs, unmentioned in the written law, gradually became their instruments of government and invariable rules for public men, so that, by a striking anomaly, the mutual relations of the law-making bodies are determined by a mere tacit understanding and general acquiescence, and the constitution of the country, which has been here solemnly declared "the supreme law of the land," does not there rise to the dignity of a law at all. But it is not so easy to realize that we also entrust the substance of political power to extra-legal forces, and only its form to those recognized in the statute-book; that here not less than in our mother country, and notwithstanding our numerous and frequently varied written constitutions, political institutions of over-mastering weight and importance have grown up amongst us, of which no trace can be found in these and which, as in England, have reduced the nominal sovereign to a dignified nonentity.

A ready illustration of this is at hand. It can hardly be doubted that the president of the United States for the term succeeding the present will be nominated at either the next republican or the next democratic national convention. Their organization and proceedings, the characters, sentiments, aims, desires, prejudices of the delegates chosen to form them, will be facts of the greatest weight in determining who shall next occupy the White House. Yet a foreigner, knowing us only through a study of our constitution, would not suspect this; he would find nothing in our laws suggesting the power or even the existence of either of these bodies, or the importance to the country of their selection and conduct. On the contrary, he would attach consequence to the composition of a totally different body, one so shadowy in its powers, so mechanical in its duties, that most of us forget its very being. Of the millions of voters who cast their ballots in November, 1892, I doubt if one in a hundred will even read the names of the figure-heads printed on them as electors, much less reflect that the men so named, if elected, have the right conferred, and even the duty imposed, upon them by the constitution of each one exercising his personal, unbiased judgment in recording his vote for president. Yet this independent judgment in the electoral college was certainly contemplated by the framers of our constitution and was exercised, to a greater or less extent, in the earlier elections held under it: since its adoption nominating conventions have developed as new organs in our body politic, and there has been what naturalists call a "correlated atrophy" of the organ whose functions they have usurped.

To answer the question: By what institutions are we now practically governed? we must first understand its meaning. When we say that Russia or Turkey is "governed" by the czar or the sultan, we do not mean that his will directly controls or his wishes immediately affect every act of the public administration: the most despotic monarch must act through agents, and the test of his dominion is not the extent to which he retains or delegates his powers, but whether he remains the sole source of official life. The man or organization that creates and destroys the depositaries of power is the true sovereign, however indirectly he or it may govern, and to know who are our present rulers, we must discover by whom are presidents, and governors, and mayors, and congressmen, and assemblymen and aldermen, made and unmade.

The question thus stated, the answer is easy. The United States are now governed calling themselves respectively the republican and the democratic parties, having each a general organization for national, and divisions and sub-divisions for state and municipal purposes, and whose activity extends to the remotest portions of our territory and to the humblest manifestations of our public life. Although they assume the name of "parties" the term misleads; for they differ essentially from political parties in all other enlightened countries, and from those known here before the present generation. Here formerly and elsewhere now, parties were and are organizations of men entertaining similar views on questions of public policy, and combining to obtain practical acceptance for their views. Of course, legislative and some executive offices were always and are everywhere the immediate prizes of political contests, for through their possession only can practical effect be given to the principles of the victorious party. Moreover, in all times and in all countries unprincipled men will be found who mask the schemes of self-interest under an affectation of patriotism; and those placed in positions of public trust will sometimes abuse their patronage for partisan or personal advantage. But everywhere else, and, until these days, here, offices have been, avowedly, at least, a means only; the end of a party, the reason of its life, has been to promote or defeat some measure more or less definite, of legislation or administration, and the use of ministerial offices to reward partisan services, has been, for all statesmen but those of our day and country, a form of bribery practiced, no doubt, but never defended and but little, if at all, less odious than the simple purchase of votes or influence for money.

BY TWO IMMENSE CORPORATIONS,

But for our parties to obtain the principal executive offices, and through them those in their gift, is the whole end and reason of existence; far from wishing the offices to carry out a policy, they fear above all things to advocate an intelligible policy, lest it may cost them the offices.

The question vastly exceeding any other in importance to our national parties, indeed the only question which truly interests them at all, is whether after the 4th of March, 1893, a democratic president shall distribute many thousands of federal offices to democrats, or a republican president shall reserve them for republicans. As a national organization the one party has no other aim than to seek these offices, the other, no purpose but to keep them; for analogous reasons do they exist and contend in every state and division of a state throughout the Union.

An American political party is kept up for purposes as strictly interested as a railroad or life insurance company; the sentiments of its platform mean no more than the devotion to the public to be found in a prospectus of the former, or the longing to care for the widow and orphan professed in the circulars of the latter; they are advertisements and nothing more. The very men who prepare them look with undisguised contempt upon any one who takes them more seriously: a politician of to-day can hardly conceive of a party with other ends than to secure support at public expense for as many as possible of its members; that citizens should combine for any other purpose seems to him absurd and visionary.

The whole purpose of our parties, being they are correspondingly organized. Their leaders are prominent office-holders or those who will become such if the party succeed; their active members are the incumbents of petty offices, or such as hope to dispossess them; their revenues are derived from assessments on official salaries supplemented by the investments of capitalists having contracts to obtain or taxes to evade. Every public office, however responsible, or however humble, that of chief justice of the supreme court or that of a village lamp-lighter, is for our politicians simply current coin to excite and reward partisan activity. An association of this character possesses a permanence and cohesion which no ordinary party could acquire; such a party dissolves when the end for which it was formed has been attained or become clearly unattainable; and one result or the other will ordinarily be reached before many years. But as the object of these associations is one never to be irrevocably effected, there is no reason why they should not endure for all time. So long as the only distinction between republicans and democrats is that the former hold some offices which the latter covet, and the latter hold some which the former covet, the present parties may last as long as we allow offices to be bestowed for party reasons. There will never come a time, while both human nature and our institutions remain the same, when those who wish for places need finally despair of ousting those who have them.

Moreover, although no ruling power can wholly escape the influence of public opinion, our political corporations are singularly free from it. However unpopular outside of, or even within, the party organization, may be the candidate finally chosen, he can count upon the regular party workers. Politicians support him, not from respect or affection, but from self-interest; he may not be the man they would like to see in the place to which he aspires, but, if he is the regular nominee, no one else can do the work they must have done; only he will be bound to put or keep them in office, and keep or put their opponents out. Formerly a commonplace but effective check was imposed on parties by the necessity of appealing to the public for their campaign funds; the popularity of their nominee was fairly measured by the readiness and liberality with which his wealthier supporters subscribed, and a candidate thoroughly distasteful to the more intelligent classes of the community must have been rich enough to dispense with pecuniary assistance. But political managers have no longer this fear before their eyes; office-holders and office-seekers subscribe with what would be amazing liberality, considering their means, were the sums given really gifts; they are, however, simply investments. The givers know that if their party goes or stays out, they all certainly go or stay out of public employment with it; if it stays, or comes in, each of them has the chance, at least, to stay or come in also. The worst man of their party may give or leave them the means of earning their living; the best man of the other is sure to do neither.

These two powerful corporations have reduced the legal sovereign of the country, that is to say, the people of the United States, to a condition of closely resembling that of the titular ruler of Great Britain. Queen Victoria has nominally all and more than the powers of Queen Elizabeth; but she can exercise these powers only through her ministers, and these are chosen virtually, though indirectly, by the house of commons. She is treated with such outward deference as to conceal the contrast between her legal and her practical authority, and she is not quite a nullity in the government; she would be held justified in refusing a minister on reasonable grounds offensive to her. But the ruler of England is the leader of the commons; sustained by them, he owes the crown a little formality of manner and a little hypocrisy of language. So the American people has never in form abdicated its sovereignty, but its nominal servants are the creatures of one or other political party. It may be sated with fulsome adulation, but it retains only the shadow of power. The mass of our citizens come to the polls, not to choose their rulers, but at most, to record a preference between nominees of two usurping monopolies, selected by each to do its own work, and with scarcely a thought of their fitness for the work of the people. Only in those extreme cases, when the glaring, monstrous impropriety of candidacies makes them insults to the dignity of the nation, will the latter sometimes really exercise its right of choice. As a rule every successful candidate is conscious that he owes his position, not to the confidence of his fellow-citizens, but the favor of an office-seeking organization, that to it he must above all give satisfaction as a place-jobber, and may then safely devote to his legitimate duties the leavings of his time and the dregs of his energy.

What I have said may be met by the objection, that the two great national parties taken together embrace, for practical purposes, the entire electorate; therefore the one successful at the polls is shown to include a majority of the voters, and their elaborate organization amounts, after all, only to a mechanism whereby this majority first ascertains its own will, then imposes it upon the people. This view is plausible and is adopted, more or less consciously, by most of those who think, write or speak concerning our institutions; but reflection will show it to be radically erroneous; for, although every man who votes the republican or the democratic ticket may be called pro hac vice a member of the republican or democratic party, he is not such in a sense which ensures that the party's candidate has received his actual or constructive assent. The established practice of both parties is to choose their candidates, directly or indirectly, through what are called "primaries," in other words, elections at which the right of suffrage is confined to those more or less expressly pledged to support the nominee of the party. The governing bodies of either party are chosen in the same manner; and regarding our parties as corporations, even their nominal membership must be confined to those attending the primaries, by no means all, or even a majority of those who usually vote their respective tickets.

But this is not all: our great industrial corporations are virtually governed by a very small fraction of their nominal membership. As an illustration, the Pennsylvania railroad company is technically composed of every owner of its stock; but when we hear that it promotes this scheme or discourages that, does any suppose that all, or a majority, or even a considerable number of its stockholders have ever been consulted about the matter? For purposes of action and influence the Pennsylvania railroad means certain well-known gentlemen whose names can be told on the fingers of one hand. In like manner our vast political corporations are ruled each by a small inner circle of men whose stake in its operations is sufficient to have them make its control the business of their lives. When the ordinary voter enters the primary, he finds invariably his choice narrowed to two or three candidates. How these have come to be all that have the slightest chance of election, he does not know; the result has been brought about by influences in which he has had no part, and whose nature he generally very imperfectly understands; but he knows, or will soon learn by experience, that unless his vote is cast for some one of these two or three, it will have no more bearing on the nomination than if he had staid at home. The nominee of a primary in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred owes his success to a previous nomination by some man or clique of men who make politics a trade: he is the creature of a "boss" or a "ring." There is nothing really mysterious in this; some one must make it his business to control any association, or to direct any corporate work; and the more unwieldy the assemblage the more imperative is the need of expert guidance. Professional politicians are indispensable in any popular government; we are peculiar only in having a hundred-fold more of them, and those of a vastly lower type than other nations. We have in our midst several hundred thousand persons who obtain their livelihood by influencing the nomination of party candidates; we may not admire their aims or their methods, but no one can deny or need wonder that they succeed.

OUR LAWS ARE MADE AND ENFORCED

by men who owe their official life to our professional politicians; these constitute, for practical purposes, the two great corporations we call parties, and if the source of power is the true sovereign, the American people has virtually abdicated in favor of this particular class of its citizens. As formerly in Venice, an oligarchy has grown up insensibly among us, and its rule is such as should be expected from the characteristics of the ruling class.

A glance at these will repay our attention. The typical American politician earns his living by holding a public office (usually of subordinate importance and purely ministerial functions) in return for past or expected party work. He is liable at any moment to be thrown out of employment for no other fault than being less useful to his party, or faction, or special patron than some one else who wants his place, and his chance of promotion depends on his ability to supplant in like manner somebody else; in no legitimate way can he ensure himself and his family a continued subsistence, much less make a provision for the future: that he should be usually dishonest is a logical sequence of his conditions of life. He passes his time in an atmosphere of intrigue and dissimulation, concealing or exaggerating his sentiments, amplifying his importance, striving to arouse hopes and fears he knows to be groundless, and to gain a confidence he will be strongly tempted to abuse: it is therefore a law of his being to deceive in words and actions. He is regarded by the community, and especially by the classes who usually fix its standards of thought and conduct, much as usurers were in the Middle Ages, feared and occasionally courted for their power, but hated and despised. Although fortunes are no doubt made in it, politics, regarded as a way to make money, is a poor trade: the proportion of really prosperous politicians is very small compared with the vast number for whom a needy and anxious life ends in a dishonored and miserable old age. It has consequently few attractions for men of character and ability, and such men, with rare exceptions, shun it: it is recruited from the failures and outcasts of all honorable professions, those too dull, indolent or vicious to hold their own in any field of worthy competition. Its lowest stratum is made up, in no small measure, of habitual criminals: we may truly say that our Botany Bay is the political arena; we reform, or further debauch, our convicts by making them our rulers.

Among so many thousands a certain number of men of ability will, of course, be found, but I believe the impression that politicians are generally acute and ingenious, though untrustworthy, is wholly groundless; the vast majority of them are men of the most moderate natural abilities, and the most limited acquirements. Your President has on several occasions pointed out very clearly that the relations between the prominent and ordinary members of the calling resemble those between the robber barons and their men at arms: the "bosses" are noted for skill in obtaining plunder, and liberality in its distribution among their followers; while the latter believe in their patron's star, that is to say, feel confidence in his continued ability to find them places, they adhere to him with unscrupulous fidelity, but he will be deserted in an instant if another proves, or is thought, better able to reward effective service at the people's cost.

With little exaggeration it may be said that WE HAVE MADE OUR RULERS that class of the community which is universally and unhesitatingly pronounced the most unworthy of confidence in any of the relations of private life: it is difficult to find a term to correctly represent this unique type of government: I have suggested for it "kakistocracy" at the risk of a charge of pendency. That the public business is carried on at all tolerably under it, and that the country's prosperity is unchecked, forcibly illustrates the immense advantages of our national position: to some extent, however, it is due to certain characteristics of our politicians, which in some measure neutralize their more baneful qualities. They are greedy and shameless, but seldom bold, and cowardice with the bulk of them is some substitute for conscience. I have alluded to the comparatively small influence considering the perfect freedom of speech and great intellectual activity of our people, exerted by the sentiment of the educated and reflecting classes on the administration, but, devoid as these classes are of direct political power, it argues great timidity in our politicians that public opinion has any weight with them whatever: that they are ever bullied or scolded into temporarily decent behavior. Moreover, a thoroughly corrupt and self-seeking class is by nature conservative. The American politician has in his mind no dangerously vague visions of general improvement for mankind; he has the perfectly definite and common-place intention to advance his own interest, and no mirage of the imagination lures him into perilous paths in this pursuit. He is not naturally a demagogue; when he attempts the role, he is clumsy and unsuccessful, because transparently insincere. To inflame and play on passions and prejudices of class or race or creed is, in truth, greater work than he is fit for; the practice of vulgar frauds and petty intrigues does not train men to be real popular leaders in mischief. The reflection that our tyrants are too contemptible to oppress us, may not tend to our self complacency, but the fact does much to make their yoke endurable.

Through the reform we advocate and not otherwise that yoke will be thrown off; thus and thus only will the country be freed from the domination of its most degraded and dangerous class and be made worthy of its greatness and its past. The remedy is right before us. No one can fail to find who troubles himself to seek it, or hesitate to apply it if he recognize the gravity of the evil. The nation has made its civil service a breeding place for innumerable petty parasites, and these poison its political life with their noisome presence; restore the service to its proper functions and they will die out like the antediluvian animals for want of an environment in which they can live. But precisely because the effects of the reform will be so far reaching and so beneficent it encounters the implacable hostility of all professional politicians. The thorough going practical application of its principles to the conduct of public business would make them starve or change their calling, and neither prospect is pleasant.

"No thief ere felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law."

And our "statesmen" are no exception to this general rule of their kind. Nor must we disguise from ourselves that professional politicians are not its only enemies. In his speech at Pittsburgh, Mr. Clarkson recently predicted that if the claim of the mugwump that the people favored civil service reform could be "submitted to the people themselves" it "would be rejected by ten millions of votes."

MR. CLARKSON DISPLAYS

at least one mark of a prophet, the last election in Iowa shows that he has little honor in his own country, nevertheless I consider him very ill qualified to predict what would or would not happen in the contingency suggested; but I have no doubt that a good many votes would be cast against "the claim of the mugwump," or, in other words, against honesty and morality in public life, by people who would be secretly ashamed of themselves for doing so. It is not that they are misled by the arguments or wretched apologies for arguments that have been used against civil service reform; had any man, sincerely desiring the country's good, been led by these to doubt its wisdom, the practical working of the Pendleton bill must have dispelled his misgivings. Under it the public service has not been filled up with book-worms or valetudinarians, nor have letter carriers and custom-house inspectors become brutal in their manners or lordly in their bearing towards the ordinary citizen. College graduates have not monopolized the petty offices, nor have we seen a peerage of departmental clerks created, or our liberties otherwise endangered by the introduction of competitive examinations. What some politicians called the "English pension system," possibly because it had nothing in the world to do with England, and nothing in the world to do with pensions, has been established without creating a bureaucracy or undermining the constitution; in brief, all the silly pretexts and affected fears invented as excuses for resisting the reform have been proven groundless and absurd. But, as a matter of fact, the demonstration was needless; no one to whom any one would think for a moment of listening on such a topic really believed them; they were repeated, it is true, by some who ought to have known and did know better, but such men used them only to blind their fellow citizens, perhaps to blind their own consciences, to the real motives of their hostility to reform. When it was practically, although only partially, applied, civil service reform produced none of the evils they pretended to expect from it, but as no one had expected these evils in fact, this proved only their own insincerity which needed no proof. Nor has the demonstration in anywise disarmed the hostility of its enemies: on the contrary, it is because they understand it better than many persons like civil service reform less. They have learned from personal experience that it may be a serious hindrance to obtaining public employment for themselves or billeting relatives or friends or dependants upon the government, and some who once saw its theoretical merits no longer think it "practical" or "suited to our institutions."

THE REAL STUMBLING BLOCK TO REFORM

is not ignorance, but the torpor of the national conscience. We do not feel our ignominy. The average American is so accustomed to having politicians reduce him to a choice between two almost equally distasteful candidates: to voting for one to show his disgust with the other, or staying at home and grumbling to show his disgust with both, that he looks on this impudent usurpation as a part of the order of nature: let him feel that his submission to it is unworthy of himself, and a source of loss and peril to the commonwealth, and its overthrow is at hand. Let us then abjure the cowardly optimism which ignores evils it is too lazy to correct; the ostrich wisdom which hides from itself the enemy with which it fears to strive. No good or worthy thing was ever done through self-deception: to redeem our manhood, we must recognize our degradation. "You shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." We should expect and court the enmity of those who live by the abuses which for three generations have now grown with our growth and strengthened with our strength: what bad men cordially detest must contain in it some element of active good. It is well for civil service reform to be hated by Tammany Hall as it was well for England to be hated by Barere. We would spare Americans from being ashamed of their government, would rescue the noblest work of our polity from its basest hands; would extirpate national vices which make us a political Sodom among Christian peoples: with such a goal before us we can well fight on with a calm confidence that any apostasy, any temporary reverse, any seeming injustice of public opinion are but inevitable incidents of so momentous a struggle, but fitting preludes to so glorious a victory.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

Washington, in 1789.

"As the Constitutional Convention was about to organize when success seemed hopeless and despair suggested fatal compromise Washington said: 'If to please the people we offer what we ourselves disapprove how can we afterward defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair—the event is in the hands of God.' There spoke the good genius of America. If any words were to be inscribed upon this arch, these words of Washington would be apples of gold in pictures of silver. What he said to the convention he says to us. It is the voice of the heroic spirit which in council and in the field has made and alone will preserve our America. It is the voice that will speak from this memorial arch to all coming generations of Americans. Whatever may betide, whatever war, foreign or domestic, may threaten, whatever specious sophistry may assail the political conscience of the country or bribery of place or money corrupt its political action, above the roar of the mob and the insidious clamor of the demagogue, the voice of Washington will still be the voice of American patriotism and of manly honor—'Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair—the event is in the hands of God!'"—George William Curtis, at the Laying of the Corner-stone of the Washington Arch, May, 1890.

Ingalls, in 1890.

"The purification of politics is an iridescent dream. The decalogue and the golden rule have no place in a political campaign. The object is success. To defeat the antagonist and expel the party in power is the purpose. This modern rant about the corruption of politics is fighting in the extreme. It proceeds from the tea-custard and syllabub dilettanteism, the frivolous and desultory sentimentalism of epicures."—Senator Ingalls.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

The Civil Service Chronicle desires facts regarding the so-called "resignations" of fourth-class postmasters; who has requested these resignations, by what agencies have these been effected, and in what instances have resignations been practically forced to prevent loss on the post-office furniture by disposing of it to the would-be successor in office.

The Civil Service Chronicle desires information of all cases where the man at the top of the eligible lists for positions in the railway mail service has not been chosen.

The Civil Service Chronicle will be glad to receive information upon the following points:

The name of any newspaper editor or owner who has or may receive a federal appointment, and the name of the office.

The names of all members of political committees or delegates given a federal appointment, and the name of the office.

The names of all federal office-holders who are members of any political committee or who act as delegates, naming the committee or the convention.

Statements regarding any political activity in primaries, conventions or political work done for any nominees by federal office-holders.

ONE of the reasons given by Senator Hoar why Collector Saltonstall should be immediately succeeded by Beard was that the collector had to represent the Administration at dinners. Collector Beard made his maiden appearance in this capacity at the Clarkson dinner. His enthusiasm for Clarkson and for Clarkson's ideas was almost hilarious, and its only check seemed to be that the collector's conscience was once or twice pricked by the recollection that his office is within the civil service law.

SINCE the writing in another column, further facts about the census in this city have come to light. As is well known the appointments were made upon Pension Commissioner Raum's principle, which is, "When I appoint a man I want to look him in the face and form my own judgment of him." In this manner "Sid" Conger, a defeated republican candidate, was appointed. He had a friend here in Mr. Merrill Moores, who is not in any manner connected with the government service nor with the census, but who is a member of the republican county committee and a very active republican politician. Conger seems to have left it to him to do the looking in the face. This was the true Clarkson idea; no examination by theorists like Mr. Fishback and Mr. Butler of the federal local board, but the unbiased judgment of a party committeeman. The result, however, was the choice of a sorry crowd of republican workers, whose work has exasperated the people of the city as much as if Falstaff had come with his recruits to take the census. In the Sentinel of June 19, Mr. Moores says "some of those I recommended have turned out most miserable failures. When Mr. Conger was first appointed supervisor, a great many people knowing him and me to be intimate friends besieged me for recommendations as enumerators. After they had received their appointments, they bothered me for instructions, and now since they are at work and have found out they won't get their money before the middle of July at the earliest, they have importuned me to loan them money." We wish Mr. Moores well out of the hands of his apparently impecunious crowd. A spice is added to the situation by Conger's suggestion that the Commercial Club hire a horse and buggy to act as a courier between omitted inhabitants and Moores's henchmen.

CONGRESSMAN CHÉADLE was defeated for renomination. Indiana and the country can well spare him from the list of congressmen. In the recent debate in the house, referring to the party promises to sustain the civil service law, he said: "I may have made a quasi promise, but I did not consider it an essential factor of my political faith." The departure of such a man from the public eye can not be regretted. He is not known to the people of Indiana except as a demander of patronage; at the end of his congressional career this is the only work that sticks to him and marks him. He must now feel the exceeding shortness of his reward. He did not get the patronage he demanded, and probably this accounts for his defeat. La Follette was the Administration candidate, and by a happy coincidence they were killed off together. It is whispered that the Lord Paramount resented the imperious style of the Under Lord and withheld favors from him accordingly.

THE President was present at the dedication of the monument to Garfield, the most conspicuous victim of the spoils system. The feuds of two great patronage bosses broke out afresh over Garfield's allotment of their spoil, and a poor crazed creature, because his portion was not forthcoming, assassinated the man who seemed responsible. What an opportunity for the occupant of the most commanding position in the United States. An appeal from him to his fellow-citizens against the mob now about him, howling and wrangling for spoil, would have been responded to with an overwhelming patriotism. The St. Louis Republic well said:

Standing under the figure of the murdered President and reiterating his own pledge to make fitness the essential and discriminating test, Mr. Harrison might have thrilled the whole country with his denunciation of the corrupt system which assassinated an American President.

But President Harrison had only this lesson to point out as he stood at the tomb of Garfield:

The cruel circumstances attending his death had but one amelioration—that space of life was given him to teach from his dying bed a great lesson of patience and forbearance. His mortal part will find honorable rest here, but the lessons of his life and death will continue to be instructive and inspiring incidents in American history.

MR. L. M. BLACKFORD, at the head of the Episcopal high school of Virginia, has in the Virginia Seminary Magazine for June, an excellent article upon "The Morals of Civil Service Reform," from which an extract is given elsewhere. He calls attention to the first systematic effort to enlist the moral and religious sense of the country in behalf of civil service reform by Mr. Welsh. That was a year ago, and it serves as a standard of measurement for the great stride made in a short time. That marked the beginning of a careful examination of the spoils system as a moral question by people in general. It convinced great numbers of the clergy that, disagreeable as was the duty, they could not longer be silent under the steady lowering of the standard of conduct in political matters. The consequence has been a distinct and unmistakable revival of the popular conscience, a disgust, with the coarse immorality of the sentiments of Senator Ingalls, the multiplication all over the country of sermons dealing boldly and eloquently with various moral aspects of present phases of politics, and the firm avowal of many clergymen that they have rights and duties as to the management of the country they live in, not to be evaded because of their sacred calling.

When Bishop Potter, Rev. Heber Newton and Rev. Father Ducey join in a call for a citizens' movement for the purification of municipal politics by non-partisan nominations in New York City, civil service reformers do not feel "fretful," as Mr. Clarkson, who must have been momentarily startled by his own shadow, said in Boston. They will give careful attention to him, and when he says "that everything that we have that is noble in our government and sweet and splendid in our social life is largely the result of partisanship," they will hasten to furnish as facts for illustration biographies of the Tammany toughs now ruling New York, details of the way a boss like Quay subjugates a state, how a senator like Pettigrew can arrogantly flaunt his right to use the Indian service of his own domain as he pleases, and by cumulative facts the country over show the significance of a fettered press and illustrate how an office holding class rules primaries and conventions.

PENSION-COMMISSIONER RAUM.

The character of Pension-Commissioner Raum as a public officer is at last rounded to completion, and may be reviewed from all quarters. He had left office when the merit system was little more than talk, and it is doubtful if he had then ever given it a serious thought. He came back into office after the system had in a few places become thoroughly rooted and had been vindicated by trial.

In some degree it was applied to the pension office. Mr. Raum had evidently learned nothing in his vacation years, and evidently regarded the civil service law as troublesome but not seriously so. Wanting thirty medical examiners, he got Congressman Banks to introduce a resolution authorizing their appointment as spoil. It passed the house without difficulty, and for a time seemed a most dangerous attack. All of the other medical examiners were appointed after competition and these thirty could have been furnished by the civil service commission immediately. If these places, however, should be deliberately classed by congress as spoils, the same influences might remove other places by wholesale from the operation of the civil service law. A word from President Harrison to Raum would have secured the withdrawal of the resolution, which was in direct violation of republican promises, but it was not spoken. It is sufficient to say of this resolution that it is now pending in the senate, which body it will never pass.

When the resolution was introduced in February, Raum was interviewed by the New York Evening Post to the following effect:

"Where is the trouble with that plan? As it is now we get our medical examiners through the civil service commission, but the commission have no facilities for conducting such technical examinations. We have to send them a detail of our surgeons to do that work. Now, what is the difference, in practical effect, whether we conduct the examinations under our own departmental jurisdiction or take those men whom the commission examines through the agency of our departmental examiners?"

"It prevents a dangerous personal discrimination, does it not?"

"It prevents me from knowing what kind of men I am going to get." The commissioner spoke with more than his usual warmth. "When I appoint a man, I want to look him in the face and form my own judgment of him. When I buy a horse, I look at its teeth and its tail, and feel its coat; it doesn't satisfy me to take somebody else's statement that the animal is brown, or gray, or black, and stands so many hands high. It is the same way with the men who are to serve under me. I don't care to choose a man from the bare statement that he has made an average of 76, or 83, or 91 per cent."

Commissioner Raum looked his own son, Green B. Raum, Jr., in the face and formed a judgment of him. He did not require him to make an average of 76, or 83 or 91 per cent., but he lumped him off and decided that a suitable place must be made for this son, and so he created a new division known as the appointment division, and put Green B. Raum, Jr., at the head of it with the title assistant chief clerk. This done, Commissioner Raum again looked his son in the face and formed a second judgment of him without requiring any per cent. As the result of this, he removed a woman clerk out of the chief clerk's room, where she had been making some fifteen dollars a month in notary fees, and put this son in the way of turning an honest penny with his notary's seal. The Journal correspondent, under date of June 11, says: "When visitors to the office have inquired for a notary they have usually been sent to him, and he is doing a considerable portion of the business that the woman did formerly."

There is another son, John Raum, who has begun the pension claim business since his father became commissioner. In the pension office there are a thousand chances for sly favoritism, and we make bold to say that no man with a fine sense of honor would ever hold the office of commissioner and allow his son to prosecute claims for pensions before him. The mere relationship as a "draw" to business would put money into the Raum pocket.

Of the same improper nature is the fact that George E. Lemon, a claim agent, who prosecutes claims for pensions in immense numbers before Raum, should indorse the latter's note for $25,000. Lemon employs hundreds of clerks, and stimulates business by publishing a paper in Washington, which appears under the guise of the soldiers' welfare. Its one cry is more pensions, and few agencies have done more to destroy patriotism. That Commissioner Raum should have any connection whatever with such a man, and of all things should be under obligations to him, and still further, an obligation of such magnitude, is without excuse; it is the embodiment of the spoils idea, and it is such a demonstration of Raum's unfitness for his position that the President ought not to overlook it.

In other words, I believe that the United States government is a political, and not a business, organization. The interest of the average man in politics must be kept alive to make a republic succeed.— Clarkson, in Boston.

The degradation of spoils politics has a fresh illustration in the case of Charles E. McChesney, the Indian agent at Cheyenne River Agency (S. D.). If the word of such men as Bishop Hare, Herbert Welsh, and the army officers who have the best means of knowing is to be taken, McChesney is an upright man, and a competent and honest agent. On account of impending land questions at this agency, he can be ill-spared. However, his place was "wanted," and charges were made against him of drunkenness and improper conduct with women. Of these charges he was promptly and overwhelmingly cleared. The following letter is indicative of the spirit of the clearing:

SIR: The information that you gave me last night that Dr. Chas. E. McChesney, the Indian agent at Cheyenne Indian Agency, S. D., was accused at Washington, D. C., with drunkenness, and had been seen drunk at the village of Pierre, also that he was an immoral man with the squaws at the agency, has filled me with amusement and indignation. I can not understand how any one could be so vile and unprincipled as to make so unjust charges against a man that I have known for about three years, and have always found him to be a temperate and good man, a faithful and honest Indian agent.

Some unprincipled politician, who either wants the place for himself or one of his friends, must have hatched up the complaint out of whole cloth, thinking it would never come to the ears of the doctor or his friends. If they want his place why not sail under true colors, and say the doctor is a democrat, for that is all that can possibly be said against him. I am, and always have been a "black republican," but do not believe that a good and faithful public servant should be put out of office simply because he differs with me in politics.

You can use this letter in any way that you think will stamp the charges of drunkenness and immorality as an infamous lie.

Very truly, your friend,

A. B. MACGOWAN,

{ U. S. INDIAN SERVICE, Capt. 12th U. S. Inf'y.
{ ROSEBERG AGENCY, S. D., May 3, 1890.

Baffled in their efforts, the hidden gang, to whom libel and slander are apparently ready and natural weapons, announced through Senator Pettigrew that Dr. McChesney will hold until the end of his term, August 2. McChesney is reported to have thwarted Senator Pettigrew's brother in the latter's effort to get hold of some Indian lands. It will be interesting to see whether this agent is removed at the end of his term, and if so, it will be pertinent to inquire why; and further, if so, it will be interesting to observe whether Pettigrew names the new man.

A CONTRAST.

President Cleveland appointed Mr. Hendrix in the place of the worthy but notoriously incapable republican incumbent of the Brooklyn post-office. Mr. Hendrix, upon the high authority of ex-Postmaster-General James and Postmaster General Wanamaker, has made this office of very great efficiency. He would have liked to keep his place, and would have continued to devise improvements. But for months past the President has been giving time and reflection to the problem of putting in a republican politician. It is a pity for the future students of American institutions that this paper has not space to quote the daily dispatches describing the struggles of the several Brooklyn factions, all equally vulgar and selfish, to whom the President of the United States has bent a respectful ear. The outcome was the appointment of Col. Baird, a prominent business man and politician. He knew nothing of running a post-office, and it was not his intention to give the office his personal attention. When he failed to secure a private secretary to whom he could delegate the business functions [he presumably giving personal attention to the political functions], he declined the appointment. Meanwhile the President will resume the hunt for some one to take the place of the present admirable postmaster. There is the faint hope that the limit of his endurance may have been reached and that he may appoint the very capable republican assistant postmaster, who co-operated with Postmaster Hendrix to make the office of such notable excellence. This would be a pacific and statesmanlike end of a fight now threatening extensive ruptures in several directions.

In St. Louis the President ended a disgraceful struggle by promoting Major Harlow, who had by many years of efficiency and faithfulness worked his way up in the public service. His long experience at once was felt in various improvements, as indicated in the following report of a subordinate:

When you assumed the duties of postmaster there were 79 red boxes collected from in the evening. Under your directions the number has been increased to 331, making an increase of 252 boxes embraced in the following territory. * * *

In addition to the improvement in the collection fully as much has been accomplished in the delivery service. When you assumed control of the St. Louis post-office there was only one delivery west of Kings highway and Manchester road to Delmar avenue; east on Delmar avenue to Walton avenue; north on Walton avenue to Easton avenue; west on Easton avenue to Kings highway; north on Kings highway to Natural Bridge road; south on line of city limits to Pernod road; northeast on Pernod road to old Manchester road. Two deliveries are now made in the territory above described. * * *

This increase in deliveries and collections has been done without the addition of a single man or cent to the government. In this work you have been ably assisted by Mr. John Grogan, superintendent city delivery; James Deveraux, assistant superintendent; Mr. E. P. Fox, superintendent Station C; R. M. Johnson, superintendent Station D; Peter Gundlach, superintendent Station A. Also by the willingness and pride both carriers and collectors display in trying to build up the service.

Major Harlow, intent upon his duty of making the St. Louis post-office the best he can make it, finds no difficulty in securing the faithful assistance of the many democratic employes under him. Yet Clarkson goes down to Boston to complain that men such as these, who give all their time and energies to making a better post-office, and cut off all service to the Quays, Tom Flatts, Claytons and Filleys, are so wanting in patriotism as to be a menace to the country.

CLARKSON IN BOSTON.

Assistant Postmaster General Clarkson has been in Boston making a speech largely upon civil service reform to the Norfolk Club, a republican organization. Clarkson has done the Administration more harm than almost all the partisan office-holders under it. Public criticism has evidently made him understand this, and he is sore in consequence. His appearance before the Norfolk Club is much like that of a prize fighter advocating the merits of prize fighting to a collection of theological students. Some of his arguments have a familiar sound. For instance:

When the government called on these men to save its life, it did not ask them how far the weather was below zero and the space between the stars [laughter and applause], nor require them to calculate the width and slant of the shadow of a tree at four o'clock in the afternoon. [Laughter.]

He appears to have hoodwinked the people of Boston. Out West he is known as a tricky politician, who goes by the name of "Rhet. Clarkson." No one would think of taking him seriously when posing as a disinterested discussor of a public question. He touched very lightly his own exploits. Indeed, he sang much smaller than when, some months ago, he had the impudence to boastfully publish in his paper in Iowa, the list of the multitude of changes of office-holders he had at that date brought about. Perhaps the defeat of his party, which followed soon after in that State, for the first time since the republican party was organized, had toned him down. He smarts under the strictures of the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association, and claims that his work among the fourth-class postmasters, which has justly earned for him the title of Headsman Clarkson, more than half of it consisted in filling vacancies caused by "resignations." We beg leave to inform Mr. Clarkson that the Indiana Civil Service Reform Association knows that old trick. The cross-roads postmaster has a case of pigeon holes and a lot of traps connected with the office. The new man is settled upon by the congressman. Then a quiet intimation is conveyed to the incumbent that if he will resign without a fuss, he will get so much in cash for his pigeon-holes and his traps; but, if he waits to be removed, he will find no purchaser. He is wise in his day, and prefers cash to seeing dead stock of this kind stored under his shed. Having, with a steady countenance, disposed of a large block of his cases by classing them as "resignations," Clarkson would now, doubtless, like us to believe that all his removals were for cause.

A POLITICAL MACHINE AS A CENSUS-TAKER.

As the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE has often repeated, President Harrison was urged to have the appointment of the employes of the census bureau made under the competitive system, but with deliberation he turned over the places to his party as spoil. The country was full of young men thoroughly competent, who would have taken a pride in doing this work well, and who would have gladly competed, but it was deemed better to let the party bosses use the places for their behoof. As a natural result of this decision, Superintendent Porter described himself as "waist deep in congressmen." The manner of appointment may be further illustrated by the case of Wilson H. Soale, supervisor of the Terre Haute district, who referred the appointment of enumerators to the chairmen of the county committees of his district, and these in turn referred them to the chairmen of the township committees. The supervisor of the fourth district of North Carolina, before getting his appointment, made the following pledge:

This is to certify that if I am appointed supervisor of the eleventh census for the fourth district of North Carolina, that the republicans of each county in my district shall have the patronage, and that I will lend my influence to that party. This Dec. 10, 1889.

W. E. WEBB.

Witness: W. H. PULLEY.

L. W. McKinney writes to the St. Louis Republic, under date of June 7, saying that the postmaster at Moberly, Missouri, was having the enumerators poll their districts in addition to taking the census, instructing them to do the work "on the quiet;" this postmaster took a natural view of the duties of appointees under such a system. The fitting results seem to be coming on. On such high authority as the Indianapolis Journal of June 15, the facts seem to be that well over the country "the work has been unreasonably delayed by the inefficiency of the enumerators, and many persons are known to have been missed * * *. The trouble grows out of the inexperience of enumerators and slipshod, unfaithful performance of duty on their part." In Indianapolis, the whole community, headed by the Commercial Club, is at this writing about to turn out en masse to get itself enumerated by these party pensioners upon the public treasury. How it works to use these offices first to pay party workers, and second to take the census, is best shown by quoting again from the Journal, which, speaking of carelessness and, we add, utter incapacity and unfitness, says:

A case of this kind was reported by a citizen on East Walnut street. The enumerator called at his house yesterday morning, and was met by the Walnut-street resident's wife, who informed him she was ready to answer any questions the law required. The enumerator, seating himself on the step of the front porch, took out his portfolio and, placing his ink-bottle on the floor beside him, began. At the head of the list he wrote the family name and after it the words, "St. Clair street." Upon being told that he had made a mistake in the name of the street he replaced the sheet in his portfolio and, taking out a second, made a fresh start. This time he succeeded in getting the name of the street correct, and proceeded with his questioning. The name of the lady's husband was given, and his occupation, when the enumerator inquired, "How many children have you?"

"Two," was the reply.

"Oh, well, then," he said, "I'll come back again and complete the list."

With this remark he prepared to leave. Seizing his book and paper in one hand, he grasped the open ink-bottle in the other, and, without replacing the stopper, put the bottle into his coat pocket. As he walked down to the gate he left a trail of ink that furnished the lady of the house two hours' good work in removing.

This, it seems from the complaints that are coming in, is only one case out of many. In a home on North New Jersey street the enumerator asked no questions concerning diseases that might be prevalent in the family and escaped all notice of a mute daughter, whose age and nativity he only asked for. M. H. Spades reports that the Windsor block, on Illinois street, which contains at least two hundred rooms, has not yet been visited.

Failure of the enumerators to properly observe their instructions, as well as the repeated urging of Supervisor Conger to have them do what they were told to do to the letter, is further shown by inquiries that were made in this office. Out of forty composers who were at the cases last night twenty had been missed. One of them also said that he knew of four families on his block who had been overlooked.

FACTS TO ILLUMINE CLARKSON'S BOSTON SPEECH.

A confession, they say, is good for the soul and I will tell of one committed unanimously by the commission about six months ago, for which I was perhaps chiefly to blame. You know we are frequently told that this or that office has special needs. The head of the office speaks of the latitude allowed his predecessor. He claims that he requires men with a peculiar fitness not possessed by men upon the eligible list, and must have such men for the good of the office. A new incumbent of a particular New York office asked that two of the places under him—he only had six—be taken from the classified list. He must have men of fitness, and if he had to take "boys fresh from school," a phrase often heard, they would not fill the bill. It was a fact which we knew that the best possible men could not be filled from the list, and we granted the request. Two officers of a republican association of a New York assembly district got the places, and ten days afterward, at a primary election in the district, that association was victorious. We could have given two men eminently better fitted than those chosen. I doubt if we can undo this mistake, but I guarantee the four other officers will be kept under classification with an iron hand.—From the Address of Theodore Roosevelt before the Civil Service Reform Association of Maryland, Feb. 21, 1890.

Having succeeded to the right, title and interest in the post-office at New Castle, Dr. W. F. Shelley hopes the old patrons will continue their favors as to his predecessor, and that many new ones may be added. The business is new to him and his assistants, and all go home very tired at night, but shortly he hopes to have the run of the establishment well in hand, and be able to give his old customers in the dental line such attention as they may require.—New Castle Courier.

The nomination of David Lake to be United State marshal is looked upon as a plan by which Congressman Wallace hopes to be re-nominated next fall.

For years "Dan" Lake has been one of the most active democratic political ward workers in Brooklyn. He was "boss" of the Eighth ward, and was in the good graces of the ring. Several times he was elected supervisor, and for two terms he sat in the county auditor's office. It was while he was there that all the fraudulent bills for county work, for passing which the supervisors have recently been indicted, were audited, and it was on the strength of Lake's guarantee that they were paid.

When John Y. McKane was expelled from the democratic party for treachery he ordered Lake to follow him out, and, although the latter then held the office of auditor, to which democratic votes had elected him, he obeyed the order. When the next election came around he saw he would be out of a job, so he made a deal by which the republicans nominated him for supervisor at large. The result showed that he was about the weakest man on the ticket.

John Y. McKane, report says, has been boasting that he demanded and obtained Lake's nomination in return for his services in casting the vote of Gravesend for Harrison. He thinks he and Lake, if they can get a little patronage to dispense, can entice about 3,000 democrats from the support of the local machine and so convert Brooklyn into a debatable city.—New York Times, March 17.

In Lake's own ward, the Eighth, this feeling is most intense, for that ward had a candidate for the office in the person of Robert W. Fielding, a life-long republican, who had been formally indorsed by the entire party organization.

Chairman Woodruff and all his followers had gone to the capital in person and urged Fielding's appointment. That he was basely betrayed Mr. Fielding boldly asserts, and he says he proposes to see if half a dozen men like Woodruff and Naval Officer Willis can sell out a man who had been backed up by the entire Kings County Republican General Committee. "They added insult to injury," said Fielding yesterday, "by shelving me and taking in my place a democrat from my own ward, a man whom I have had to fight politically for over a dozen years. Here I have been struggling to hold our party vote in this democratic district for a decade, and have had to buck against the great power of this fellow, Lake, backed by 'Boss' McLaughlin, and yet when a chance of reward comes I am told to step aside so that the man who beat us on so many occasions may be put forward. It was a shameful political swindle."—New York Times, March 19.

The appointment to-day of John F. Scanlan to be special treasury agent at Chicago was due rather to J. N. Huston and other Indiana politicians than to Illinois influences. He was indorsed by Senator Farwell before the appointment of the collector of customs and by prominent party men in Chicago, but steady pressure for Mr. Scanlan came from the Indiana men who were grateful to him for services in two presidential campaigns. Mr. Scanlan begins as one of the three assistants of J. J. Crowley, chief of the Chicago division of special agents and a hold-over democrat. As soon as he shall have gained experience in the difficult duties of a treasury agent, he will probably be appointed chief of the division. His salary is $3,000 a year.—Washington Dispatch, March 12.

There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press. We have learned, too, from our own as well as the experience of other countries, that golden shackles, by whomsoever or by whatever pretense imposed, are as fatal to it as the iron bonds of despotism.—PRESIDENT WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

—The announcement this afternoon that President Harrison had named Alexander Von Landberg, editor of the Union, the German republican organ, for internal revenue collector for the twenty first district, was followed by the firing of cannon by enthusiastic Germans who believe that it was Representative Belden's influence and sanction that decided the appointment.

The naming of Mr. Von Landberg will, in a measure, heal the breach between the Hiscock and Belden factions. It is a victory for Mr. Belden in every sense of the word. It has been evident since Mr. Belden's appointment to the chairmanship of the congressional committee that to insure success in the collectorship matter Mr. Hiscock must select one of several candidates whom Mr. Belden would agree to accept. It having been made public, last night, that the representative had committed himself to Mr. Von Landberg, Hiscock fell back upon the German editor as his third candidate. James M. Gilbert was the first Charles E. Ide the second, and finally Mr. Von Landberg. Senator Hiscock gets no credit among the German republican element for the naming of their countryman for the lucrative place.

A great deal of patronage follows the appointment which will be under Mr. Belden's control, and it amounts to a great deal in this district. There is now no doubt but what Mr. Belden will have the naming of the candidates on the republican side for the assembly this fall.—Syracuse Dispatch to the New York Times, June 6.

—Although Channcey I. Filley could not pull himself through in his contest for the post-mastership at St. Louis, he manages to stock the fourth-class offices throughout the state with his friends. He recently succeeded in having L. M. Spirely, editor of the Kingston Times, made postmaster at Kingston, Caldwell county. John A. Cannon was recommended for this office by all the republican officials of Caldwell county, and by a majority of the republicans of the town. Cannon was originally appointed, but Filley succeeded in getting Clarkson to "hold him up," and finally induced Clarkson to appoint Spirely. It is understood that the Kingston republicans are indignant, but Filley has his man in office. As long as the "old man" can stock the fourth-class offices there is no doubt of his ability to maintain his grip on the machine.—Washington Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, Jan. 17.

MATTHEW S. QUAY,

United States Senator and Chairman of the National Republican Committee, Silent Under the Charge of Embezzlement by Reputable Newspapers.

The Ways and Means of the Subjugation of a State by a Modern Office Baron.

The Chronicle-Telegraph (republican) publishes a long dispatch from Indiana, Penn., which throws some light upon the methods being pursued by Senator Quay's friends to secure the delegation from that county for State Senator Delamater for governor. The dispatch says:

"The republicans of Indiana have discovered that Chairman Andrews of the state committee, acting for Delamater, has captured temporarily the Indiana republican county committee, and is trying to seize the Indiana delegation to the state convention, as he did that of Cambria. In December last Chairman Andrews saw County Chairman Langham. Mr. Langham was ordered to immediately create a Delamater boom in Indiana through the county committee members. Gossips say that he was amply provided with funds to pay the expenses of this campaign. Delamater 'hustlers' were set to work in every township. Not only was this accomplished with as much haste as possible, but the county press was also secured. Within a short time after Chairman Langham's visit to Pittsburgh several county papers published editorials lauding Mr. Delamater. The Indiana Messenger was offered the same thing and refused to print it, although the editor was informed by one of the Delamater managers that the other papers had 'made a good thing out of it.'—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, Feb. 26.

No man ever entered upon the canvass for a nomination with more of the party machinery in harmony with his aspirations. Mr. Delamater has all the power and influence of the chairman of the national republican committee, Colonel Quay, and of the chairman of the republican state committee, the Hon. William H. Andrews, who expects to succeed Mr. Delamater, in the state senate. Both the United States senators from Pennsylvania are with him, as is Postmaster-General Wanamaker and all, save five, of the republican congressmen from this state. Add to these the thousands of postmasters in Pennsylvania, and the other thousands of census enumerators, and it will not be difficult to understand where Mr. Delamater gets his strength which he admittedly shows in every republican county convention that is held.

It is no secret that city and cross-roads postmasters and the great army of census takers in this state are being appointed, first, with a view to their political usefulness to Mr. Quay and his supporters, and after that with regard to their fitness. This is true of all save Allegheny county, where congressman John Dalzell of the Twenty-second District made such a determined fight that Superintendent Porter created a special census district, and the nomination of George T. Oliver to be supervisor was pushed through the senate in spite of the the written protests of Senators Cameron and Quay and Congressmen Bayne and Ray.

Along with the power of the party machinery and party spoils, thus so graciously placed at the disposal of candidate Delamater, goes the control of nine out of every ten of the republican newspapers in the state, from the dignified Philadelphia Press and Inquirer and the Pittsburgh Commercial-Gazette down to the most obscure little journal in the backwoods towns of the Pennsylvania lumber regions. From editor Charles Emory Smith, who is given the Russian mission at $12,500 a year, on through the list in every one of the sixty-seven counties of the commonwealth the newspaper people are kept singing the Delamater song through promises and places political.—Meadville Dispatch to New York Times, March 16.

The Chronicle-Telegraph (rep.) to-day makes more charges of corrupt practices against W. H. Andrews, chairman of the republican state committee, and George W. Delamater, Quay's candidate for governor. It says:

"In addition to the purchase of Cambria and other counties, it is now stated on good authority that the most open, shame-faced bribery was resorted to in Jefferson, and Chairman Andrews, it is asserted, rode over that county, accompanied by the county chairman, and put out the cash freely among the purchasable element."—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, April 8.

Ten letter-carriers in the Pittsburgh post-office, which comes within the civil service law, have received this notice, dated April 12:

"You are hereby notified that your services will no longer be required as a carrier at the Pittsburgh post-office after April 15. Respectfully, Postmaster."

JAMES S. MCKEAN,

Mr. McKean is the new republican poster and friend of Senator Quay. The dismissed carriers are all democrats and have been in the service for some time. As the dismissals were apparently without cause, and clearly in violation of the civil service law, John Cavanaugh, one of the discharged carriers, appeared before the postmaster and demanded to know the why and wherefore.

"I know nothing about it," replied Mr. McKean. "The orders came from Washington and I am only carrying them out, as I am in duty bound to do."

He did not say whether Mr. Quay or Mr. Wanamaker had sent the order. Mr. Cavanaugh insisted upon having something in explanation, and asked if charges had been made against him for any cause, but the postmaster declared that he knew nothing whatever as to the reasons for the discharges. There are some who suspect that the post-office influence is to be used in securing delegates from Pittsburgh favorable to the candidacy of Quay's friend Delamater for governor.—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, April 14.

The Republican, the most widely circulated paper in Schuylkill county, to-day prints the following savage attack upon Senator Quay's candidate for governor:

"George W. Delamater has been a selfish traitor to his party, and he has given proof of his fealty to the Standard Oil Company. The story of his course on the anti-discrimination bill of 1887 is almost as bad as that of his conduct on the Billingsley bill. The republican state convention of 1886 pledged the party to the passage of an anti-discrimination bill. Subsequently, on first and second readings, this bill was supported by Delamater. On the night of March 16, 1887, Senators Delamater, Watres and McFarland were noticed in close consultation with Senators Wolverton, Ross, Hemminger and other democratic leaders. Later in the night Delamater was accused of contemplating treachery to his party, and he confessed it. He said that eight republican senators, under the lead of himself and Watres, had agreed to vote with the democrats and defeat the anti-discrimination bill.

"When asked the reason he replied that he had been ignored by Senators Reyburn, George Handy Smith, Penrose, Rulan, Cooper, Mewmyer, Scott, Alexander, and other republican leaders. He declared that he intended to make himself a leader even if he had to break up the party in the senate on an important state measure. A member familiar with Delamater's connections suggested that perhaps there was some way to reach him through the Standard Oil Company. The lobby representative of the Standard said that Delamater was acting foolishly, and that he would fix the thing up. He did so.

"A caucus of republican senators was in session when it was announced that Delamater was outside and wanted to see the leaders. These gentlemen were told by Delamater that he would vote for the anti-discrimination bill, provided they would promise that henceforth he should be regarded as one of the republican leaders and be consulted on all measures and questions of policy, and that the men to whom he talked should agree to oppose the Billingsley bill and help him defeat it. This was agreed to. Mr. Delmater voted for the anti-discrimination bill on the same day, deserting Waters and the men to whom he had pledged himself the night before. The Standard had influence enough to bring Delamater to terms when all other efforts failed.—Pottsville Dispatch to New York Times, April 22.

DETROIT, Mich., May 7.—The following letter, addressed to a leading republican of Detroit, was received yesterday and explains itself. Inclosed were a number of handsome certificates, suggestive of the most artistic bank paper, decorated with a neat ten-dollar mark and having a coupon attached. The use to which they are to be applied appears in the "confidential" communication. The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 30, 1890.

MY DEAR SIR: The republican national committee has established permanent headquarters in this city, in order that the party's interests throughout the nation may not be lost sight of between presidential elections. We have found many opportunities since the close of the campaign of 1888 to aid in strengthening the party organization in various sections of the country. * * *

I send you herewith a number of certificates which illustrate this plan. I trust you may be able at an early day to place them with some of the zealous republicans of your neighborhood. Please fill up the coupons with full name and address, cut them off, and return them to us with the $10 for each. All checks, money orders, etc., should be made payable to F. W. Leach, assistant secretary, who has charge of this branch of the work. A record will be kept of all the subscribers, who will be known as registered contributors to the republican national committee. [It is stated that government employes are receiving intimations to buy a coupon.]

Believing you to be deeply interested in republican success and influential in the councils of the party, I very earnestly ask you to assist us. If we can not invoke the aid and co-operation of republicans of your standing and activity, upon whom can we depend? If you conclude that you can not help us, kindly return the certificates, in order that we may place them elsewhere. In such events, please name some one who, in your opinion, will be likely to aid us in the manner indicated. With the hope that your convenience may permit you to accord us an early response, I am, very truly, yours, M. S. QUAY.

On the 4th of April, ex-State Senator Lewis Emery, in a speech in the opera house in Bradford, charged Senator Delamater (Quay's candidate for governor) with perjury in taking the oath of office and stating that he had not used corrupt means to gain his election; with accepting a bribe to the amount of $65,000 to defeat the Billingsly bill, and with forging the names of a conference committee of the legislature, which had never been appointed, to a report in the interest of the Standard Oil Company. Senator Emery made the charges specifically, and challenged prosecution or arrest. Senator Delamater said, in response to the challenge, "I will carry Emery's own county for governor. That is my answer."—New York Times, May 10.

The managing editor of the Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph (rep.) to day telegraphs his paper as follows, from Meadville, Pa.: "State Chairman W. H. Andrews, is trying to get into the state senate, and his canvass is being conducted in his usual style, through political boodlers. Andrews has said he is willing to spend $20,000 to get the state senatorship, and he is in a fair way to do it now.

"In this highly laudable missionary work the republican state chairman is ably assisted by his two brothers, who live on the crumbs that fall when the state chairman makes a grab. There is one big wave of disgust sweeping over the county at the methods of these three men. Charles Andrews does the township distribution of cash prize and W. R. Andrews helps distribute part of the time and also runs a funny little 'patent-outside' daily paper in Meadville. This paper has so little weight that the state chairman does not depend upon it. Last week he bought a semi-weekly, edited by a man named Reisinger, and filled it full of puffis for himself and denunciations of everybody else. Reisinger for months has abused Andrews in a most rigorous manner, but in consideration of a promise of the Meadville post-office and a couple of hundred dollars he sold out his entire stock of vituperation and hattery.

"Chairman Andrews is running a boodle campaign on the platform, 'If you don't elect me, W. L. Scott will be sent to the United States senate.' Some people say that there is more danger from Scott with Andrews in the senate than out of it.

"Candidate Andrews three weeks ago sent for Messrs. Brown and Potter, candidates for the legislative nomination. The senatorial candidate produced a written agreement for the legislative candidates to sign. It was set forth in this that Andrews and his brother would agree to stop fighting Brown and Potter and support them if they would agree to vote for any candidate for United States senator whom W. H. Andrews would name. Brown and Potter indignantly refused to enter into any agreement, and the chairman threatened all sorts of things. Does this mean that Andrews intends to get members of the next legislature in shape so as to sell them to Scott or some other boodler? It certainly looks like it."—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, June 2.

The Chronicle-Telegraph (republican and anti Delamater) on Wednesday printed a three-column dispatch from Bradford tending to show that the Standard Oil Company and the democracy have joined forces to secure a Delamater delegation from McKean county to the republican state convention. The dispatch is signed by Parker L. Walter, the managing editor of the Chronicle-Telegraph, who boldly charges that "open bribery and wholesale corruption" are being resorted to by the friends of Senator Delamater, both to secure a delegation favorable to him and to crush the ambitious spirit of ex-State Senator Lewis Emery, Jr., who has attacked Mr. Delamater and now seeks congressional honors.

The writer says that immediately after Emery's now famous speech, "Chairman Andrews decided to carry the delegates of McKean county for Delamater at any cost." To this end "he devoted himself to forming the federal office-holders into battallions, at the same time openly and flagrantly purchasing the influence of men here and there who up to this time were outspoken in the cause of Secretary of the Commonwealth Stone. The main body of the army was composed of employes of the United Pipe lines and workmen in every branch of the oil business who could be influenced by the Standard and democratic politicians."

The dispatch continues: "In all his enviously indecent political career chairman Andrews has never been more shameless in open bribery than in this contest in McKean. Money has been scattered into every nook in the county, and where money would not do federal offices, promises of patronage or threats have been used by Anthony Bannon, the Delamater-Andrews representative in McKean." The writer says Bannon gave Benjamin Thornton and P. H. Friel money to use in Delamater's interest, and acting for Bannon, Russell McAllister gave money to a colored man named Rutherford and to B. D. Pait. The dispatch says: "A man named Bickford was disabled while working for the United Pipe lines. He is a Delamater-Watson delegate, and says that if elected he has the promise of general superintendent Daniel O'Day that he will have back pay for the time he has been unable to work, and will in future draw a pension from the Standard. O. M. Coe, of Tarport, was a warm Stone and Emery man. He was made census enumerator, and is now working for Delamater, and Watson Davis, postmaster of Kane, is working as a Delamater delegate, as is the editor of the Eldred Eagle, who is a candidate for census enumerator. Koontz, postmaster at Lafayette Corners; Beaumont, postmaster at Alton, and Kerns, postmaster at Smethport, are for Delamater. Promises of work for drillers and other oil men are offered in the name of the Standard in return for Delamater-Watson support."—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, May 6.

All the recent contests for the election of delegates have been unfavorable to Mr. Delamater, his defeat in Chester county at the primaries on Saturday last, by the Hastings forces, being particularly disastrous. But it is announced that Mr. Quay—who will go into the state convention as a substitute delegate—intends to secure Mr. Delamater's nomination, and we have no doubt this statement will prove true, unless between this and the 25th Mr. Quay should have still more evidence of the certainty of a "Folger disaster" to follow such a course, and so be driven to a safer policy.

The Washington correspondents all assure us that the convention will be easily in Mr. Quay's control. The correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger, quoting "a republican who is prominent in the councils of the party in Pennsylvania," and who believes General Hastings will get the nomination, states that this prominent republican said: "Of one thing you may be certain, and that is, the convention will be controlled by Mr. Quay." And the correspondent of the Press, saying that there is a variety of opinion as to what will be done, declares that "all agree, however, that the convention will be beyond all dispute in the hands of Quay's friends, and that the power as well as the responsibility of making the ticket will be his."

Among the number of respectable citizens who have signed the letter to Mr. Delamater there must be many, we have no doubt, who are ignorant of the relation which he holds to Mr. Quay's political operations, and of the contract with that individual on which his candidacy rests. They must be unaware, also, we should presume, of the charges which have been brought against this aspirant for the governorship, in connection with his election to the state senate in 1886. Mr. Lewis Emery, Jr., recently state senator from McKean county, in a public speech at Bradford over two months ago, exhibited documents which he said were proof that Mr. Delamater had secured his election by means of bribery, and then had bribed persons to silence who were about to disclose the facts. It followed, of course, that in taking the oath of office, on assuming a seat in the senate he had sworn falsely that he had not used any corrupt means to secure election. These charges Mr. Emery declared he was ready to sustain in court if Mr. Delamater would bring suit against him for slander, and up to the present time the latter gentleman has not either brought such a suit, or even made a distinct denial of the impeachment. The Philadelphia Press, several weeks ago, called on him to make a denial, and assured him that his failure to do so would be a serious injury to his standing, but Mr. Delamater has nevertheless maintained silence.

The efforts of Mr. Quay to help the candidacy of Mr. Wallace, and so diminish the risk of running Mr. Delamater, have become very generally perceptible now, even to the ordinary observer, and the daily journals have contained many interesting details pointing out the why and wherefore of the case. Apparently, the democratic masses have perceived the interest which the republican boss has in giving them a candidate, and the result of several recent county contests has been in the direction of another than Mr. Wallace. Blair county, in which a snap judgment had been taken, and the choice of the voters reversed (after the fashion of Mr. Delamater's work in Cambria), has been corrected by a county convention, in which the Wallace men found themselves an insignificant faction, and in Cambria, which they had counted on with the greatest confidence, they were also in a minority. Both these counties elected delegates for Mr. Pattison. In Chester county the feeling for Mr. Pattison was so strong as to be practically unanimous.

The delegates chosen to the convention are not, like those who met at Harrisburg last year, simply a party of Mr. Quay's political followers, told off for this business. On the contrary a majority of them have been elected upon an understanding more or less positive that they would oppose the nomination—of Mr. Delamater—which it was well known Mr. Quay desired to have made. * * *

It follows, therefore, that if Mr. Quay is to have the complete control which is ascribed to him; if he is to have power to nominate

Mr. Delamater or to defeat him, it must be because he will be able to use in his own interests delegates who have been chosen for a different purpose. It must be that he can employ some persuasive to induce them to desert the candidates for whom they have been chosen, and to support a candidate whom they were particularly expected to oppose. * * *

What is the power that Mr. Quay is thought to have? Why should a majority of the republican convention of Pennsylvania, assembling under circumstances which especially call for personal independence and political courage, be regarded as certain to scrupulously follow whatever orders Mr. Quay may issue? Obviously enough, this influence comes from the supposed gift to him of the federal patronage of Pennsylvania. * * * Is it, then, Mr. Harrison's purpose to further this business? Does he mean still to back Mr. Quay in Pennsylvania? Will he assure Mr. Quay that whatever promises he may make of federal appointments will be faithfully carried out at Washington?

We desire to say to the President that every further step he takes in company with Mr. Quay and his following will be another step on the road to political disaster.—The American, June 14.

Executive Mansion, Washington, D. C., July 14, 1886.—To the Heads of Departments in the Service of the General Government: I deem this a proper time to especially warn all subordinates in the several departments and all office-holders under the general government against the use of their official positions in attempts to control political movements in their localities.

Office-holders are the agents of the people, not their masters. Not only is their time and labor due to the government, but they should scrupulously avoid in their political action, as well as in the discharge of their official duty, offending by a display of obtrusive partisanship their neighbors who have relations with them as public officials.

They should also constantly remember that their party friends from whom they have received preferment have not invested them with the power of arbitrarily managing their political affairs. They have no right, as office-holders, to dictate the political action of their party associates, or to throttle freedom of action within party lines by methods and practices which prevent every useful and justifiable purpose of party organization.

The influence of the federal office-holders should not be felt in the manipulation of political primary meetings and nominating conventions. The use by these officials of their positions to compass their selection as delegates to political conventions is indecent and unfair, and proper regard for the proprieties and requirements of official place will also prevent their assuming the active conduct of political campaigns.

Individual interests and activity in political affairs are by no means condemned. Office-holders are neither disfranchised nor forbidden the exercise of political privileges, nor is their duty to the party increased to pernicious activity by office-holding. A just discrimination in this regard between the things a citizen may properly do and the purpose for which a public officer should not be used is easy in the light of a correct appreciation of the relation between the people and those intrusted with official place, and a consideration of the necessity under our form of government of political action free from political coercion.

You are requested to communicate the substance of these views to those for whose guidance they are intended.—Grover Cleveland.

Approved by Postmaster General Wanamaker, April 25, 1890.

—The republican state convention met in Augusta (Me.) June 12. The chairman was the postmaster of Augusta. A dispatch to the New York Times states that nearly all the federal office-holders of the state were present as delegates.

—Formal complaint has been made to Postmaster-General Wanamaker that the post-offices in the twenty-third congressional district are being used to further the nomination of Col. Thomas M. Bayne for an eighth term in congress. Col. Bayne's competitor is George Shiras, a young lawyer, who is pushing the veteran pretty hard. The letter of complaint says:

The postmaster of Allegheny, the assistant postmaster, the subordinates already appointed, and those assured of position are standing as primary delegates for the present congressional incumbent. In every borough and township the postmasters are either delegates or have expressly stated that they are responsible for the election of delegates favorable to the renomination of the incumbent. So bitter has the feeling become that the party is in serious danger of disruption, simply and solely by reason of federal dictation. Personal friends of Mr. Shiras, as they daily witness the aggressive and offensive activity of Postmaster Gilliland, of Allegheny, and his subordinates are overcome with distrust in regard to the safety and wisdom of using the post office for even the most ordinary purposes. With the incumbent using the post office as his private headquarters the mistrust of this so called public institution is not exactly without reason.—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, May 25.

—Naval Officer Willis professed great surprise at the mention of Collins' name. "I left Washington last night," he said, "and I had talked a great deal about this subject, but there was no Collins in it."—Brooklyn post office fight, May 16.

—Secretary Tracy favors Wm. G. Taylor because his selection would help Robert D. Benedict in his desire to become Congressman Wallace's successor. All the news that comes from Washington is favorable to Mr. Taylor, but his closest friends do not care to state positively that he will be selected. Naval Officer Willis, who has been working hard for Mr. Taylor, thinks that the selection will be made within a few days, but he declined yesterday to say whether Taylor would get the prize or not.—New York Times, May 26.

—Mr. Hitt's postmaster here, Geo. F. Bucher, has been about the county, and he says the county delegation will be instructed for Hitt. The towns of Wysox, York, Rock Creek, Shannon, Savanna, Washington, Woodland and Freedom will send Hitt delegates to the county convention, and this, he insists, will insure the county for Hitt. What Mr. Bucher considers a test of the Hitt sentiment was made in Lanark this spring. Levi T. Bray, member of the last state assembly, ran for supervisor of Lanark and was badly beaten. Bray was the principal backer of H. D. Dennis, applicant for the post-office at Lanark. The post-office was given to Maj. Geo. A. Root, in consequence of which Bray is against Hitt. Postmaster Bucher says it was Hitt's friends who snowed Bray under for supervisor.—Letter to Chicago Herald from Carroll on Congressman Hitt's renomination, May 23.

—The postmaster, A. W. Hartong, has started out to see what he can do for his boss through the county. The soreheads here say they will see to it that an anti-Hitt delegation goes from their town to the county convention. They may and they may not be able to do this.—Letter to Chicago Herald from Rochelle on Congressman's Hitt's renomination, May 26.

At the annual meeting of the Maryland Civil Service Reform Association, held May 27, among others, the following resolutions were passed:

Resolved, That the disposal of federal patronage through congressmen and senators is a grave abuse, subversive of the constitutional distinction between the executive and legislative departments of the government; and we especially protest against and deplore the course of President Harrison in submitting his appointments in Pennsylvania to the dictation of a man who makes no defense when charged by responsible citizens and newspapers with participation in the criminal misappropriation of public money.

Resolved, That the use of public office for the purpose of paying partisan and personal political debts is immoral, and it is to be classed with the misuse and misappropriation of all other public property.

The Civil Service Reform Association, of Missouri, held its ninth annual meeting June 7. From the excellent report of Mr. Charles Claflin Allen, of the executive committee, we quote:

The administration of the classified service under the management of the present civil service commission has been admirable. The commission itself, led by Mr. Roosevelt, has shown an energy and activity in the performance of the duties, hitherto unequalled. Its supervision of the service, its quickness to investigate all reported abuses and to correct them when proved, and its improvement in the practical character of examinations, have placed the reform system upon a firmer footing than it has ever held.

In the non-classified service all is chaos. Wholesale removals and appointments constitute a conglomerate mass, in which it is impossible to discriminate between the deserved and the undeserved.

The civil service reform association of Newton, Mass., whose president is Rev. Henry Lambert, is an object lesson to various other sections of the country. It has a membership of several hundred, and it is thoroughly alive to its duty. Mr. Clarkson's recent crafty protestation of the patriotism and Americanism inherent in spoilsmen was an irritant that provoked an effective demolition at the hands of Charles Theodore Russell, Jr., the late democratic candidate for governor.

RECENT EXAMPLES OF THE MERIT SYSTEM.

Gen. James M. Warner, postmaster at Albany, New York, has been enforcing the civil service law. He found among the clerks and carriers twelve men who had remained through the administration of Dr. O'Leary from the previous republican administration. At the end of the first two years of Dr. O'Leary's term there were twenty-nine republicans. Gen. Warner has now in the force under him not to exceed thirty democrats. This made the spoilsmen beside themselves and the republican general committee of Albany county passed resolutions asking for his removal. When they found the postmaster calmly going about his business in the teeth of their resolutions, they got panic-stricken and failed to forward them.

The appointment of Mr. Ryan as superintendent of the New England division of the railway mail service was in accordance with Mr. Bigelow's dying wish that his capable assistant should be his successor. Spencer W. Shepardson, chief clerk of the various lines in the first division, has been appointed to the position made vacant by the promotion of Mr. Ryan. The latter has been in the railway mail service about twenty-one years, during twelve years of which he has been chief clerk of the first division. Mr. Shepardson has been in the service over seventeen years.

W. H. Lamb has been appointed superintendent of mails at St. Louis. Mr. Lamb is at present engaged in the office of the division superintendent of the railway mail service at this place, and is among the oldest employees of the postal department now stationed in St. Louis. He entered the service in the far western country seventeen years ago as a route agent, and was regularly promoted to second clerk, and then clerk in charge of a car, which position he held until 1882, when he resigned to accept his present situation in the local superintendent's office. The place to which Mr. Lamb has just been appointed is the one so long filled by Maj. J. B. Harlow, prior to his selection as postmaster last January.

William P. Campbell, of Illinois, has been appointed assistant general superintendent of the railway mail service, under the law recently passed creating that office, and Mr. Alexander Grant, of Michigan, has been appointed chief clerk to the general superintendent of the railway mail service. Both Mr. Campbell and Mr. Grant have for many years occupied prominent positions in this service, and are regarded as men of exceptional ability and fitness for the positions to which they have been appointed. Mr. Campbell has been longest in the service, and was directly in the line of promotion for the position to which he has been appointed.

THE MORALS OF CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

The first objection to the spoils system is that under it the offices are little better than a vast aggregation of bribes for party workers, and that they thus constitute a huge corruption fund, the dispensing of which belongs to the party for the time being in the ascendant. "The promise of an office, whether express or implied, as an inducement to a man to vote or work in an election, is as real a bribe as so many dollars in hand paid; with this distinction, however, that it is a much worse form of bribery. It is so for two reasons: it is a promise to pay what does not belong to him who promises, and its effect, when fulfilled, is, or may be, to put a corrupt man into the service of his country." The federal civil service costs the country in salaries altogether $60,000,000. Of this compensation the recipients of about one-half come now happily under the reform law, but $30,000,000 remain attached to offices not so protected. Who can estimate the evil to the bribe-giver and the bribe-taker thus rendered possible? And, further: when it became recognized that a congressman might pay those who worked for his election by places under government, and there were not enough such places to go around (as there never are), the next step was to make places, i. e., put upon the pay-rolls of a bureau or department more names and employ more persons than were necessary to do the work in order to satisfy increased demands. At one period since the war there were more than 1,500 such in the treasury department alone. Two-thirds of those employed in the bureau of printing and engraving at this time were found by a congressional committee of investigation to be superfluous, and the annual appropriation was, in consequence, reduced without interfering with its efficiency, from eight to two hundred thousand dollars. This bureau has now long been under civil service rules, and is one of the purest and best ordered in Washington.

Another objection to the patronage system is its grievous injustice. It is an inheritance from the days of feudalism, and an abuse which they set about reforming in the mother country about the time it was first rooting itself here. When the great reform laws, beginning in 1832, gradually admitted the mass of the English people to suffrage, they quickly began to show their appreciation of exclusive privilege and to reorganize their civil service, though radical change dates only from 1853. Now the son of the peer and the son of the peasant, irrespective of politics, has an equal chance to gain admission to the service of his country. * * How different, except in the classified service, is the case with us! We delude ourselves with the idea that here all men are free and equal, and that we have eliminated old abuses, whereas we tolerate some of the gravest that ever existed. One of these is the practical exclusion, sometimes for a long term of years, from a chance to earn a living in public employment of one-half our population; that is, all, however worthy, who do not happen to belong to the same party as the President; and, indeed, all of that party who can not command influence with the appointing power. * *

The last evil of the spoils system which we have room to particularize is its heartlessness. Men who would shrink from taking the bread out of the mouth of the widow and orphan, or of depriving a man with dependent family of his only means of support, in any other way, will do their utmost on a change of administration to get, and will even make merry over getting a postmastership the loss of which amounts to this, and that, too, when the office is really not needed. "One of the winning party is bound to have it," it is said, "why should not I be the man?" Such is the brutalizing tendency of the system, and it is the system far more than the individual in such a case that is to be blamed. Justice, decency and humanity alike are set at naught by the inexorable spirit of spoils-mongering. A poor widow in California last year out of the salary of a fourth-class post-office supported herself, two children, and an aged father and mother. She gave entire satisfaction to the people, and was assured before his election of the favor of the congressmen. When elected, however, the place was necessary to assist in paying his political debts, and she was, with scant ceremony, dismissed.—L. M. Blackford, in the Virginia Seminary Magazine for June.

AUGUST 1, the Battle Ground Camp Meeting Association, at Battle Ground, will be addressed in the forenoon by the various political candidates of that section, and in the afternoon by the Rev. A. C. Van Anda, of Indianapolis, on "Purity of the Ballot," and by Lucius B. Swift, of Indianapolis, on civil service reform.

At the recent republican convention of this county the chairman, Mr. C. W. Fairbanks, said:

The republican party of Marion county rarely has had a better opportunity to render signal service to itself and to the people. There is a demand that the vast affairs of this county shall be managed on a strictly business basis and that they shall not be prostituted to promoting the interests of any political party. They shall be conducted according to the most conservative and economical methods to the end that the best service shall be rendered at the least cost.

This sounds exceedingly well, but it is still a question how far these ideas would prevail in case of republican success. The republicans, through a republican superintendent, now control the fire department of the city, and the chief has the nomination of men for appointment. There are twelve vacancies, and he can not agree with the council as to what men shall have them. Some time ago this paper suggested a plan by which he could throw open these vacancies to competition, but up comes the Indianapolis Journal, which has for years been, on paper, a supporter of the merit system, and says that the proposal is not feasible in practice. It is entirely feasible in practice and practice has so proved it. The Journal knows this well enough, but there are twelve places in the fire department which hungry workers want.

BOTH parties have this year an opportunity to prove the sincerity of their professions, many times expressed, of opposition to the spoils system. Our state civil service, by reason of the increase in the number of state institutions, has become large. It is with rare exceptions used as party spoil. We have four large institutions for the insane, two prisons, a home for feeble-minded children, a soldiers' orphan home, an institute for the deaf and dumb, a school for the blind, and so on. It is a disgrace that party politics should control the administration of these institutions. The taxes do not furnish money sufficient to keep the state government going. Before increasing the levy would it not be well to try the transaction of the state business upon a business basis? Here is a great work for either party to undertake. Before a voter votes for a candidate for the general assembly, he should find out how the candidate stands on this matter.

THE readers of the CHRONICLE will be interested to learn that Congressman Hitt's postmasters pulled him through, and that Charlie Works so feelingly alluded to in the various letters and reported interviews with the workers printed in the CHRONICLE some months since, was the man to nominate him. Congressman Hitt is far above the average congressman. His instincts are toward a state of affairs where a man will not be debauched himself, nor debauch his constituents by elections secured by spoil.

SENATOR JOHN S. WIRT, a democrat of Maryland, spoke recently to the Alumni of St. John's College upon "The Relation of the Alumni of St. John's as Men of Liberal Education to the Civil Service Reform Movement." The address is an admirable one and is printed in the Civil Service Reformer for July. A single extract will show that there was no vagueness nor uncertainty in what he said, nor any belittling of the evil:

"I know of no single cause in our history which has contributed more to dwarf the mental and moral stature of our public men, and more encouraged venality and servility in those engaged in the public service, while it has lowered the whole moral tone of the nation. To make the skillful and corrupt manipulation of patronage almost the sole qualification for political station must, with occasional exceptions, produce a class of public men who are neither disposed nor able to deal with public questions with a view to the permanent interests of the country.

THE Buffalo civil service reform association held its annual meeting June 25, and received ninety-nine new members. This association is remarkable in two respects. It has the public hearty sympathy and co-operation of the labor associations of the city, and of several of the most prominent of the Catholic clergymen. Father Cronin's speech is reported to have been particularly brilliant, and it was repeatedly applauded enthusiastically.

POSTMASTER JOHNSON, of Baltimore, has made numerous removals of clerks and carriers, and charges have been filed with the civil service commission. Mr. John C. Rose was appointed supervisor of the census for Baltimore. This enabled the civil service commission to put him on the local examining board. There is now the opportunity to look into Postmaster Johnson's methods. The system of having a local board made up of a postmaster's employes, but who are supposed to act in entire independence of him, is an anomaly and vicious in its effects. In view of Postmaster Johnson's apparent attempt to construct a political and personal machine it is well that Mr. Roosevelt has again stepped in to foil the attempt by a notice in the Baltimore Sun, inviting democrats to compete and assuring all of fair treatment. While Mr. Rose is a member of the local board the operations of the law will be conducted with absolute fairness. He is an experienced and skillful hand at battling Baltimore law breakers.

DR. JENCKES AND THE MUGWUMP.

Rev. Joseph S. Jenckes, of St. Paul's Episcopal church of this city, recently closed a criticism of Bishop Potter with the remark that he (Potter) was a mugwump, and that he (Jenckes) respected republicans and democrats, but that politically he could have no respect for a mugwump. A mugwump is a man who believes he can get certain principles worked into laws, or certain laws, already enacted, enforced, or better administration by public officers by voting direct for the men who are for the time being most likely to accomplish one or all of these objects rather than by wearing the collar of a party machine, which is in these times kept together, not by principles but by nothing but the spoil of office, and which intends, except under great pressure, to put forward to be voted for no man who can, if elected, interfere with its daily loot. His freedom permits him often to render the public a valuable service by voting against a tainted candidate.

Even his range of choice is often too narrow for the making up of a respectable ticket.

The coming election in Pennsylvania affords a great field of operations for voters of this class. The present dictator of that state is Senator Quay. The result of republican success would be to extend his power. He has been charged by respectable people of great financial responsibility with having taken some hundreds of thousands of dollars from the treasury of the state and used it in private speculation. He does not deny the charge, and those who make it say that they are ready to prove it. His candidate for governor, Delamater, is also charged with the crime of bribery, which his accuser offers to prove in court. Other charges of a grave nature are made against both of these men. Both are silent. We should like to ask Dr. Jenckes what he would advise a citizen of Pennsylvania to do under the circumstances? Ought he to read the charges, and if so, ought he to give them any weight? If he became convinced they were true, ought he to vote to sustain Quay, and if not, ought he to vote to defeat the Quay regime, even though by so doing he should be classed as a mugwump? Will Dr. Jenckes say that a man may put his conscience into the keeping of another and that since President Harrison and Mr. Wanamaker do not denounce Quay and Delamater, he may therefore excuse himself from investigation?

If we have misunderstood his meaning, what does Dr. Jenckes mean by saying that politically he has no respect for a mugwump?

THE AMERICAN OFFICIAL CLASS.

A BRIEF BIOGRAPHY.

Eugene Sauley, of this city, is an interesting example of the present spoils system which seeks to perpetuate itself by crying out that any other system would give rise to an office-holding class. He first appears in the city directory in 1873 as a laborer. In 1874 he was not enrolled, but in 1875 he was put down as barkeeper for C. McGroarty. In 1876 and 1877 he does not appear. In 1878 he appears as bartender for Harry McFarland, the present notorious employe of the printing office at Washington. In 1879 Sauley appears as bartender. In 1880 he was turnkey at the central police station. In 1881 he held the same place. In 1882 he was clerk to the chief of police. In 1883 he held the same place. In 1884, 1885 and 1886 he was city assessor. In 1887 he is called a clerk, and was in fact in the assessor's office. In 1888 he was clerk in the assessor's office. In 1889 he had no occupation. He was then waiting for a federal position. This did not come, and he again took a place as clerk in the assessor's office at, we understand, two dollars a day. Later he became a deputy in the office of the collector of internal revenue, in which office he still holds a place with emoluments amounting to about $1,200 a year.

The question was put to an ex chairman of the republican county committee, why Sauley always had a "place," and the answer came instantly, "Because he is the best organizer in Marion county." In this answer is the explanation of the use to which a vast number of state and federal officers are put. Sauley has been all these years literally a party-worker. At the primaries, as a delegate to conventions, as committee man, as secretary of the county committee, and in other similar capacities, he has plied his trade. The places he has held were his pay. His pay has not always been prompt. For instance, the place he now holds was only vacated and turned over to him after an earnest and almost threatening demand by a large crowd of those who had a high esteem for Sauley's abilities as a party-worker, and on this ground the place was demanded and given. He is a perfect specimen of our large American official class who owe and acknowledge no allegiance except to the party machine.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The coming election in Pennsylvania is a matter of grave concern. It is Mahone and Virginia over again, but on a larger scale and of greater importance. It is not necessary to repeat that Quay now holds the government of Pennsylvania, both state and national, firmly by the throat; he keeps his hold by means already fully set out in these columns. He does not, and can not, deny that he stole large amounts of money from the treasury of his state, and he is in the ordinary acceptance of the term, a thief. The fact that he has since been chosen to high offices does not in the least take away the stain of his crime, nor the disgrace of the respectable people of his state who now support him. If he succeeds in the coming election the stain will remain and the disgrace will be doubled. The corruption which the spoils system has worked among the people of Pennsylvania, is powerfully illustrated by the fact that a great body of honest people who believe in sending thieves to prison, propose to smother their honest principles and do what they can to help Quay through, notwithstanding his crime. President Harrison is in the attitude of working side by side with Quay, and with them Postmaster-General Wanamaker. They have turned the federal service in Pennsylvania over to Quay. As with Mahone in Virginia, every good citizen ought to hope that they will here also meet with a stinging, overwhelming and disgraceful defeat. It is not sure that they will; but it is sure they can not afford to win. For to do so, would be the triumph of the wicked. Henry C. Lea thus warns his party:

Fellow republicans, a vindication truly is needed at the coming election, but it is not the vindication of tainted politicians who dare not vindicate themselves. You are called upon to vindicate your own manhood, to vindicate the honesty of your own party, to vindicate the honor of your own state. You are called upon show that you do not wear the collar of Mr. Quay; that your votes are not to be bought and sold by the manipulation of patronage, and that you are not to be driven to the polls like cattle to make good the bargains of your bosses. You are called upon to teach a lesson to your self constituted masters, and to show the country at large that the grand old party may still be trusted to manage the affairs of the nation. If Pennsylvania, the stronghold of republicanism, the typical republican state, tamely acquiesces in the debauched domination of Quayism and proclaims that Messrs. Quay and Delamater are its trusted and honored leaders, what chance, think you, will the republican party have when it asks the support of the sober second thought of the country in 1892? Rebellion against usurped domination of such leaders is the truest fidelity to party and the highest duty of patriotism.

VIEWS OF DEMOCRATIC LEADERS.

The position and great influence of the St. Louis Republic makes its utterances on any subject important. It reads clearly the signs of the times, and in what it says of civil service reform we give it credit, not only for clear sight, but for an earnest desire to see a great benefit conferred upon the country. It said, June 24, 1890:

The Pendleton law was a first step—a short one. Its enforcement is but the beginning, not the end to be reached by the reform of the civil service. The reform itself must be pushed until no party can reward its scavenger workers with office and salary at the expense of the people. The system under which the President acts as the head of a District of Columbia bureau of bossism and patronage brokerage, with an agent in every congressional district and sub-agents in every county, all operating together for the control of state politics, must be abolished, and the federal civil service restored and restricted to its proper function of serving as an agency for transacting the common business of the people of the several states.

There is no obscurity about this from any standpoint possible for the democratic party. It is clear. There is a great work to be done, and the democratic party must do it. It is impossible that the present system should continue. Under it the federal offices are farmed out to senators, to members of congress, to defeated candidates, to state and county committeemen, to anyone who can make any sort of show of title to be a patronage boss. The President trades in the federal offices to secure power over congress. The senators and congressmen of the party in power trade in them to control politics in their states and districts. The committeemen and minor bosses trade in them for every conceivable purpose of corruption, from controlling a primary to outright sale for cash—as The Republic has repeatedly demonstrated in the last two years. This will go on until the system which makes such corruption inevitable is radically changed for the better.

No democrat can refuse to co operate in the movement to bring that about. No democrat can believe that it is well for his party, his state, or his country, that an administration ring in the District of Columbia should thus be allowed to draw on the federal treasury for the purpose of controlling state politics and dictating to the states what attitude they shall assume in national affairs.

On the same date Judge Niblack, now and always a democrat, addressed the Hendricks Club, of this city, on the same subject. Judge Niblack has recently concluded a period of twelve years on the supreme bench of this state. Before that he was, several terms, a member of congress, where he voted against the Pendleton act, because he thought the country not ready for it. He now says that civil service reform is engrossing the attention of the country and must be settled one way or another; that when an office-seeker can not obtain his ends he generally abuses the civil service law, and therein receives plenty of aid and comfort from his congressman; that the time has come when there should be a system of equality in the distribution of the offices; it is not right that they should be given out as the perquisites of congressmen. In times past, no matter how competent the clerk, he was discharged just as soon as the term of his "influence" expired, to make way for the protege of his congressman's successor—a gross injustice. The clerks absolutely transact the business of the various departments, and the country hardly realizes the importance of having these competent men. Judge Niblack also says that the people have no conception of the numerical strength of the place-hunters who are wholly unqualified for the places they want. We quote from the Sentinel report:

"A stock man," said he, "once came to me and asked for my signature to a petition for his appointment as an Indian agent. I asked him what qualification he had for the position, and he replied: 'Well, I have been so used to dealing in cattle that I can look at a cow and tell you just what she is thinking about; so, I guess, I can handle Indians.'" "Well," said the judge, with a laugh, "I signed his petition, but he didn't get the place."

We conclude that Judge Niblack would not now sign such a petition, and we may add that he has also said that, in the matter of the merit system, it is useless for his party to kick against the pricks. We hope he will use his undoubted influence to bring his party to stop the use of the public institutions of this state as party spoil, and that he will labor with his fellow democratic leaders to boldly make the merit system a tenet of that party.

SECOND REPORT

Of the Special Committee of the National Civil Service Reform League.

PATENT OFFICE.

The patent office is a bureau quite unique in its character. Having to deal with the claims of inventors, it reaches nearly every manufacturing interest in the country; and there is a great body of mechanics and skilled artisans who are concerned in its proper administration and keenly watchful of its proceedings. The possession of a patent is often the only hope which a mechanic can cling to for a permanent betterment in his condition. The duties of most of the higher officials in the patent office are largely judicial in character. Though appeals are allowed from their decisions, yet a large number are not appealed from, and are therefore final; and for the performance of these judicial duties there is need of freedom from partisan politics and a reasonable degree of security of tenure during honesty and efficiency, and a hope of promotion for special ability. There is even less reason why these offices should be "political" than that the United States district or circuit judges should be "political," though in such positions as those of the patent office changes should be allowed where it is clear the efficiency of the office is to be thereby increased; and, on the other hand, no political influence should shelter incompetent or dishonest men from removal.

The head of the office is a commissioner, having associated with him an assistant commissioner; a law clerk, who aids in the judicial labors; a chief clerk, who is the principal administrative officer of the bureau; a finance clerk, in whose charge are the revenues of the office; a librarian; an examining corps, consisting of about one hundred and eighty persons, who investigate the claims of applicants, to determine what is new and patentable in their inventions; and about three hundred and sixty other employes, clerks, copyists, draughtsmen, laborers and messengers, distributed chiefly among four principal divisions. The first of these divisions, which is under the supervision of the chief clerk, receives, registers and distributes all applications for patents, and has charge of interference and appeal records and the general correspondence of the office, as well as of the models and scientific library, and attends to the financial duties of the office; the second, or "issue and gazette division," prepares patents for delivery, and issues the Official Gazette and other official publications; the third, or "draughtsman's division," has charge of the drawings, printed patents, photo-lithographic copies, and rejected and abandoned applications; and the fourth, or "assignment division," registers the transfers of patents, attends to the making of manuscript copies, preserves files of caveats, etc. Each of the last three divisions is under the control of a chief of division. The revenues of the patent office average about $4,000 to the working day, and represent fees paid for patents, for the registry of assignments, the purchase of patent publications and copies of specifications of American and foreign patents, and of American applications for patents, and of manuscript decisions of the judicial officers of the patent office. Between the commissioner of patents and the examining corps there exists an intermediate tribunal, known as the board of examiners in chief, composed of three members appointed by the President, which entertains appeals from the adverse decisions made by the principal examiners; and from the adverse decisions of this board an appeal lies to the commissioner in person. Aside from these proceedings a vast number of interlocutory appeals arise, which concern the methods of practice under the rules; and these are taken from the principal examiners directly to the commissioner in person. It will be perceived that the office of commissioner unites duties which are administrative and judicial, and demands, not merely a good lawyer, familiar with science and mechanics and with the application of legal principles, but at the same time a man of unusual executive capacity.

The beginning of the present administration found this whole bureau in the control of spoilsmen, as far as the civil service law would allow it to be. They were in possession, both above and below the classified list, of nearly all the offices on which they could lay their hands. It would be no injustice to Mr. Montgomery, the first commissioner appointed by President Cleveland, to say that he entered the office without any experience in matters of patent law, and knew next to nothing of the practice and needs of the office. He appointed his brother as his confidential clerk, to distribute the offices of the bureau among some of the more influential congressmen. President Cleveland appointed as assistant commissioner, presumably upon political influence, the brother of a democratic senator, who had served in Congress and had been chairman of the committee on patents. He was not a lawyer, and was without experience in the duties of such an office.

The appointment of the law clerk by the commissioner was also purely a matter of patronage. This was a position for which, during many years previous, the appointment had been made from members of the examining corps, detailed by personal selection of the commissioner. The duties of law clerk are not defined by law. He is an assistant to the commissioner; and, although he can not render decisions finally, he acts as a sort of referee, who advises the commissioner on matters of fact and questions of practice which the latter officer can not find time to examine in detail. It often happens that an efficient law clerk will prepare decisions which are afterwards signed by the commissioner upon inspection and approval. When cases go to the courts on appeal, the law clerk is the representative of the patent office. The variety and character of the work and the dignity of the place aroused the ambition of all those members of the lower examining corps who had some legal training, and made them eager to fit themselves in law and perform their duties well, in the hope that they might sometime be selected for this position. This incentive had developed a splendid esprit de corps among these men, who were thus encouraged to engage in the study of patent law.

This position of law clerk had been held successively by men who have attained prominence at the patent bar. Only one exception had been made to the rule of appointing to this office by promotion from the lower positions in the examining corps. On that occasion the law clerk was chosen from outside the office; and it was the cause of much discouragement among the examiners, who thus saw their own hopes of promotion taken away. This was the only exception until the administration of Commissioner Montgomery, who appointed the law clerk from outside and upon political grounds. This new law clerk was entirely inexperienced in the duties of the place, and could make no pretensions to being well qualified to perform them. This was a disastrous blow to the ambition of the examiners, who sought this promotion as a reward for the faithful performance of their duty. Another place which had been held up as the prize of efficiency under former commissioners was that of examiner of interferences, a sort of court of first instance where trials are had by conflicting claimants upon proofs regularly introduced. This was also filled from the corps of examiners before Mr. Montgomery became commissioner. Under him, however, the new examiner was appointed from outside the office. Up to the time of his appointment he knew little about the working of the patent office, and was not greatly experienced in patent law; but he has doubtless acquired considerable experience during his service. He remains in office.

Commissioner Montgomery also reduced two out of the three chiefs of divisions to $1,800 clerkships, and filled the places of these chiefs by men from the outside, politicians of influence, but without experience, the men reduced doing the bulk of the work. One of the new appointees brought considerable scandal upon the office. He also still holds his position.

Another remarkable practice was begun under Commissioner Montgomery. The offices of fourth assistant examiners (whose duties properly related exclusively to the examination of patents) were in many instances filled by clerks who were still retained at their clerical work, and did no duty at all as assistant examiners, although they were classified as such. At one time there were no fewer than twenty of these clerks who had thus been transferred to fourth assistant examinerships, the duties of which position they did not perform. This weakened perceptibly the examining corps and impaired the efficiency of the office. Your committee was for sometime at a loss to understand any motive for this transfer, as both these clerkships and examinerships were embraced in the classified service, and so could not be filled with political favorites; but your committee afterwards learned that the clerkships vacated by this transfer were filled by promotion from a lower grade, that the ranks from which these places were recruited were in their turn filled by a special examination for examiner's clerks, and that a number of persons appointed without competitive examination as "skilled laborers" had been detailed for duty as examiners' clerks, and had thus acquired a knowledge of the duties of that office, which gave them peculiar advantages for passing the special examination for it. Thus, by making a political favorite first a "skilled laborer" and then giving him a "special" examination, he could obtain a clerkship from which political favorites were usually barred by open competitive examinations. These irregularities and perversions of the law could not but be followed by disastrous results.

The work of the patent office under these conditions steadily declined in efficiency. The examining corps had been under the control of the competitive system for a number of years, and it was mostly beyond the reach of political influence. The principal examiners, of whom there were twenty-eight, were officials whose salaries ranged above that fixed by the classified service; but the commissioner doubtless recognized that to remove these men of long training to make place for politicians would cause inextricable confusion, and that without them the bureau would be helpless and unable to perform its functions. Hence they were retained.

President Cleveland saw his way clear to transfer Commissioner Montgomery into a different field; and he appointed as his successor Benton J. Hall, of Iowa, who had also served in congress and was a lawyer known to be of some ability and character in his own state, but not specially acquainted with patent law or the needs of the patent office. He devoted his energies mainly to preserving the remnants of good service against further inundations, and he gained the respect of all who knew him in the office. He was surrounded, however, by many incompetents, who had been inducted into office during the administration of his predecessor, and whom he did not discharge. He found it necessary to resort frequently to the practice of letting out a considerable portion of the judicial functions of the office to commissions specially created from time to time from among the older and more experienced men of the examining corps. These men, whose official duties required all their time, were obliged to take up details which ought to have been within the easy reach of the assistant commissioner and law clerk; but, while these latter were retained, there seemed to be no other way of doing the public business than that of calling in these examining officers to perform the duties of their superiors. A change for the worse was made during the administration of Commissioner Hall, when, in July, 1887, Schuyler W. Duryce was displaced from the office of chief clerk, and a successor was appointed for political reasons who was without experience, and therefore largely dependent upon his subordinates.

The appointment of the present commissioner by President Harrison was made in pursuance of sound business principles. There were several candidates for appointment, some of them retired congressmen, and many of them with strong political backing; but the President resisted this influence, and declared that, if the patent bar would unite in a recommendation, he would appoint the man they recommended. The present commissioner, Mr. Charles H. Mitchell, was suggested. He was a patent lawyer of extensive experience and recognized standing, with a large income from his profession; and his acceptance of the office involved considerable pecuniary sacrifice. As soon as it was ascertained that he would accept, the leading patent lawyers of the country endeavored to secure his appointment. He had their almost unanimous support as thoroughly well qualified for the position. This commissioner seems to be independent of political influences, and has inaugurated valuable reforms. The President appointed to the office of assistant commissioner, in place of Mr. Vance, Robert J. Fisher, who had been a member of the board of examiners in chief, and who had been a competing applicant for the commissionership. This appointment was strictly in the line of civil service reform principles. The office was next in grade above that which he had filled; and he was well qualified for it, had been in the service about twelve years, and had gone through the various grades from lowest assistant examiner up to the place he then occupied, and he had filled every grade worthily and satisfactorily. He was familiar with the business of the office and the personnel of the corps. The President, on the advice of the commissioner, next promoted, to the vacancy made by the promotion of Mr. Fisher, Mr. Solon W. Stocking, who had also begun at the lowest grades and had been in the office about seventeen years, a tried examiner of proved ability, upon whom the democratic commissioners during their terms had greatly relied. Mr. Stocking had entered the examining corps by competitive examination, which had been applied to the examining corps for many years continuously previous to the passage of the Pendleton bill, and had risen through each grade in the same way, and is himself a typical fruit of the competitive system. Although an ardent republican, he had given to the democratic head of the office his best service. He had come in under civil service rules, and considered public duty as paramount to mere party claims. The commissioner also reappointed as his chief clerk Mr. Schuyler W. Duryce, who came in from the treasury department in 1883—had been chief clerk during the administration of President Arthur (but had been displaced during the administration of Commissioner Hall), and was a man of excellent executive capacity. The commissioner also changed the law clerk, superseding him by Mr. Frothingham, a change for the better; although, as Mr. Frothingham was appointed to the place from the outside, this change has not restored to the corps of examiners the incentive to faithful and efficient work which had formerly been inspired by the hope of promotion to this office from their own ranks. It is true that the office of law clerk is somewhat confidential in its nature and the occupant should be in touch with the bar and outside world, and it may happen that the right sort of person may not always be found within the ranks of the examining corps. In such a case, it might be proper to make an exception from the salutary method of promotion; but it must also be remembered that special training and a knowledge of the office are required, and these can rarely be found outside of the office itself,—that promotion to the office of law clerk is the only promotion besides that to the office of examiner of interferences to which the examining corps can look,—that the good an established system of promotion does to the whole force is greater in its total result than the individual gain likely to be had by making an exception to the rule, and that one exception is likely to be followed by discouragement and uncertainty. Adding to this the fact that long experience in the department has shown admirable law clerks can be found among the examining corps, which at present is certainly not below the average, your committee think it was a mistake not to revive the advantages gained by the former system of promotion within the office.

Your committee are glad to report from information in their possession, derived, as they believe, from trustworthy and non-political sources, that there has been a decided improvement in the efficiency of the office since the appointment of the present commissioner.

The system of competitive examinations, as applied to the Patent Office, had been begun under the civil service commission and rules, established by General Grant in 1871-72; and, though these rules were in operation for a short time only, "the system of competitive examinations, once established," to quote from a letter written us by a former commissioner of patents, and representing the opinions of several of the leading commissioners from 1872 to 1885, "so approved itself that succeeding commissioners clung to it." "Experience had shown that the office obtained better 'raw material' under open competition, and that promotion in grade for approved fitness in like competition relieved the commissioner from a tremendous amount of importunate buttonholing, and was accepted by the corps as a fair and square test;" that the members of the corps "were thus secure in zealous efforts to study and work for their own advance;" and "the efficiency and esprit de corps of the appointees were thus constantly improving. These examinations, as continued by the commissioner of patents, applied only to the various grades of the examining corps; while, under the Pendleton law (1884), the examinations have been extended to the positions of clerks, draughtsmen, skilled laborers, and others.

The following tables show the positions in the unclassified and classified service of the patent office, with the salaries:

In the history of this office, we see not only how beneficial the civil service system has been in giving increased efficiency in this important office, to the great advantage of the general public, but also how it is possible, notwithstanding the civil service law, for a head of a bureau who is not in sympathy with the purposes of that law to go very far toward demoralizing the bureau. This was done by filling the places above and below those covered by the law with political favorites, and by making exceptions to the rules and "back-door entrances" to the classified service; and, lastly, we see how it was mainly the good effects of the civil service rules acting upon those places to which it applied that saved the demoralization from being complete.

The contrast between the two systems, as affecting the efficiency of an office, is striking. The spoils system means giving the offices for partisan purposes to those who feel it a favor to receive the appointments. The reform system seeks to establish permanent administrative methods for guarding business principles in office, against political interference. These methods consist of open competitive tests made to suit the special duties to be performed, practical trial in office during a probationary period before final appointment, filling the higher grades by promotion, and at the heads of the bureaus to put such persons as confer a favor upon the public by accepting the position rather than such as consider the office as a favor to themselves in return for political influence or work.

A MANACLED PRESS.

Daniel Webster in 1832.

And is a press that is purchased or pensioned more free than a press that is fettered? Can the people look for truths to partial sources, whether rendered partial through fear or through favor? Why shall not a manacled press be trusted with the maintenance and defense of popular rights? Because it is supposed to be under the influence of a power which may prove greater than the love of truth. Such a press may screen abuses in government or be silent. It may fear to speak. And may it not fear to speak, too, when its conductors, if they speak in any but one way, may lose their means of livelihood? Is dependence on government for bread no temptation to screen its abuses? Will the press always speak the truth, when the truth, if spoken, may be the means of silencing it for the future? Is the truth in no danger, is the watchman under no temptation, when he can neither proclaim the approach of national evils, nor seem to decry them, without the loss of his place?

Mr. President, an open attempt to secure the aid and friendship of the public press, by bestowing the emoluments of office on its active conductors, seems to me, of everything we have witnessed, to be the most reprehensible. It degrades both the government and the press.

"THE SOLE DISCRIMINATING TEST."

There is a good deal of complaint among the officers at the navy yard at the slow work being done on the Pensacola's bottom. That vessel went into dry dock a month ago and repairs were at once begun, but at this time she is far from completed, and will probably be in dock for some time to come. It was said yesterday by the men supposed to be at work on her that they were delayed because of a lack of nails. The real truth about the matter, however, is that the work on the Pensacola and in other parts of the navy yard is controlled by "bosses" appointed by Brooklyn politicians. These men draw their pay by the day and work just about as they please.

The officers of the yard are practically powerless in whatever supervisory capacity they may be placed. Frequently they have remonstrated with the "bosses" of the gangs at work, but always in vain. Several times they have threatened to have the indolent men discharged, and in one or two instances their threats have been carried out, but with very few exceptions the discharged men have restored themselves to their old positions through political influence of a kind that is outrageously exercised in Brooklyn under this administration. It can hardly be expected that beneficiaries of such a system of political patronage will prove to be workmen of the class required to superintend the complicated and oftentimes difficult work incident to an active navy yard.

Not long ago a number of republican laborers in Brooklyn, who aspire to the easy-going perennial jobs of their more fortunate brethren, appeared at the navy yard with applications indorsed by Senator Birkett. They were armed with other and equally formidable recommendations, and the way seemed clear to an immediate occupancy of all the vacancies in the yard. They were met, however, by the foreman, who, according to their report, is an insurmountable obstacle in the way of partisan patronage. He told the hopeful applicants that enough republicans in their wards had been given positions, and that as far as navy yard berths were concerned, those wards were irrevocably boycotted.

This resulted in a mass meeting of the disgruntled, which found vent in a formal protest that was sent to Washington. After complaining of the unjust discrimination exercised by the foreman, the protest stated many of the men who had been given jobs were those who had formally lived in remote portions of the city, but who had moved into the wards contiguous to the navy yard in order to insure the recognition that had been heretofore denied them.

This remonstrance appears to have found a listener, for it received immediate response in the shape of a letter from the Hon. Benjamin F. Tracy, secretary of the navy. This letter was received at the navy yard Tuesday. It contained a large number of blank forms, which are to be distributed among the employes in every department of the navy yard, calling for each man's name, age, street number, ward, rating, pay, date of appointment, by whom appointed, and by whom recommended. The blanks also require the residence of the workman previous to the date of his appointment.

All of these papers, when filled out, will be examined and checked off by the officers of the several departments and then forwarded to Washington for such use as this administration, in playing the game of politics, may see fit to make of them.—New York Times, July 11.

Naval officers in port declare that the alleged workmen now employed are the most incompetent and worthless that could be selected, that work is delayed and shirked, and that the condition of affairs is deplorable in the extreme. The basis for this demoralization lies in the fact that the lieutenants of Thomas C. Platt, the boss of the republican party, and of Secretary of the Navy Benjamin F. Tracy have had a falling out, and that in the scuffle for superiority the public welfare suffers.

The facts, so far as learned, indicate that Secretary Tracy has drawn the line at last, and insisted that hereafter every person who applies for a job shall place the name of his backer in his recommendation. The seventeenth ward seems to be the object of universal envy. There reside both William C. Wallace and Mr. Robert D. Benedict. The latter was defrauded out of the congressional nomination two years ago, and he is determined to obtain it this fall. Both of these gentlemen are powers in their district. Congressman Wallace is supported by Thomas C. Platt, John A. Nicholls, Senator Birkett, who boasts of having obtained more places for his henchmen than any other man, Ernst Nathan, and the rest of the gang that in the past have made Brooklyn politics notorious and infamous. Mr. Benedict is backed by the respectable element of his party. His friends have not fared so well, so far as patronage is concerned, as their opponents. An officer on duty in the yard said:

"This factional fight between these Brooklyn politicians is proving disastrous to our work here and to our men. If a gang of men are at work aboard ship the officers have no control whatever over them, but on the contrary are regaled by conversations which are carried on between them for hours at a time, to the utter disregard and neglect of the work in hand. Of course we are not supposed to know who is responsible for this state of affairs. That is not our business. All that concerns us is to have the work performed in as short a time as is consistent with thoroughness. You can't find that here. The workmen do as they please. And work that ought to be performed in an hour or two is usually stretched out to two or three days."

Brooklyn politicians predict that this breach at the navy yard is only a prelude to a more serious breach between Secretary Tracy and Platt. Recently the secretary heard that the twenty-third ward, which is bossed by Platt's faithful henchman, Ernst Nathan, had been favored in the matter of appointments to the detriment of the thirteenth, whose leader is William H. Leayercraft, who is committed to the fortunes of Mr. Benedict. The secretary wrote an autograph letter to the officer who has had charge of the disbursing of some of the federal patronage and wanted to know how it was that one ward had been more generously rewarded than the other. This was followed by a second letter requesting that all applicants shall have the names of their backers indorsed on the back of their recommendations.

"Work in the navy yard nowadays is a farce," said a Brooklyn contractor yesterday. "If you raked the yard fore and aft you would be rewarded by finding men unfit and incompetent, lazy and worthless. The Harrison administration is responsible for much that is censurable, but this business at the yard is simply outrageous. Why an investigation is not ordered or reform instituted is inexplicable. Of course, none of the naval officers stationed there can speak for publication, out of a mistaken sense of etiquette and loyalty to their chief, the secretary, but there is not an officer stationed in the yard, from the commandant to the junior, who is not aware of the demoralization that exists and the absolute disregard of responsibility that prevails. They laugh over it among themselves, but no one will speak for publication for obvious reasons. It is the system that is wrong. It is wrong for any boss such as Platt or for any of his heelers to imagine that the navy yard patronage is their personal property, to be awarded to their shouters who are unable from their incompetence and laziness to obtain work anywhere else. It has been a common remark up to within a fortnight that Mr. Platt's heelers had the bulk of the patronage, but since then it is understood that Secretary Tracy had stepped in and the Platt men have not carried their heads quite so high."—New York Times, July 12.

Orders that arrived at the navy yard on Wednesday removing Foreman Arthur Boyle from his position in charge of the construction of the new cruiser, No. 7, and appointing John O'Rourke, an experienced shipbuilder, formerly in the employ of John Ronch, to the position were made public yesterday. The news was a tremendous surprise to the republicans of the twentieth ward, Brooklyn, for Boyle is the republican lieutenant there of Mr. Wm. H. Beard and United States District Attorney Jesse Johnson. So great a rumpus did the removal cause that Mr. Johnson left for Washington yesterday to see if the matter could not be arranged.

This, however, is not at all probable, as Foreman Boyle was removed for neglect of duty. He was in the habit of going to the yard wearing a silk hat, his best clothes, and patent-leather shoes, and rarely remained on duty more than three or four hours a day. This kind of "sojering" did not at all suit such an old sea dog as Admiral Braine, and after a few kindly warnings he let the axe fall.

As foreman, Mr. Boyle had the authority to hire his own men, and the faithful of the twentieth ward were well provided for with places. He is now reduced to the position of a quartermaster under Foreman O'Rourke, but he declines to accept the situation, and has told Mr. Johnson that if the latter wants the support of the republicans of the twentieth ward, he must straighten the matter out right away.—New York Times, July 20.

Office-Holders Defending their Possessions.

Allotments thus acquired, mutually engaged such as accepted them to defend them; and as they all sprang from the same right of conquest, no part could subsist independent of the whole; wherefore all givers as well as receivers were mutually bound to defend each other's possessions. * * * Every receiver of lands, or feudatory, was therefore bound when called upon by his benefactor, or immediate lord of his fief or fee, to do all in his power to defend him. Such benefactor or lord was likewise subordinate to and under the command of his immediate benefactor and superior; and so upwards to the prince or general himself; and the several lords were also reciprocally bound, in their respective gradations, to protect the possessions they had given. Thus the feudal connection was established, a proper military subjection was naturally introduced and an army of feudatories was always ready enlisted and mutually prepared to muster. . . . Blackstone.

Office-holders are the agents of the people, not their masters. Not only is their time and labor due to the government, but they should scrupulously avoid in their political action, as well as in the discharge of their official duty, offending by a display of obtrusive partisanship their neighbors who have relations with them as public officials.

They should also constantly remember that their party friends from whom they have received preferment have not invested them with the power of arbitrarily managing their political affairs. They have no right, as office-holders, to dictate the political action of their party associates, or to throttle freedom of action within party lines by methods and practices which prevent every useful and justifiable purpose of party organization.

The influence of the federal office-holders should not be felt in the manipulation of political primary meetings and nominating conventions. The use by these officials of their positions to compass their selection as delegates to political conventions is indecent and unfair, and proper regard for the proprieties and requirements of official place will also prevent their assuming the active conduct of political campaigns.—President Cleveland, July 14, 1886.

—United States District Attorney Walter Lyon, who was permanent chairman of the republican state convention, said to a reporter to day:

"I never was pledged to Montooth, and it was well known that I was a Delamater man. I came out as a delegate for him, and had I so desired could have been instructed by the convention which sent me for Delamater. Had there been the least chance for Montooth's nomination I would have stuck to him. I knew there was no chance from the start, and I didn't propose to have the Allegheny county delegation sit in the convention with their thumbs in their mouths and take no part in the nomination for governor. Some of the Allegheny county delegation desired to have the delegation remain solid for Montooth, so that when it came home it could be said that Quay was not able to influence a man in the delegation. It was intended to hurt Quay by this means, and when the delegation came home it expected to have a good laugh over Quay's failure to influence the Allegheny county delegation. I didn't propose to be a party to any such scheme. If I had been asked by any one to stick to Montooth, in view of the fact that I knew it was hopeless, I should have declared that Montooth was never in the light, although some of his people actually persuaded him he was.

"Those who understood the situation knew better. What little fight there seemed to be was between Delamater and Hastings, but it hardly deserved the name of fight. Delamater could have been nominated on the first ballot had it been deemed advisable. A regard for Mayor Fitler, of Philadelphia, was the only thing that prevented this. All the delegates needed to nominate Delamater could have been obtained from the Philadelphia delegation. In order to prevent him from kicking it was deemed best to let the Philadelphia delegation go to Hastings on the first ballot; that is, as many as desired, and to nominate Delamater on the second. We wanted to let Fitler down as easy as possible, and so only took just enough to nominate Delamater from Philadelphia."—New York Times, June 28.

—Complaint has been made here to the President and the secretary of the treasury, sustained by ample proof, that ex-Gov. Warmouth, the collector of the port of New Orleans, is using all the power of his great office in favor of the rechartering of the Louisiana lottery company. A few days ago Warmouth sent an employe of his office to East Louisiana, where there is an election contest, the lottery question being the issue. Warmouth's custom house employe was named George S. Swayzee, and his business was to distribute lottery circulars.—Washington Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, June 18.

—T. G. Lawler, Congressman Hitt's postmaster at Rockford, was a delegate present at the convention that nominated Congressman Hitt.

—"The republican state convention met here to-day," says a dispatch from Montgomery last evening. "There were only thirty white men in the convention, most of whom are federal office-holders in Alabama."—New York Evening Post, June 5.

—The Auburn Advertiser (rep.) the organ of John K. Knapp, chairman of the republican state committee and postmaster at Auburn, announces that Platt's candidacy for the United States senate "may now be considered public, avowed and active. He will go back, if he can, to the seat from which the appointment of Senator Robertson hurried him in 1881."

—The interest in the third congressional battle is centred just now, and will be for some time, in the twenty-third ward, where Internal Revenue Collector Nathan has a growing opposition to light.

The cause of the dissatisfaction is the high-handed way in which Nathan runs the ward. He could not affect more absolute ownership if it were an old family pocket borough, and the thousands of new residents who are making the twenty-third one of the biggest wards in town object to wearing Nathan's collar. They lay claim to a sufficient number of adherents to beat Nathan, but complain that by all sorts of hocus pocus he prevents them from getting the names of their friends on the roll book of the association. Nathan's object, of course, is to keep these people out until after he elects his delegates to the approaching conventions in the third congressional and the ninth and eleventh assembly districts, all three of which he has practically owned for the last four years.

The strong attempt now being made by Robert D. Benedict, backed by Secretary Tracy, to dislodge Nathan, backed by Thos. C. Platt, from at least one of these republican strongholds, the third congressional, is what makes this fight in the twenty-third ward interesting to the general public.

Nathan is claiming to have won a significant victory for Congressman Wallace in the appointment of Michael Malone as master plumber on the new federal building. Malone is ex-Judge Rooney's man and a big figure in the Home and Country Protective Brotherhood of Workingmen. Nathan is trying to get the backing of the brotherhood in the Wallace-Benedict fight.—New York Times, July 13.

The Harrison administration received a set-back here to day, for, at a meeting of the republican state central committee in this city, the control of the party machinery passed into the hands of the anti-administration men.

After the election of last fall the republican party in this city, which has always been noted for its factional fights, split into two factions, and the feeling between them has been very bitter. So intense was this feeling that last May, when the city had to elect members to the state central committee, two sets of primaries were held, and May 6 two republican conventions were held in each legislative district in the city, and two sets of men were chosen members from Baltimore of the state central committee, the first meeting of which was held to day.

One of these factions is called the Johnson faction, is headed by Postmaster William W. Johnson, and includes nearly all the office holders in the city. Many federal officials, though caring nothing for the postmaster, supported him to day because they wanted all the administration men together, and they wanted to show the President that the Maryland republicans were all for him. Congressman Sidney E. Mudd, to whom they gave a seat, ousting Barnes Compton, championed Johnson's cause to-day in the committee as a proxy from Charles county.

The Henderson faction, or the antis, is headed by William T. Henderson, a local boss, who wanted the place that W. W. Johnson now holds—the postmastership. His cause to-day was championed by Thomas H. Hodson of Somerset county, who wanted the district attorneyship and did not get it.—Dispatch from Baltimore to N. Y. Times, July 17.

—A well informed correspondent writes to the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE:

"That the spirit of the civil service law is being violated in Indiana is perfectly well known to any one who pays the slightest attention to the working of the republican machine. Michener, attorney general and candidate for the United States senate, has the control of the federal patronage in Indiana. He is chairman of the state central committee. A state central committee was elected last January. At the various district conventions the federal office-holders, particularly the postmasters, were very prominent. In one district, the third, in which the administration, through Michener, was very anxious to win, Postmaster Ridland, of Scottsburg, a recent appointee, was compelled to change the vote of his county from the man of his choice to Michener's candidate. Postmaster Godfrey, of New Albany, was a delegate to that convention and worked actively for Carter, the Michener candidate, for committeeman. But for the official pressure brought to bear in that convention Carter would not have received one-third the vote. In the ninth congressional district contest for the nomination Mr. La Follette, superintendent of public instruction, was backed by Chairman Michener and all the patronage. B. Wilson Smith, postmaster at La Fayette, was particularly active in Mr. La Follette's behalf. Postal clerk Hack helped out, but in spite of all, La Follette was beaten. Several post-office inspectors were, it is said, traveling over the ninth district for La Follette. Right here in Indianapolis the federal officers are an active part of the machine. Postmaster Wallace, United States Marshal Dunlap and Collector Hildebrand take no open part in the manipulation, but they have good trusty subordinates who do. Deputy Postmaster Wallace is a delegate to all conventions. Deputy United States Marshal Conway is a delegate to all conventions, and is a member of the county central committee. Fred Schmidt, in the office of Collector Hildebrand, is the same. The same officer has as his deputy Eugene Saulcy, a hustler from away back, who is a member of the county committee."

CLARKSON vs. DANA.

"SUBSIDIZED" EDITORS.

A neat and epigrammatic little story, in which Assistant Postmaster General Clarkson figures as the hero, and Editor R. H. Dana of Boston as the victim, was recently going the rounds of the New York press. It runs as follows:—

There is a periodical published in Boston and devoted to civil service reform, whose editor is Richard Henry Dana. When J. S. Clarkson was in Boston a week ago, he was introduced to Mr. Dana. Indeed, the Boston mugwumps paid quite as much court to the first assistant postmaster-general as if he was not the axe-wielder for the decapitation of 50,000 official heads. At the head of his editorial page, Mr. Dana prints in each number of his journal a list of editors appointed by President Harrison to office, under the heading of "Subsidized Editors." Mr. Clarkson has seen this list, and in course of conversation he asked Mr. Dana this quiet and somewhat leading question:—

"Would you accept a federal position, Mr. Dana, provided it should be offered you by the President, and should be a high and responsible one,—say, civil service commissioner?"

With the idea that Mr. Clarkson might be putting out a feeler for the administration, Mr. Dana responded emphatically,

"Yes, I think I would."

"In that event," continued Mr. Clarkson, with satire in his tone, "would you continue to print in your paper a list of subsidized editors, with your own name in the list?"

Mr. Dana's reply has not yet reached the first assistant postmaster-general.

The only defect noticeable in the narrative is the defect often found in good stories; namely, the defect that it has been ingeniously invented, but does not happen to be true. Mr. Dana never met Mr. Clarkson in Boston. The Boston editor did not respond emphatically, "Yes, I think I would," nor did the first assistant postmaster-general continue the conversation with a satirical rejoinder. All that happened in this connection was simply this,—that Mr. Clarkson wrote to Mr. Dana, and that Mr. Dana sent a reply which has reached the first assistant postmaster-general. The correspondence is as follows:—

OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25, 1890.

My Dear Sir, . . . Since you were here, I have seen a copy of your paper. I have read it with interest. I was particularly interested in the last leaf of it, where you print a list of "Subsidized Editors." I see I am in the list. I did not know before that I was subsidized. I would like to know what good cause is served by keeping a list like this before the public. I presume, if the President would tender you a position on the civil service commission, you would accept it. If you should, I would like to know if you would print your own name in this list of subsidized editors; and, if not, why not?

Very truly yours,
(Signed) J. S. CLARKSON.

BOSTON, April 29, 1890.

My Dear Sir,—I have your letter of April 25, with the enclosure of an official statement regarding changes among postmasters. . . . As to "Subsidized Editors," you may remember that in 1888 Mr. George William Curtis, in his summary of Cleveland's administration, accused Mr. Cleveland of having subsidized the press with the federal patronage; and this paper made the same accusation, and President Harrison appears to have been doing the same thing to about the same extent. We shall probably have a more complete list formed, covering both Cleveland and Harrison's administration, by next autumn. The facts on which the people found their opinion of governments are almost wholly got through the press. We all admit the suppression of facts by government control, such as we see in Europe to-day, is subversive of the rights of the people. Here and there an editor may be found fair-minded enough to give the facts, both favorable and unfavorable, to an administration under which he holds office; but his position as a government subordinate would then be an awkward one. We have again and again seen the effect of patronage on the ordinary editor. It closes his mouth, his ears, and his eyes to any criticisms of his administration or fair treatment of his opponents. The public are the losers in such cases, just as much as if the government controlled or subsidized the press. I could not edit this paper independently and fearlessly and yet hold my position, provided I got one, under the government, without acting in a way that would be unbecoming a subordinate. An editor like yourself, of a strictly party paper, may be able to perform both duties at once, but few succeed in this.

Very truly yours, R. H. DANA.
To HON. J. S. CLARKSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

For the cause of reform it makes very little difference whether Mr. Clarkson, as he tells the story, or Mr. Dana, as the correspondence shows, had the last word. It is of the greatest importance, however, that the public should be aroused to the evil of this phase of the spoils system.

In the days of ancient Greece, the orators did the work now done by the press; and Philip of Macedon, in order to bring the free Greek states under his sway, subsidized all the orators with money or office, excepting Demosthenes. Even the warnings of Demosthenes were not enough to save his country, which, though able to withstand the Macedonian phalanx, yielded to the persuasions of the subsidized orators.

Since publishing our last list of "subsidized editors," we have had some forty-six new cases brought to our attention, and, besides these, the special committee of the national league has a long list of editors appointed by Presidents Harrison and Cleveland as presidential postmasters. It is bad enough to use the offices to control the caucuses and conventions in favor of this or that man or clique, but to use the offices for the purpose of paying editors to keep the facts hidden from the people and to write up rose-colored accounts of the doings of an administration seems worse.—Civil Service Record, July, 1890.

THE CONSPICUOUS DANGER.

For one, I believe in that conscience and that vision [of the great body of the people] to-day as profoundly as I believe in the better instincts of humanity everywhere. That they may be temporarily blinded and confused, we have perhaps as painful evidence of late as any which the history of the republic has given us. But that they have not lost their power, there are abundant and cheering signs. What now, I ask you, in such an emergency, is your duty and mine? The republic at this moment is confronted by three conspicuous dangers. * * * A policy of favoritism which makes partisan service the substantial basis for political preferment, and a fine disdain for the element of personal fitness, whatever the place or task, which exacts only so much competency as can rescue the place holder from absolute disgrace; this has come to be the war cry which treats every office of trust as so much spoil, and every political contest as simply a scramble for personal emolument. That such a view of the service of the government should be held by some Tuscan bandit escaped out of his trans-Alpine fastnesses to prey upon our unsuspecting institutions, would not be occasion for surprise. But that it has come to be the deliberate conviction of men in high place among us, and that this new gospel of unscrupulous self-seeking is openly proclaimed as the only spell powerful enough to maintain a healthy and active interest in our political institutions—that, in other words, there is no instinct of patriotism strong enough to constrain a man to active participation in the political life of the nation unless there dangles before him, all the while, the possible prize which he may snatch out of the sordid and shameless strife—this certainly is a teaching which may well make all honest people flush with keen and indignant shame! For, in close touch with it, there stands plainly enough the inevitable corollary that no man who serves the state only from such motives will scruple to sacrifice public interests to private ends, whenever he can safely do so. Once grant that civic place is a private placer, out of which you and I must first snatch that which shall compensate ourselves for the discomfort and degradation involved in scrambling for it, and it is difficult to see how the sequence, which puts self or one's party first and one's country last, does not hold all the way through. And, indeed, that no higher sense of civic obligation than this is widely prevalent is indicated by the painful fact (to which one finds it difficult to allude with becoming delicacy and reserve) that great parties and great personages are able in this matter to affirm, on platforms and in official pronouncements, and with such unctuous solemnity, a virtue which, in practice, they find it no less easy with open and brazen impunity to doubt and disregard. Such a situation, gentlemen, disguise or dispute it as men may, never can be belittled or ignored as a mere partisan issue. It is an issue of morals, it is a question of common honesty, for men in civic power are simply the servants of the state, and the public service is a public trust, abuse or perversion or malfeasance in which is not a less, but a greater, crime than unfaithfulness to a private trust.—From Bishop Potter's Phi Beta Oration, at Harvard, June 26, 1890.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is now well into its second year. As has been before stated no one but the printer is paid anything for services. In the light of a multitude of assurances it is believed that the paper is liked and has its field. We are anxious to extend its circulation, and in view of the large amount of work given freely to each issue, it is not too much to ask the friends of civil service reform to do their share by getting new subscribers. Subscribers must also bear in mind that it is not well to spend money in a system of collecting subscriptions, and that if each one will send his own he will thereby further co-operate.

THE paper on civil service reform, announced last month, was read at the Battle Ground camp meeting, August 1, the subject being "The Gift of Offices." Noteworthy matters are the interest with which general audiences listen to this class of discussions and the lack of specific information which prevails among the clergymen. The latter is undoubtedly due to their very general determination to avoid politics, and it is harmful to them and to the country. When Senator Ingalls says that the ten commandments can not be applied to a political campaign, it is time for clergymen not only to know of his statement, but to declare against it.

THE annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League will be held October 1 and 2, in Boston. This is a league of the civil service reform associations of the country. Any member of any association is entitled to take part and vote in its general deliberations. The location of the meeting, and the number of eminent men in Massachusetts who are members of local associations, will make the occasion one of great interest and enjoyment. There is no pleasanter season of the year for travel, and it is to be hoped that Indiana members who have never attended will find it in their way to be in Boston at that time. The headquarters will be at the Parker House.

WHEN a party platform is the work of the little inside ring of party workers the omission of an important question like the reform of the civil service is not significant, but the omission of all reference to this in the platform of the state convention of democrats of Delaware, held August 12, seems studied, and can not be passed by, in that Mr. Bayard, a member of Mr. Cleveland's cabinet, and one supposed to be antagonistic to the spoils system, drafted the platform in great detail and read it, and later made an earnest speech in its favor.

ELSEWHERE in this number will be found a long and interesting history of the use of the navy yards as spoil and of the laws relating to such use, founded in part on the recent speech of Congressman Cummings.

The law is explicit that no man shall be discharged from the navy yards for political opinion, and that the hiring of employes shall be based upon capacity alone. Since 1876 the law has required a certificate of necessity from the secretary of the navy if men are to be hired in a navy yard sixty days preceding a presidential or congressional election. It is safe to say that since the law was passed there has been no real necessity for such a certificate. The certificates which have been made were for the purpose of filling the yards with men just preceding elections, so that their wages might act as a bribe for their votes. It is a humiliating and disgraceful spectacle to see presidents and secretaries lending themselves to this business. The undoubted facts as to Secretary Whitney's acts are given. Secretary Tracy is now engaged in the same business. There is nothing about repairing old wooden vessels up at the Kittery yard which can not wait until after the election. It is an attempt to put voters under government pay and thus bribe them to vote for the reelection of Congressman Reed, whose last majority was 1,616, regardless of the talk of the republican platform about "the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage."

SINCE March, 1889, republican congressmen of the Cheadle-Grosvenor-Houk type have met with many grievous defeats, but no other has so many elements of satisfaction as the last encounter before the congressional investigating committee. Mr. Roosevelt had challenged Grosvenor and Houk to meet him before the committee and make good their charges against the merit system, but they discreetly remained away. Last Friday, at the close of the investigation, Mr. Roosevelt told the committee that he should leave the next day for his Dakota ranch, and he bought his ticket for the trip. Promptly Saturday morning came Houk and Grosvenor and asked to be heard. The Washington dispatch of the New York Times, August 24, best describes their humiliating overthrow:

Just as they were about to begin, Roosevelt came in. He had given up his ticket as soon as he had heard that Grosvenor had asked to be heard by the committee, and there he was to talk. And he had a great time of it.

Grosvenor whined most pitifully. When he had said that the platform of the republican party in the last campaign was "Turn the democrats out and put republicans in," he was only joking. He believed in the merit system. Gradually he withdrew all the damaging things that he had said, and when Mr. Roosevelt pushed him too closely about the assertions he had made on the floor of the house, he fell back on his constitutional privilege, declined to be questioned for what he had said on the floor, and left the committee room.

Houk, who had been rather more careless than Grosvenor in making his charges, ran away while Grosvenor was undergoing his "skinning" at the hands of Roosevelt, and he has not intimated any desire to be heard at any other time. So ridiculous did the business appear to the members of the committee of both parties that they laughed at the expense of the men who had made the assertions that had been the basis of the investigation, and it seemed probable that the inquiry would only result in strengthening the reform that it was intended to injure.

At the recent examination held in this city for clerks and carriers in the post-office, a negro stood at the head of the eligible list with a standing of 96 per cent. That his own manliness has increased many per cent. by winning a place through merit, no one will deny. But the effect upon him is little beside the object lesson to all others of his race here. It quickens the tendency to go to school; it increases self-respect and ambition, and these feelings take possession of many impressionable and easy-going people, and are often the basis of a change of character. But while this winning of spurs by merit is being enacted here, in St. Louis a mass meeting of negro politicians and spoilsmen is being held to denounce Internal Revenue Collector Wenneker to Secretary Windom, because spoil for the colored men has not been forthcoming in sufficient quantities. A committee of three waited upon the unhappy Wenneker, and their report is printed in the St. Louis Republic, of August 12, from which the following is an extract:

ST. LOUIS, MO., August 11, 1890.

To the colored citizens of St. Louis, Mo., in mass meeting, greeting:

GENTLEMEN—We, your committee, having been appointed last Wednesday evening, August 6, by you to represent your interests and wait upon Mr.

Charles F. Wenneker, collector of internal revenue, and ascertain his position and intentions as a republican official towards the negro population of the city, beg leave to submit the following report:

First.—Mr. Wenneker says he is very friendly disposed toward our people and has always been, and that he has always intended to make a representative appointment from among the negroes in his office.

Second.—Mr. Wenneker says he does not wish it to be understood that, while he intends and will make an appointment of a representative negro to the $1,200 clerical position which Prof. Murray refused to accept, he has been forced to make it, or that we negroes compelled him to make the same.

Third.—He will make said appointment about September 1.

Fourth.—That there are several other minor positions outside of the city paying from $2 to $3 per day, such as store-keepers, for which he would gladly and willingly consider applications of any negro in the city who feels like applying for the same, and who would like to brave such inconveniences.

Fifth.—Mr. Wenneker asks the colored citizens to be patient and quiet with him and he will prove to them that he is their friend, and that he will give them an equal show with a white man, as he fully knows that there are quite a large number of negroes in the city capable of filling any position equal to any white man.

Sixth.—He says he waited quite a while all day Saturday for the committee, and was sorry that illness prevented his meeting the committee on Friday, and that he had been waiting all the (this day) morning to receive the committee and set himself right with the people. The committee had made a favorable impression upon him and had taken a great burden of anxiety and weight from his shoulders.

CENTER TOWNSHIP TRUSTEE'S OFFICE.

Township Trustee Gold, whose township embraces the city of Indianapolis, has removed all of the employes of the office except one, a woman, and has put in Frederick Vogt, a molder, Charles McCreery, an advertising agent, Thomas L. Duffy, a laborer, and Joseph Keisburg, whose name we can not find in the directory. Considering the importance of the work which the law permits the township trustee to do, Mr. Gold ought to have had excellent reasons for taking this step, especially when the township by it loses the services of such skilled and faithful men as Smith King and Frank Wright. Mr. King had had long experience with the office, and had built up a reputation for an independent and honest performance of his duties. We are informed that Mr. Gold had promised before election to retain Mr. Wright, and if so he ought to have some trouble with his conscience. At any rate, Wright's removal is entirely indefensible. He had been in the office about four years, and acted in the capacity of visitor, or investigator of claims for relief. Having been formerly a newspaper reporter, he was well trained for the work and acquired a reputation far beyond any one else. It must be remembered that within a few years ten thousand different persons have applied for relief at this office, a very large class of whom have a skill in deception that has become a fine art. Mr. Wright had come to know personally the great bulk of these cases. He could intuitively detect a fraud. He had a map on which was drawn the genealogical lines of generations of paupers. If an applicant for relief fitted into that map, a flood of light was thrown upon the best method of treatment. He worked for the paltry sum of fifteen dollars a week. He is said, upon good authority, to have saved the city ten thousand dollars a year. He simply can not be replaced, whatever excuses Mr. Gold may make for not keeping him. Joseph Keisburg has been put at his work. We do Mr. Gold no injustice in saying that the sole reason for making these changes was to pay somebody out of the public treasury for having done party work and probably personal work for Mr. Gold. His election was urged on the ground that he was a high minded and honorable business man. We ask him to consider the morality of his acts.

To fully understand the importance of this matter it should be known that the county commissioners have general charge of the poor of the county, while the township trustee is the overseer of the poor in his township. We have a system of relief by sending paupers to the county poor-house. We have also another system called out-door relief whereby the township trustee is given absolute discretion as to supporting people in their homes. A better plan for breeding paupers, robbing the people and corrupting politics could not be devised. It is a well recognized fact that Indiana township trustees' offices are pauper breeding institutions. If the trustee happens to be running for a nomination, he distributes relief to help him in that. Local leaders of his party have crowds who are fed at public expense. The people are helpless so long as the law remains on the statute books, except as men like Smith King and Frank Wright apply the principles of common honesty to this work. It is impossible for the people to follow the work of a township trustee. Practically it is secret and without any system of checks and balances. This makes it doubly exasperating when a new trustee steps into his office and turns out of it the only men who can possibly be of any service to the people. Mr. Gold may or may not intend to run his office as a part of his party machine in the coming election. Every citizen ought to be on the watch for this, and if this office is so run it ought to cost Mr. Gold's party dear.

THE NAVY YARDS AND SPOILS.

Congressman Amos J. Cummings has rendered the country an important service by a speech delivered in the house, August 6, upon the present increase of employes at the Kittery (Portsmouth) navy yard. Section 1546 of the revised statutes, passed March 2, 1867, says:

No officer or employe of the government shall require or request any working man in any navy yard to contribute or pay any money for political purposes, nor shall any working man be removed or discharged for political opinion.

Section 1544 of the revised statutes, passed July 23, 1872, says:

Laborers shall be employed in the several navy yards by the proper officers in charge with reference to skill and efficiency, and without regard to other considerations.

The Kittery yard lies opposite Portsmouth, N. H., and is in the first congressional district of Maine. In 1872 Maine held her state election in September, and the presidential election followed in November. In September there were 1,318 employes in the Kittery yard; in October there were 1,424 employes; in December, less than a month after the election, there were 619 employes. In the following year, says Mr. Cummings, 1873, an important state election was held in Maine. New Hampshire also had an election pending and she was not forgotten, as the following telegram referring to the Kittery yard shows:

TELEGRAM.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1873.

Commodore J. C. Howell, Commandant Navy Yard:

As the Monongahela is wanted, you may employ forty men on her in addition to the present force. Give N. H. a large share.

I. HANSCOM,

Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

[A true copy.]

H. A. MITCHELL,

First Clerk to Commandant.

In consequence, this yard had in September 1,213 employes, but in November after the election there were only 914. In the December following there were only 260.

In 1874 elections for congressmen were pending in two Massachusetts districts, and the following telegrams relating to the Charlestown navy yard were sent:

(PRIVATE.) BOSTON, MASS., Oct. 23, 1874.

My Dear Commodore—I wish you would approve requisitions for men to be employed as they may be made until the first of November. Some fifty additional men have been allowed from the Chelsea district, and I suppose some more will be required from Gooch's district. The administration desire the success of Gooch and Frost.

Yours respectfully, I. HANSCOM.

COMMODORE E. T. NICHOLS, U. S. N. Commandant.

In 1875 the Whitthorne congressional committee overhauled the navy-yard management, and Mr. Cummings gives some very pointed extracts from the testimony taken. We make quotations relating to the Kittery yard, beginning with the examination of Constructor Webb:

Q. Do you know of a meeting in the office of the commandant of the Kittery yard in which politicians of New Hampshire and Maine were present?

A. I was so informed by Commodore Pennock.

Q. Did you see a list that was furnished at that meeting?

A. I was furnished with a list by the commodore, which was addressed to him by the committee.

Q. That was a list of men to be taken on for work?

A. A list of men to be employed.

Q. Did it come to you in the first instance?

A. It did.

Q. What did you do?

A. I sent it back with word that it must be addressed to the commanding officer of the yard.

Q. Did it subsequently come to you through the commandant?

A. It did.

Q. Did you exercise any discretion at all, or just take the men on in obedience to the order?

A. I considered that I was not allowed any discretion in the matter, but simply took the men and operated them to the best advantage.

Q. While you were at Kittery, did you note the fact that while elections were pending in Maine laborers and mechanics were employed from that state in excess of those from New Hampshire, and when an election in New Hampshire was pending you took on men from that state in excess of those from Maine?

A. Such was the case.

A man named Weeks had been discharged for stealing, but Comptroller Broadhead requested that he be re-employed, which was done on the following order from George M. Robeson, secretary of the navy:

Commodore Pennock will employ this man at request of comptroller. G. M. R.

The following is from Commodore Howell's testimony:

Q. Does an election tend to diminish or to increase the number of laborers in the yard?

A. In my experience I have found it rather to increase them.

Q. Is that a fact at the Portsmouth navy yard?

A. It was, upon occasion.

Q. What occasion was that?

A. Upon my word, I don't know. It was some election there in 1873 and '74, probably. I recollect that a number of men were taken on just before the election; I have forgotten exactly how many. I also recollect that forty of them voted the democratic ticket the next day. There was a mistake apparently.

Q. Do you remember in what proportion they were taken on at that time?

A. I think one hundred men were taken on.

Q. How long before the election?

A. Three or four days.

Q. Under what kind of order were they taken on; the recommendation of any committee or any outside parties; and if so, whose?

A. I forget. There was an order of some sort, of course, or they would not have been taken on; whether it came from the chief of the bureau of construction or not, I do not know. Those orders generally did come from him.

Q. Was it to take on a specific number of men?

A. I think the order was worded somewhat in this way: "One hundred men will be required to work on" some ship or other, "and you are authorized to take them on." The men were taken on, and, as I said, forty of them voted the other way. They worked honestly and faithfully while they were there.

Q. How many days were they kept in the yard?

A. I should say about ten or twelve or fourteen days.

Commander Fairfax, of the Kittery yard, testified:

Q. What are those abuses?

A. The unnecessary number of men employed prior to elections.

Q. Is that a matter within your own personal observation?

A. Yes, sir; at the Kittery navy yard. I was there two years, and have witnessed the constant interference on the part of Mr. Hanscom in discharging and employing men. He often took on worthless men instead of good men.

Commodore Bryson, of the Kittery yard, was examined, thus:

Q. Have you any written communications from the secretary of the navy or chief of the bureau on the subject of the employment of hands, or any orders to employ certain men?

A. Yes, sir; I have.

Q. I suppose such orders are liable to come along at any time?

A. At any time.

Q. Certain men are named?

A. Certain men are named, and we take them on. As military men we obey without question.

Q. These men are laboring men in the yard—blacksmiths, shipwrights and all that sort of thing?

A. Yes, sir; in the various departments.

Q. That is, men are taken on without any requisition from your departments here, under peremptory orders from Washington?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do those orders comprehend more than one name, or frequently a number of names?

A. Frequently a number of names.

Captain Young, of the Kittery yard, was another witness:

Q. Has it been customary for the department, for political reasons, to remove skillful mechanics and others, and put in unskillful ones, that they may serve political ends by it?

A. That has been done, but I can not say that it is purely for political ends?

Q. Have you had skillful laborers removed and unskillful ones put in their places?

A. O, yes, sir.

Q. And you have to submit to it?

A. Yes, sir; we have to submit.

Q. You do not feel that you could safely say to the department at Washington: "This is detrimental to the public service?"

A. An officer would incur the risk of getting into bad odor if he did, and might be detached from the yard.

Q. I say you do not feel safe in doing it?

A. No, sir; we do not feel safe.

To cure one evil shown by this investigation, the following law was made June 30, 1876:

And no increase of the force at any navy yard shall be made at any time within sixty days next before any election to take place for president of the United States or members of congress, except when the secretary of the navy shall certify that the needs of the public service make such increase necessary at that time, which certificate shall be immediately published when made.

Mr. Cummings is mistaken in saying that there was no complaint under President Cleveland. In 1885 Secretary Whitney interfered, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, April 2, 1885.

SIR: You will please discharge Nelson Proctor, foreman laborer, and C. P. Reuttler, rodman in the department of yards and docks, and J. H. Downing and Samuel Wigg, writers in the commandant's office, at the yard under your command.

This discharge is made necessary by reason of the limited amount of money remaining of the appropriation from which they are paid.

Very respectfully,

W. C. WHITNEY,

Secretary of the Navy.

Commodore W. K. Mayo, U. S. N.,

Commandant Navy Yard, Norfolk, Va.

COMMANDANTS OFFICE UNITED STATES NAVY YARD, Norfolk, Va., April 13, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt to-day of the department's letter of the 11th instant, asking whether there are any persons in any of the departments of this yard whose services can be dispensed with, etc. Also letter of the same date inclosing for my consideration certain applications for appointment and employment at this yard.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. T. TRUXTUN,

Commodore, Commandant.

HON. W. C. WHITNEY,

Secretary of the Navy, Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

In 1886, the following certificate was published in the Times of Portsmouth:

[Certificate.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, D. C., September 15, 1886.

In pursuance of the act of June 30, 1876, I hereby certify that the needs of the public service make it necessary to increase the force in the navy yard at Portsmouth, N. H., as follows: One hundred and twenty-six men in the department of the construction and repair and twenty men in the department of steam engineering.

D. B. HARMONY,

Acting Secretary of the Navy.

We have not the number of the employes of this yard in the months succeeding this certificate, but in its number for March, 1889, the Civil Service Record of Boston, after a careful investigation, gave a statement of what it had found of the management of the Brooklyn navy yard by Secretary Whitney. Knowing the carefulness of the Record, we feel warranted in saying that its report is true. Further, these same facts, in substance, were laid before President Cleveland, under date of July 20, 1888, but received no notice except a prompt reference to Secretary Whitney, who thus tried himself. We quote from the Record:

Never within recent years have the civil employes of the navy yard, the clerks, mechanics, and laborers, been of so poor a quality, and never has so little work been performed for the enormous amount of money paid them. Although, when Mr. Whitney took office four years ago, the force in the navy yard, clerks, laborers, and mechanics, was on the whole excellent.

On October 19, 1885, Mr. Whitney issued a general order addressed to the foremen in the respective navy yards, stating that the appointment of workmen and laborers would thereafter be entrusted to them, that no political consideration should govern their selection, and that the duty of the appointing power would be to disregard every consideration except the efficiency of the men as workmen. Brave words, indeed! but, unfortunately, this manifesto was soon followed by a visit from a confidential messenger of Mr. Whitney's, who confided to the different heads of departments the secretary's message to the effect that this general order did not really mean anything, but that, when workmen were required, application should be made to one of three persons, representing respectively Tammany Hall, the County Democracy, and the Brooklyn Democracy. As rapidly as possible the former workmen were discharged, and their places filled by these democratic procurers with nominees of the ward politicians, among whom the rum-selling element was prominent and influential. The consequence was that rum-drinkers who could be relied upon to spend a large portion of the money, received from the government, in the rum shops soon filled the yard. Shipwrights, joiners, blacksmiths, and machinists, the best of their kind, who had been employed in the yard for years, were summarily turned off for no fault, and their places were filled with a lazy, inefficient, and drunken set of heelers for the various democratic bosses, the foremen themselves were terrorized, knowing that they held their places at the pleasure, not of the officers of the yard, but of the gang of ward politicians, who ruled them with a rod of iron, and whose humble servants they were, with but one or two exceptions.

For two or three weeks before the recent presidential election, the yard was thronged with men employed to do nothing but vote the democratic ticket. Bribery was shamelessly resorted to, by giving men who did not work and never intended to work from five to twenty days' pay. Men's wages were charged to ships which they never saw, the result being that the money appropriated for the repair and outfit of ships was used to carry the election instead of being legitimately expended in a proper manner.

The clerical appointments in the yard fared no better. An inquiry into the competency, industry, sobriety, and trustworthiness of the clerks in the various departments would bring to light some remarkable and disgraceful facts. The patronage of filling these places was apparently exacted of Mr. Whitney by the democratic magnates of New York and Brooklyn, and was held like any other piece of personal property by coroners, sheriffs, fire commissioners, and police justices. Representations to the navy department by the officers of the yard of the utter unfitness of these appointees, of their absence without leave, of their habitual drunkenness, met with no attention whatever. Honest and capable men, who had proved themselves trustworthy, were summarily dismissed by orders signed by the secretary of the navy, and their places filled by ignorant, drunken loafers. It is not too much to say that not one-third of the present clerical force of the navy yard would hold their places were the most elementary examination as to fitness ordered.

Bad as this state of affairs is, there is another most serious aspect of it to those who have at heart the honor and uprightness of the American naval officer. Such conditions are, of course, known and acquiesced in by the officers who superintend these worthless employes. They, however, are painfully aware that it only requires the order of the secretary, if they remonstrate, to turn them out of their rent-free houses, and by placing them on "waiting orders" to reduce their income by a sum of from $700 to $1,000. It is much to be feared that in many cases officers have been obliged to signify their willingness to please the secretary in all such appointments before they could succeed in being ordered to congenial duty there as well as elsewhere.

Coming down to the present, Secretary Tracy recently published the following certificate in the Portsmouth Daily Chronicle:

CERTIFICATE.

JULY 23, 1890.

In compliance with the act of congress approved June 30, 1876, I hereby certify that the needs of the public service make it necessary to increase at this time the force employed at the navy yard, Portsmouth, N. H., for the purpose of reconstructing buildings numbered 45 and 46, destroyed by fire in January last; of completing the gunnery ship Lancaster; of making necessary repairs and alterations of the training ship Monongahela; increasing the water supply; completing the hydrant system, and constructing a ferry-boat, the appropriation for which objects becomes available at the beginning of the current month.

B. F. TRACY,
Secretary of the Navy.

A state and congressional election occurs in Maine next month, and a congressional election is pending in New Hampshire. The senate naval committee this year recommended against an appropriation to reconstruct the burned buildings. The Lancaster is a wooden sailing ship, built in 1858, of which the secretary of the navy in 1875 reported: "Rotten at Portsmouth. Probable cost of repairs, $750,000. Not worth it." Of the Monongahela, also a wooden sailing ship, built in 1862, he also said fifteen years ago: "In service. Tolerable condition. Speed, 10½ knots."

Since the above was in type some additional facts have appeared about the Kittery yard. It seems that the $50,000 were finally allowed for the rebuilding of the burned buildings. This appropriation became available July 1, and Secretary Tracy's public certificate reached the yard July 24. Since that date fifty-six men have been taken on. Congressman Reed's political boss at Kittery is one Dr. Wentworth, and he regards this addition of fifty-six men as mere mockery, when a congressional election, September 8, has to be prepared for. Nothing short of hundreds will do. But Commodore Skerritt, the commandant, stands in the way. There are no materials to work with, and Skerritt says he will not have men standing idle about the yard, and there is a deadlock. This is all the harder to bear for Reed's henchmen, because after September 8, by baronial rules, the yard goes to New Hampshire to be filled under the direction of Bill Chandler.

A MANACLED PRESS.

Daniel Webster in 1832.

And is a press that is purchased or pensioned more free than a press that is fettered? Can the people look for truths to partial sources, whether rendered partial through fear or through favor? Why shall not a manacled press be trusted with the maintenance and defense of popular rights? Because it is supposed to be under the influence of a power which may prove greater than the love of truth. Such a press may screen abuses in government or be silent. It may fear to speak. And may it not fear to speak, too, when its conductors, if they speak in any but one way, may lose their means of livelihood? Is dependence on government for bread no temptation to screen its abuses? Will the press always speak the truth, when the truth, if spoken, may be the means of silencing it for the future? Is the truth in no danger, is the watchman under no temptation, when he can neither proclaim the approach of national evils, nor seem to decry them, without the loss of his place?

Mr. President, an open attempt to secure the aid and friendship of the public press, by bestowing the emoluments of office on its active conductors, seems to me, of everything we have witnessed, to be the most reprehensible. It degrades both the government and the press. As far as its natural effect extends, it turns the palladium of liberty into an engine of party. It brings the agency, activity, energy, and patronage of government all to bear, with united force, on the means of general intelligence, and on the adoption or rejection of political opinions.

President William Henry Harrison in 1841.

There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press.

[For more than a score of years it has happened that once in six years Ohio has elected a democratic legislature. By a singular coincidence this has always occurred when a United States senator was to be elected to succeed Senator Sherman's colleague. Of late years there has been a growing belief that this was because Senator Sherman so willed it, and that he purposely caused the republicans to lose the legislature in order that he should have a democratic colleague and thus have undivided control of the federal patronage of the state. With this rumor has grown a strong anti-Sherman feeling in many parts of the state, and it looks now as if "Uncle John" would have to do some shrewd fence fixing if he wishes to succeed himself in 1893.

As an indication of the bitterness that is felt against him in many quarters, the resolutions recently adopted by the republican county convention of Crawford county, at Bucyrus, are an amusing illustration. The feeling of indignation was wrought up to the required pitch by the fight over the Bucyrus post-office, in which Senator Sherman disregarded the wishes of most of the working republicans of the county, who had indorsed M. K. Fulton, and secured the appointment of Editor Hopley of the Bucyrus Journal. Whereupon the republicans in their county convention adopted with a thunder of yeas the following caustic resolutions:

WHEREAS, The Right Hon. John Sherman, our beloved senator, has assumed the prerogative of deciding upon the appointment of local government officials against the expressed will of the republicans who do the work and pay the expenses of each campaign without reward; and, * * *

Second—That our beloved and courteous senator be directed, if he sees fit to do so, to cast the entire vote of Crawford county or the state as a unit, which will be the first unit ballot ever secured in his native state by the distinguished statesman.

Fifth—That we favor and indorse a Federal Civil Service Reform bill that will give at all times but one republican senator from Ohio, and bequeath to said senator sole autocratic powers and the exclusive farming out of the local offices of the state to maintain sole senatorial autonomy.

Finally—That we tender our apologies to Senator Sherman for attempting to interfere or exercise influence in the selection of local officers.—Cleveland Dispatch to New York Times, July 21.]

["I find in looking over the list of appointments in Indiana that sixteen democratic newspaper proprietors and editors have been appointed to office. * * * If I could believe that in appointing these men Mr. Cleveland meant that they should pursue a perfectly inoffensive course politically, that these newspapers should not irritate the feelings of republicans, should not publish charges against republican candidates for office, should say nothing offensive to the republicans—if I believed he meant by these appointments sincerely to put these sixteen democratic newspapers under those bonds, I should have brighter hopes than I have now of carrying Indiana next time. But it will not be so. Here are these sixteen editors, two of the three collectors of internal revenue in Indiana, and the others holding influential post-offices; and Mr. Cleveland knows, and every honest democratic knows, that those sixteen newspapers will be fulminating with all the force and vigor and power and partisanship they can against the republican party."—Senator Benjamin Harrison in 1876.]

Office-Holders Defending their Possessions.

Allotments thus acquired, mutually engaged such as accepted them to defend them; and as they all sprang from the same right of conquest, no part could subsist independent of the whole; wherefore all givers as well as receivers were mutually bound to defend each other's possessions. * * * Every receiver of lands, or feudatory, was therefore bound when called upon by his benefactor, or immediate lord of his feud or fee, to do all in his power to defend him. Such benefactor or lord was likewise subordinate to and under the command of his immediate benefactor and superior; and so upwards to the prince or general himself; and the several lords were also reciprocally bound, in their respective gradations, to protect the possessions they had given. Thus the feudal connection was established, a proper military subjection was naturally introduced and an army of feudatories was always ready enlisted and mutually prepared to muster. . . —Blackstone.

—The St. Louis Republic of August 16 gives by wards the men who make up the Filley machine and who now control the republican party in that city. There is no more useful work a paper can do, because it drives home by the graphic method to every citizen the unpleasant consciousness that he is, as a rule, the agent to execute the orders of a small and despotic oligarchy, the chief of whom are an office-holding class, federal, state, county and city. The following is an illustrative list taken from the Republic:

First ward——. Second ward——. Third ward, George Weber, employed by Collector Ziegenhein. Fourth ward, Philip Sauf, father of the deputy sheriff. Fifth ward, Charles Proll, of Collector Ziegenhein's office. Sixth ward, Peter Gundloch, postmaster at Station A. Seventh ward, John Herrold, storekeeper in Collector Wenneker's office, and Theodore Horman, marriage license clerk. Eighth ward——. Ninth ward, Henry Becker, deputy in Ziegenhein's office, Collector Ziegenhein, Wm. L. Price, deputy city marshal, Gustave Wurzbarger, saloon license clerk, Leo Hartmann, storekeeper for Collector Wenneker. Tenth ward——. Eleventh ward, Coroner's Clerk Paschall, Deputy City Marshal Theo. Gast, Deputy Coroner John Weis, Fred. Gerber, chief clerk of tax department in collector's office. Twelfth ward, T. W. H. Wicschan, clerk in Collector Wenneker's office. Thirteenth ward——. Fourteenth ward, Joseph Brown, clerk in Hobbs's office. Fifteenth ward, Deputy Sheriff Frank Meis. Sixteenth ward, Collector Wenneker, August Gundlach and George Kreehman, each of whom has a high-salaried position under Wenneker, and Deputy City Collector Henry C. Meyer. Seventeenth ward, E. D. Chamberlain, of the collector's office, Deputy Sheriff H. J. Heitsmeyer, C. T. Ridgway, janitor in city hall. Eighteenth ward——. Nineteenth ward, Deputy Sheriff J. J. Kirby, V. J. Matthews, deputy city collector, W. H. Stevens, clerk in the custom house, and Charles Hotchkiss, clerk in Surveyor Metcalf's office. Twentieth ward——. Twenty-first ward, Herman Lineburger, deputy in Collector Zeigenhein's office. Twenty-second ward, Archie Carr, special agent of the Interior Department, Chas. Arnold, deputy city collector, Tom Vermillion, clerk in Hobbs's office. Twenty-third ward, Richard Schmeister, employed in post-office, and Deputy Sheriff Dick Wallincott. Twenty-fourth ward, Deputy Sheriff Billy Pohlman and Commodore Smith, of Hobbs's office. Twenty-fifth ward, John F. Doerbaum from the post office, Twenty-sixth ward, George Schubert, clerk in the collector's office, Deputy Sheriff Bill Jackson. Twenty-seventh ward, Deputy Collector Christ Gueuther. Twenty-eighth ward, Gus Vogel, a federal officeholder.

Filley gets these men places where they are supported at public expense, and he fights with all his might when the place of the least important even is threatened. In return, they work for Filley. His power and his willingness to give favors are dwelt on, his instructions as to what primaries and caucuses are expected to develop are carried out, and so long as Filley can control patronage, they neither acknowledge allegiance, nor feel obligation to any other.

—The Picayune (democratic) has the following dispatch from Dallas, Tex.: It is learned from good authority that when the State republican convention assembles at San Antonio, on September 3, the white republicans will be headed by men of southern birth and will make a fight to dethrone Wright Cuney, collector of customs at the port of Galveston, and build up a white republican party in Texas. —New Orleans Dispatch, August 16.

—The democratic committee of the eighth congressional district had a lively time at their meeting at the Hendricks Association rooms last night. Politicians claim that the meeting resulted in a clean defeat for John J. O'Neill, but the ex-congressman will admit nothing of the sort.

Mr. O'Neill, when asked after the meeting what he thought of the $3,000 assessment, could scarcely voice his indignation, "It is simply an outrage," he declared, "to make an assessment of that kind before the primaries have been held, and to insist upon a candidate putting up the money before being allowed to go before the people. It is simply a scheme to freeze me out by placing the assessment at a figure they think I can not pay. Their plea is, that they want the money to affect a precinct organization. I believe in precinct organization, but not until after the primaries have been held." —St. Louis Republic, July 31.

—Editor and Internal Revenue Collector Alexander Von Landberg to-day removed a large number of deputies in the office and filled their places with the friends of Senator Hiscock. Among the deputies removed was Wm. E. Hoyt of Fayetteville, brother-in-law of Ex-President Cleveland. Mr. Hoyt has been a most competent and faithful official.

Collector Von Landberg has also determined to appoint Charles Hiscock, brother of the senator, a deputy in place of L. D. Mowry. Hiscock's appointment is to date from Sept. 1. There is great indignation among working republicans at Hiscock's appointment and Collector Von Landberg applied to some influential republicans to help him out of the scrape by urging Senator Hiscock not to insist upon his brother's appointment. This they refused to do, and the senator was obdurate. —New York Times.

—A full meeting of the republican state committee was held last evening. Chairman, Postmaster Manley presided. Chairman Manley said that it was the unanimous vote of the committee that the campaign be very short, and that the public speaking would be confined to the last two weeks of the campaign. —Press Dispatch, August 13.

—Collector Erhardt has appointed Wm. G. Deane head of the customs cab service at a salary of $1,500 a year. He succeeds W. A. Ducey, who was appointed by Mr. Magone. Mr. Deane is the son of the republican leader of the ninth district.

—The nomination of John Pentreath to succeed Miss Lillian C. Keyes, as postmaster at Yonkers, also made to-day, is due to the influence of Speaker Husted and James Wood, the defeated candidate for congress in the fourteenth district. —June 19.

—The republican county committee of Schuyler county had a meeting and adopted resolutions protesting against the appointment of Peter Conroy as postmaster at Watkins, alleging that Conroy is a democrat. Conroy is Congressman Flood's man, and Senator Hiscock is vigorously opposing the confirmation of the nomination in the senate, which has occasioned considerable ill feeling between him and Flood.

—President Harrison has the opportunity to select a new man for internal revenue collector in the Fifth North Carolina district. The nomination of John B. Eaves for that office was rejected by the senate. Eaves was appointed a few days more than a year ago. His nomination was sent to the senate early in December. Ever since his appointment strong efforts have been made by republicans not in sympathy with the Settle-Mott faction and the old Sherman "machine" and by the democrats of the state to prevent his confirmation. It was declared that Eaves was a mere figurehead for ex-Collector J. J. Mott, and that there was a deal by which the men appointed to subordinate places had to pay so much cash to cover Eaves's expenses in securing the collectorship, while a certain percentage of all salaries was collected by the ring which obtained from President Harrison control of the federal patronage in North Carolina. Accusations were also made affecting the personal fitness for office of the collector. —New York Times.

THE OFFICE-HOLDING CLASS.

—The appointment of Henry H. Fay as postmaster at Newport, R. I., was made upon the recommendation of the two senators, with the approval of the representatives. Mr. Fay has been in the legislature and held many other public offices.

—The appointment of Herbert G. Briggs to be postmaster of Portland created no surprise in this city to-night, for it has been expected for the past three months that Mr. Briggs was to receive the appointment when it was made. Mr. Briggs is a native of Auburn in this state, and is about thirty-seven years of age. He has been very prominent as a ward politician and has held several minor offices. He has been an alderman and is to-day one of the park commissioners. He has been chairman of the republican city committee and is a strong personal friend of Speaker Reed, and it is due to the latter's influence that Mr. Briggs received the appointment. —Portland, Me., July 10.

—The nomination of Ex-Postmaster Blunt, of Haverhill, to be surveyor at the custom house was a cruel blow to the Hobart men. —Boston Post, Aug. 11.

MATTHEW S. QUAY,

United States Senator and Chairman of the National Republican Committee, Silent under the Charge of Embezzlement
by Reputable Newspapers.

The Ways and Means of the Subjugation of a State by a Modern Office Baron.

FOR once Senator Quay has been beaten at his own game of buying votes. Maj. McDowell, who was nominated by the republicans for congress in the twenty-fifth district by the votes of four purchased delegates (three quoted at $650 each, and one dirt cheap at $250) has resolved to maintain a discreet policy of silence. "I have secured the nomination, and that ends it," says the Major. "I shall pay no attention to anything that may come out. I shall not withdraw, nor shall I agree to a new convention." So he informs the Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette, Quay's organ.

William D. Wallace, of New Castle, who is supposed to have conducted the negotiations that converted four Townsend conferees into voters for McDowell, says also in an interview in the Commercial Gazette: "Mr. Quay, the leader of the republican party, has established the precedent of answering no charges. I am willing to abide by the decision of the voters, and I will patiently await the result. People with stolen goods in their pockets are not in a position to cry thief."

This delicate reference to receivers of stolen goods refers to the fact that two years ago Congressman Townsend's friends bought away from Oscar L. Jackson the one vote that nominated Townsend.

The Post this morning says editorially: "There is a great joke in this whole business. In 1888 a vote from Lawrence county was bought up to defeat Jackson of Lawrence. In 1890 four votes from Beaver county were purchased to defeat Townsend of Beaver. The necessity of the policy of silence is apparent. It has become one of the fundamental beliefs and practices of the republican party of Quaysylvania. Four disciples of the political methods of Boss Quay in his own county of Beaver have confessed they accepted bribes as the price of their vote for a congressional candidate. They were elected, pledged, and instructed to vote for Congressman Charles C. Townsend, and did so for awhile; but when negotiations were completed, and the fitting moment arrived on the 109th ballot, they flopped with the money in their pockets and voted for and nominated McDowell for congress. The primary election law of this state subjects these self-confessed receivers of bribes to fine and imprisonment. We are glad to see that the Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette has awakened to the enormity of bribery and embezzlement, and parades its virtue by insisting that Mr. Quay's district attorney in Beaver county and Mr. Quay's county committee shall bring Mr. Quay's bribed heels into court at "the earliest practicable moment."

The twenty-fifth district includes the counties of Beaver, Butler, Mercer and Lawrence. Beaver county's action in calling a meeting of the county committee to take action in the matter was followed yesterday by Butler county. A meeting of the republican county committee has been called for July 23, the object being to discuss and take action on the bribery. If anything were wanting to complete the proof of the bribery of congressional delegates at New Castle, it was obtained yesterday. Thomas Downing, the Townsend conferee, who is charged by the other three boodlers with having conducted the negotiations for the sale of their votes, made a full confession to the Philadelphia Press correspondent, and signed it in the presence of witnesses.—Special Dispatch to the New York Evening Post, July 15.

The facts have been unearthed by republican journals like the Philadelphia Press and Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette, and appear well substantiated in every detail. The affidavit of Tate is explicit, even to his own degradation. This disciple of Quayism says:

"I went into Wallace's office, Downing remarking that he wanted to see another party. While I was talking to Wallace Downing returned. Then Wallace said, 'I've got the cash right here,' and he produced four envelopes, in each of which he said there was $300. I then and there promised to vote for McDowell. Previous to that time I had made no promise to vote for McDowell. Wallace wanted to know if we would change our votes from Townsend to McDowell on the first ballot after assembling. 'Do it on the first ballot and be done with it,' were his words. I objected, and said that it ought to be done on the second or third ballot. He said, 'All right; I'll have it fixed on the third ballot.' In consideration of this promise of Mr. Wallace I voted for Mr. McDowell that night. After we got to Beaver Falls Downing handed me an envelope in which there was $645. After we came out of the convention hall Shaffer told me that he had the money."

Our inquiries were more than ordinarily useful in Pennsylvania, owing to the muzzled condition of the republican press in that state, the like of which, we think, has never been seen in a free community, unless we call the southern states during the days of slavery free communities. Our correspondent found some ministers who had never heard of the charges against Quay, owing to their confining their newspaper reading to two newspapers, one of them, we regret to say, a journal which we greatly respect—The Ledger. It is of the highest importance that the lid should be taken off such minds as these, and a little of the light of contemporaneous history be allowed to shoot in.—New York Evening Post.

To the Hon. Matthew S. Quay:

DEAR SIR—The charges of embezzlement while state treasurer of Pennsylvania brought against you by the New York World, Evening Post, Nation, Puck, and other papers of responsibility, have so far met neither reply nor denial at your hands. It is and has been very irritating to many earnest republicans to have you ignore these grave accusations, made most pointed and emphatic in last week's Puck, which undoubtedly you have seen. You are there depicted in a felon's garb, plainly called a felon, holding the whip, and compelling the respectable leaders of the "Grand Old Party" to march at the command of a felon overscr.

As you perhaps shun suit for libel against any or all of your accusers on account of the great expense therein involved, it has been suggested by some of those republicans who are indirectly smarting under these accusations, to raise a fund of sufficient amount to institute and push suits for civil and criminal libel against your open accusers.

Please let me know if this plan of vindicating your honor as chairman of the republican national committee and United States senator meets with your approval, and oblige yours, respectfully, RUDOLPH BLANKENBURG.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Aug. 5, 1890.

[Mr. Quay still maintains his policy of silence.]

The legislature of 1879, which assembled January 7, and adjourned June 6, of the same year, was a notable one in the annals of Pennsylvania. Governor Hoyt was entirely under the power of Quay, and the latter was absolute monarch of the situation at Harrisburg. The bill of indemnity for the damage by the Pittsburg rioters would place $2,000,000 at Quay's disposal to divide among his gang of followers, bribe members of the legislature and fatten his own purse.

Of course so monstrous a scheme could not be run through the legislature rough-shod. The comment on the action of Quay in creating the office of recorder of Philadelphia for his individual benefit had been widespread, and the newly elected members were not all in accord with the eminent statesman's methods. Certain of their number were at Harrisburg for other reasons than merely those of sentiment, and among them was Emil Petroff, member of the house of representatives. The bill was introduced in the house, and the workers for the bill were as active as cats in their efforts to obtain votes. One of the principal manipulators was William H. Kemble, at present the highly respectable president of the People's Bank, on Fourth street, at Philadelphia. Under Quay's able counsel, the highly respectable Kemble was detected as among the corrupters, and Emil Petroff and others were likewise found in the same boat of criminality.

The grand jury of Dauphin county, indicted the bribers. Under the new constitution the legislature and the state's business were guarded in a measure against the old looseness of past days and you could no longer openly perpetrate frauds upon the people. Openly? I say. Important distinction. The difference was simply that the frauds had to be covertly enacted. In the old days bribers would do their work while the member sat at his desk in session. The lobby carried out the task they had undertaken with a tithe of circumspection in later times.

Petroff was tried for bribery. Matt Carpenter, of Wisconsin, the great Jeremiah Black and F. B. Gowen, afterwards president of the Reading railway, were the prosecuting counsel. Gowen was after higher game than Petroff and he would have driven it to the wall had not Quay and his friends been too smart for him. By reason of Quay's grip on the state government he was in a position, as will be shown, to protect his friends. When Petroff was convicted, and the eminent lawyers of the prosecution had sharpened their wits for the run for bigger rascals, Kemble et. al. astonished every one by pleading guilty. By so doing the dangers of an examination in open court were averted. The conspirators were greatly alarmed by Petroff's trial. They knew that with Kemble before the bar of justice, the outpouring of iniquity would be tremendous. Kemble is the author of the famous epigram which indicates his morality: "Addition, Division and Silence." And well he understood how to apply his political creed, as his worldly prosperity to-day will demonstrate.

Kemble smiled jauntily after he had been sentenced to the state penitentiary by the court. Some of his unsophisticated friends were alarmed, but he reassured them. "Don't fear," he said. "I will prove another Samson and pull the temple down over their heads"—referring to Quay and other members of the gang—"unless they fix things for me."

When the excitement over the conviction of Petroff and the self-acknowledged criminality of Kemble diminished a little, Statesman Quay displayed his hand. The state board of pardons was a machine which was practically in his power, and he proceeded to use it in behalf of his followers who were at the gates of the state prison. The board of pardons consists by law of the secretary of the commonwealth, then held by Statesman Quay; the lieutenant-governor, then C. W. Stone; the attorney-general, then F. W. Palmer, and the secretary of internal affairs, then A. K. Doble. Quay caused the board to be assembled in extra session and without ado proceeded to pardon the scoundrels. It is alleged that Attorney-General Palmer and Licut.-Gov. Stone objected seriously to the scheme, but, as in another abuse of power, the superior will of Quay dominated and Petroff and Kemble were whitewashed for their misdeeds by a vote of the board, which recommended to the governor their pardon. Gov. Hoyt, as Quay's henchman, of course carried out his part and the culprits were free to again conspire against the state.

An odd bit of history leaked out about this time. Samuel Butler, of Delaware county, was the state treasurer elect. His bond, as required, was a large one. Butler was, as far as is known, an honest man. Certainly his antecedents were above criticism, and that Quay should have allowed such a person to obtain the office of treasurer was a subject of criticism on the part of some of the members of the gang. Butler secured a number of good names as bondsmen in his home county, and then the document went to Philadelphia and Harrisburg. Notwithstanding the fact that Kemble was a convicted felon, his name was placed on the bond of the treasurer of the state he had only recently conspired to indirectly rob. The bond was held in secret at Harrisburg. When any one asked for the names of the bondsmen the list was handed out with Kemble's name omitted.

A storm of indignation swept over Pennsylvania owing to the pardoning board scandal. Quay's conduct was discussed by respectable people, and he was strongly condemned. Presbyterian synods passed resolutions against the shameless pardoning board, and in a state where a healthy public sentiment prevailed Statesman Quay's career would have ended then and there. Had the people been aware of his greater rascality, which had then been perpetrated, the storm would have burst in a manner that would have been disastrous to the unprincipled boss.—New York World, February 10.

United States Senator Quay and William H. Kemble sat together this afternoon on the porch of Mr. Kemble's handsome country residence, near Glen Side, Montgomery county. The two were engaged in earnest conversation. Mr. Kemble more frequently being the listener than the talker.

The senator's visit to Mr. Kemble was not generally known in the city, and the two had nearly the entire day to themselves. Colonel Quay told the Times's correspondent he had simply taken a quiet run to the country to spend the day with Mr. Kemble. When asked if his visit was purely social, he replied yes. The senator said, with a smile, "I am resting here for the day, having a quiet time, as you see. I expect to leave this evening, and will go straight through, without stopping in Philadelphia."—New York Times, Aug. 10.

REPORTS ON THE CIVIL SERVICE

The Civil Service Record, which has been printing a series of fac-simile and wood cut illustrations of the examinations in the different departments of the civil service, contains in its August number an especially valuable one illustrative of the labor service.

Mr. Theodore L. De Land, chief clerk of the treasury department, and member of the board of examiners, has written an excellent report illustrative of the examinations in the treasury department.

The report of the civil service commission of Brooklyn for 1889 has been printed. Among the samples of examination questions the following are to determine the "intelligence" [rating 13 out of 100] of candidates for park policemen:

1. State briefly what you understand to be the duties of the place for which you apply, park policeman or doorman, as the case may be.
2. About what is the population of New York City?
3. What other large cities are there in New York State?
4. Give the boundaries of Long Island.
5. Name as many savings banks in Brooklyn as you can.
6. What are the different kinds of pavements used in the city of Brooklyn, between the curbstones?
7. What are the daily newspapers published in Brooklyn?
8. Enumerate the bridges in the city of Brooklyn, telling at what streets they are, and over what streams of water.
9. Enumerate the parks in Brooklyn, telling where they are and about how large they are.
10. Give the names of:
 - (a.) The present president of the United States.
 - (b.) The present governor of the state of New York.
 - (c.) The present mayor of Brooklyn.
 - (d.) The present commissioner of police.
 - (e.) The present president of the park commission.

The seventh annual report of the civil service commission of the state of New York has been printed. A competitive examination for instructors of pupil assistants in the state library was held last March. Seven candidates were examined on cataloguing, classification, card cataloguing, library training, library binding and library economy. The highest average was 96.85 and the lowest 87.7. At the same time an examination for court interpreter was held, and these were examined in dictation, handwriting, spelling, English to German, French, Hungarian, Spanish and Italian. The report also contains samples of the examination questions.

The sixth annual report of the civil service commissioners of Massachusetts says that "in nearly one-half the subordinate offices of Massachusetts and her cities, the people have for their public servants persons who have passed the examinations, been certified from the top of the eligible lists, and, so far as the commissioners know, have been appointed to office without regard to political or religious belief or influence." This report also contains many sample examination questions.

These reports should be in every college library in the state.

THE annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League will be held in Boston, Oct. 1 and 2. The annual address will be delivered by the president, George William Curtis, at Tremont Temple, at 8 o'clock on the evening of Oct. 1. The first general business session of the league will be held at 10 o'clock A. M. in Meionaon Hall, on Tremont street.

The business at this session will be the election of a president and the reading of the following papers: "Examination in Character essential to a Complete Competition," by Edward M. Shepard; "The Relation of Civil Service Reform to other Reforms," by Charles J. Bonaparte, and "All other Reforms should be subordinated to Civil Service Reform," by Lucius B. Swift. The second general business session will be held at the same place at 2 o'clock P. M. the same day. This session will be devoted to the hearing and consideration of reports and resolutions. At 6:30 P. M., Oct. 2, the members of the Massachusetts Civil Service Reform League will give a dinner at the Parker house to members of the National League.

SOME forty federal office holders were helping to run the republican state convention held in this city, September 10. Conspicuous among these were Postmasters Higgins, of Fort Wayne, Smith, of La Fayette, Greiner, of Terre Haute, Bennett, of Evansville, Crockett, of South Bend, Tomlinson, of Logansport; and Postmaster De Motte, of Valparaiso, read the platform to the convention. The excuse can not be made that if these office-holders had not got up the primaries and conventions, there would have been no party organization, no primaries and conventions, and no delegates to the state convention. Every meeting would have been held just the same, the same number of delegates would have come together, and the zeal would have been in no manner less. A convention managed by office-holders is not a party convention. It is the lordship of a faction, paid out of the public treasury and having means and leisure, over the rest of the party and in the service of some lord paramount. At this convention, without the interference of office-holders no attempt would have been made to make it a Harrison convention—an attempt which failed. Such an attempt ought to fail. A president has no business to allow office-holders to appear in party meetings to see that he is properly puffed. He should stand before the country on his own merits and not upon the true or false praises which a gang of office-holders may get into a platform. Possibly he might not secure a renomination, but he has no right to use office holders to secure a renomination.

THE latest attempt to get money out of government clerks appears in a circular by one W. W. Curry, a pension-claim man, who writes as agent for the Indiana state republican committee. The circular is very insulting in its insinuations, and no self respecting clerk will contribute anything in answer to such a demand. There is no need of much money to run a campaign. Every attempt to get it out of government employes ought to be denounced and fought, because these attempts are plain declarations that the employes must thus pay for their places.

CONGRESSMAN GROSVENOR, of Ohio, having failed of renomination, bids fair to follow Cheadle of this state into private life. Of Grosvenor, also, it may be said, that he retires noted for nothing except a frantic opposition to the civil service law. He set his heart upon this work, and evidently thought he was going to have an easy road to travel. His efforts have been a complete failure, and he is apparently very sore.

SECRETARY TRACY returned a rather curt answer to the house inquiry regarding the employment of men in the Kittery yard just before election, in which he says that public work shall not be interrupted nor shall he be deterred from the performance of his duty by unfounded suspicions. This is all very well, but two things are undoubtedly true. One is that the outcry unquestionably warded off the disgrace of seeing the Kittery yard filled with voters to help Congressman Reed's election, of which every one including Reed himself was in doubt. The other thing is that Secretary Tracy's expression of injured innocence would be much more appropriate if it were not a fact that he has allowed the Brooklyn navy-yard to be looted by the fighting factions of Brooklyn ward politics. According to the Boston Post, the order sending the Chicago for repairs to the Charlestown yard, in the district where Congressman Lodge's campaign is going on has been revoked. But the Norfolk yard is in full blast with a thousand men working at ante-election repairs to the advantage of Congressman Bowden, who the white republicans claim puts on too many negroes. Undoubtedly "local option" has something to do with deciding what yards it is safe to "work."

REPUBLICAN opposition to Quay has become organized in Pennsylvania and will do what it can against him in the campaign. This is the duty of every republican who recognizes the impassable gulf between Quay and common, ordinary honesty. And each man should perform this duty with all his might, without any regard to the result of the election. Those leaders who hesitate to again take up such a struggle because once they defeated Cameron and got Quay, and now feel that a defeat of Boss Quay will simply raise up Boss McGee, are falterers by the way. Defeat in detail is one of the powerful forces that will in time free this boss-ridden country, and restore its political self-respect.

PRESIDENT HARRISON has promoted Henry Sherwood to succeed Mr. Ross as postmaster at Washington, Mr. Ross having been appointed by the President to another position. Mr. Sherwood has been twenty-eight years in the military and civil service of the country. For twelve years he was in the postal service, for four years he was postmaster of the house of representatives. For eight years he has been assistant postmaster in the Washington post-office. He was retained by Mr. Ross, who was the democratic incumbent under Mr. Cleveland. This is as it should be, a competent and conscientious public servant is promoted according to his merit.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE in its recent issues has been printing a list of persons connected with newspapers who have received federal positions—mostly postmasterships. The list is a very incomplete one; some states are omitted altogether. No state has been investigated thoroughly, and those who have received or whose family has received federal positions other than postmasterships were not investigated at all. But the list as it is ought to surprise and alarm people. There could be no better work for some important and powerful newspaper than to print a revised and complete list, for it would show as by no other method that this country has, as a rule, government by the people only in name and government by bosses in fact. Were these newspaper office holders as they run for their congressman or other boss, in uniform, distinguished by a Quay button or an Ingalls rosette, then their number and activity and power would be realized. As it is, the village paper and the village postoffice, although conspicuous parts of the local machine and a steady irritant to a part of the inhabitants, seem isolated cases and the editor himself too harmless a fellow to provoke rebellion. But print lists covering the entire country, then the consequences of being able to control a great number of country papers, of bringing forward or holding back facts, of exaggerating or belittling political news, become apparent. No wonder that Mr. Clarkson in an outbreak of irritation wrote Mr. Dana, "I would like to know what good cause is served by keeping a list like this before the public."

These papers are manacled, and of the harm and danger nothing can be added to Daniel Webster's eloquent statement. But even he did not foresee the usual condition of the newspaper office-holder of to-day. Daniel Webster characterized the effect of the gift of office in silencing the paper; he did not conceive the possibility of the scandal caused by continued political activity on the part of the office-holder and of making his paper his chief weapon for controlling caucuses and county and district conventions. It is so grave a scandal, and will in time arouse such widespread indignation that no wonder Mr. Clarkson deprecates publicity.

It is not only republican editors who have been subsidized. It is instructive to note the great number of democratic editors who have been allowed to hold on to their offices. On every ground of offensive partisanship, if any office-holders were to go, these should have been the first. But shrewd Mr. Clarkson spiked his enemies' guns far more effectually by his process. Another significant thing was the gift of office to such great numbers of so called "independent" papers. Again Mr. Clarkson had mastered well the meaning of that happy statement of President William Henry Harrison, that with "golden fetters" on, how much less troublesome an "independent" paper would be.

OFFICE-HOLDING STRABISMUS.

Elsewhere is printed an extract from the speech of District Attorney Chambers, delivered before a republican club of this city, and which the Indianapolis Journal says will prove an "effective campaign document." Few things have happened to disgrace the administration so much. No matter whether a government is run on the spoils system or on any other system, the gross impropriety of a speech by any public officer in such a spirit and tone must be apparent to any one. Let us take a single instance. Mr. Chambers says that democratic committees have at times issued "corrupt circulars inviting and urging bribery." He quotes from a Morgan county circular, "Those who have to be bought are not doubtful but are floats." Again, from a Decatur county circular: "Get the float well in hand." There can be no possible question but that Mr. Chambers means by the word "float" or "float-er" a man who is paid for his vote. Turning to the Dudley letter, it is written, "Your committee will certainly receive from Chairman Huston the assistance necessary to hold our floaters. * * Divide the floaters in blocks of five and put a trusted man with necessary funds in charge of these five." Of the two versions of that letter, which differed in no essential respect, Chambers said, in the Indianapolis Journal of December 13, 1889, that they "have nothing in them of a criminal character, but, upon the other hand, * * are honorable, and indicate simply a patriotic interest in the elections." We should like to have Mr. Chambers, in writing, over his own signature, explain himself. Will he make it clear that money paid to a "float" by democrats is bribery, and money paid to "floaters in blocks of five" by republicans is not bribery, but indicates "simply a patriotic interest in the elections." He can not do this, for he knows that the Dudley letter means bribery. He appears to be verifying Dr. Johnson's definition that patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel, and he affords to the people of Indiana the spectacle of a public prosecuting officer, paid out of the common treasury, excusing bribery in his own party while joining in a campaign cry, for bribery, against the opposite party. Such an officer does not deserve the respect of the public or of his neighbors. The Columbia Club, which prides itself upon its "clean politics," ought to petition the President to remove Chambers from office.

CLARKSONISM.

Clarkson has gone out of office at last, and there is uncertainty as to what he will do next. He says he has nothing to apologize for, though no one expects or is calling for an apology. It is the President who ought to make an apology, if he can. He has allowed Clarkson to give the country an example of the spoils system such as has never been known before. Through Clarkson's agency thirty odd thousand post-offices have been absorbed as spoil in eighteen months. President Harrison can never show that this is not a defiant disregard of the platform upon which he was elected, and which said: "The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments." When the President places the partisan seizure of these thirty-odd thousand post-offices by the side of this platform promise, he will have to keep silent.

The Maryland republican clubs sent a delegation to Clarkson to thank him for his opposition to the civil service law. The Indianapolis News of September 13, treats the matter fully. It says:

It is worth while noting this spectacle: A representative body of citizens thanks a man for his opposition to the law of the country while he was an official of that country sworn to execute its laws. There is a spectacle demoralizing enough, surely. Mr. Clarkson's notion of a reformed civil service as explained was that he would make the examinations departmental, conducted by those under whom the clerks would have to work, and would always select all clerks in sympathy with the party in power. He added that he believed this to be a representative government based on party responsibility, and that no party in power could escape this responsibility if it tried; therefore, he believed that any administration, state, national or county, was entitled to have all places under it filled by its friends, or those anxious for its success and not its failure.

It is not worth while controverting the fallacy that the routine work of the public affairs; the keeping of books and writing of letters; the scrubbing of floors and cleaning of spittoons, can have no possible influence upon a policy or principle of governmental administration. The theory that a clerk or scrub woman is going to obstruct the public service in order to discredit the political party charged with administration, springs from the spoils idea that the public service is the prize of victory to be fought for by the people, divided into two armies, each absolved from any consideration of the other, the victor warranted in taking this service as his earned reward, as the victorious prize fighter takes the purse that has been "hung up" to spend in treating his backers and heelers. It is needless to say that the public service in every attribute of its exercise and all the justification of its being is as much the possession of the defeated party as it is of the victorious party. That in every contemplation which does not degrade public administration to the level of brigandage, the "victor" is entitled only to its direction along certain lines of policy, and that this applies only to administration—not to substance. That the service is not a visible mass of loot, to be portioned out among retainers by a feudal lord entering upon a conquered domain, but that it is the possession of the whole people, created and maintained by them for their benefit, and that control of it means control, not ownership.

MINISTERS AND POLITICS.

There is everywhere a part of the clergy who maintain that their work in the church is to inculcate the broad principles of the brotherhood of man and the saving, elevating power of Christianity, but it is not to apply those principles to matters of conduct. There is now and then a preacher of such largeness of mind and eloquence of tongue that he can move the hearts of men and women to seek for noble living by these general truths and by no special application to matters of conduct. But men in the pulpit with these gifts are rare, and were they more common, would we be willing to spare the men who have shown the relation of religion to conduct? Could we spare the ministers whose denunciations of slavery still make the heart beat faster?

But suppose a church has for years heard from the pulpit the sermons declaring "the fatherhood of God and the truths only related to that," and yet its members are callous to the immorality of buying a public office by the gift of money or place, or who excuse it on the ground that a politician must be expected to have a different code of morals. What is to be said of the results of such preaching? Surely it has been a disheartening failure. Clergymen can not allow themselves to be blind to this. If they find, for instance, that a large number of their intelligent church members are lethargic over the purchase of votes by money or office, their duty is plain to change their method of the presentment of the principles of Christianity and to apply them to matters of political conduct. It need not be stated that they should not be partisan, that their horizon should be large, and that they should be just and temperate in expression.

The work now being undertaken by clergymen in New York illustrates this view. In spite of their teachings there has grown strong a most corrupt political organization; it robs the people, it cheats justice, and its corrupting influence is all-pervading. Those clergymen now see a chance to bring their influence as clergymen to bear on a great plague spot, and it is encouraging to note how heartily their attempt is co-operated with by the young men of their churches.

WORKINGMEN AND DISMISSALS.

Of late years one of the characteristics of attempted settlement of strikes has been that the workingmen stipulate that there shall be no dismissal without cause. In some cases they have proposed that each man shall first be granted a hearing before a board composed, in part, of his fellow-workmen. The recent railroad strike in New York was based upon the assertion that certain workmen had been dismissed without any apparent business reason. Yet labor organizations stand by without protest and see successive presidents dismiss more than a hundred thousand wage-earners without any reason whatever except to find places for favorites. For instance, President Cleveland in this manner turned the hundreds of employes out of the Brooklyn navy yard and put in his favorites, and now President Harrison has turned these out and put in his favorites. Under such a system of course a large share of government work falls to sycophants, heelers, and hangers-on. Honest and industrious labor gets little benefit from this colossal employer of labor. It is the inexplicable enigma of the present movement of workingmen to better themselves that, year after year, they let this richest of labor prizes go without even an attempt to secure it. This undoubtedly proceeds from a mistaken idea that government labor has something peculiar about it. It has not; public bookkeeping and carpentering are just the same as private bookkeeping and carpentering, and to hire either done upon the principle of favoritism is a detriment to honest labor. Government labor should be brought into the general labor field. To secure this only a few simple rules are necessary. Let the workingmen's principle of no dismissal without cause be enforced in the government service. To avoid favoritism in appointment, the places requiring skilled labor should be filled by open competition. Unskilled laborers, in selecting whom there now exist the greatest scandals, should be chosen on the plan of the Boston labor system—which has met with unanimous approval. If these rules were observed both in the states and with the federal government, fully 200,000 places which are now practically of no benefit to workingmen would be brought where they and their children could secure permanent employment at good wages, not exactly in the same way but upon the same principles by which they now secure employment of private employers. Why do they sit still and see this field go to waste year after year?

A MANACLED PRESS.

Daniel Webster in 1832.

And is a press that is purchased or pensioned more free than a press that is fettered? Can the people look for truths to partial sources, whether rendered partial through fear or through favor? Why shall not a manacled press be trusted with the maintenance and defense of popular rights? Because it is supposed to be under the influence of a power which may prove greater than the love of truth. Such a press may screen abuses in government or be silent. It may fear to speak. And may it not fear to speak, too, when its conductors, if they speak in any but one way, may lose their means of livelihood? Is dependence on government for bread no temptation to screen its abuses? Will the press always speak the truth, when the truth, if spoken, may be the means of silencing it for the future? Is the truth in no danger, is the watchman under no temptation, when he can neither proclaim the approach of national evils, nor seem to deery them, without the loss of his place?

Mr. President, an open attempt to secure the aid and friendship of the public press, by bestowing the emoluments of office on its active conductors, seems to me, of everything we have witnessed, to be the most reprehensible. It degrades both the government and the press. As far as its natural effect extends, it turns the palfidum of liberty into an engine of party. It brings the agency, activity, energy, and patronage of government all to bear, with united force, on the means of general intelligence, and on the adoption or rejection of political opinions.

President William Henry Harrison in 1841.

There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the executive which might be used with greater effect, for unhallowed purposes, than the control of the public press.

[“I find, in looking over the list of appointments in Indiana, that sixteen democratic newspaper proprietors and editors have been appointed to office. * * * If I could believe that in appointing these men Mr. Cleveland meant that they should pursue a perfectly inoffensive course politically, that these newspapers should not irritate the feelings of republicans, should not publish charges against republican candidates for office, should say nothing offensive to the republicans—if I believed he meant by these appointments sincerely to put these sixteen democratic newspapers under those bonds, I should have brighter hopes than I have now of carrying Indiana next time. But it will not be so. Here are these sixteen editors, two of the three collectors of internal revenue in Indiana, and the others holding influential post-offices; and Mr. Cleveland knows, and every honest democrat knows, that those sixteen newspapers will be fulminating with all the force and vigor and power and partisanship they can against the republican party."—Senator Benjamin Harrison in 1886.

PRINCIPLES OF THE PARTIES.

We reaffirm the declaration of the national republican convention with reference to civil service reform, and we commend the efforts of the national administration to secure the best result of the wise provision of the existing law on this subject.—Illinois Republican Platform, June, 1890.

6. The silence of M. S. Quay under the charges which have been made against him through the public press can only be interpreted as a confession of his guilt, and his retention of a seat in the U. S. senate, while refusing to demand a legal investigation of these charges, is a national scandal. We accept the issue of Quayism as now tendered by the republican state committee and convention.

7. We arraign the republican party * * * for its open disregard of the provisions of the civil service law, which the President of its choice was solemnly pledged to support.—Pennsylvania Democratic Platform, July, 1890.

For the chairman of our national committee, Mr. Quay, we feel a lasting sense of gratitude for his matchless bearing in the last presidential campaign, and commend his bearing under the slanders which his successful leadership of our party has purchased for him. As a citizen, a member of the general assembly, as secretary of the commonwealth under two successive administrations, as state treasurer by the overwhelming suffrages of his fellow-citizens, and as senator of the United States, he has won and retains our respect and confidence.—As Originally Presented in Pennsylvania State Convention, June, 1890.

For the chairman of our national committee, M. S. Quay, we feel a lasting sense of gratitude for his matchless services in the last presidential campaign. As a citizen, a member of the general assembly, as secretary of the commonwealth under two successive administrations, as state treasurer by the overwhelming suffrage of his fellow-citizens, and as senator of the United States he has won and retains our respect and confidence.—As Passed by the Convention, June, 1890.

We denounce the administration of Benjamin Harrison for its deliberate abandonment of civil service reform; for its use of cabinet positions and other high stations in payment of financial campaign debts; for treating public patronage as a family appendage, instead of a public trust, and quarantining a host of relatives, by blood and by marriage, upon the national treasury; for dismissing honest and competent public servants, in violation of solemn pledges, because of their political opinions, and filling their places with men devoid of character or capacity, and whose only title to preferment rested upon disreputable partisan work.—Indiana State Democratic Platform, August, 1890.

—Among the resolutions adopted at a meeting of representative republicans of Wayne county held at Lyons a few days ago, and carefully excluded from the columns of the republican newspapers of the county and elsewhere, are the following:

"Resolved, That we condemn and denounce any attempt to build up or strengthen a personal following by assuming to parcel out in advance public offices, which are the gift of the people, and should be conferred, held, and administered solely in the interest of the people at large.

"Resolved, That we insist upon the largest individual freedom of thought, speech and action without dictation or interference; upon the free, fair, untrammelled, and unbought expressions of caucuses.

"Resolved, That we insist that no man, or set of men, shall be permitted to make the republican party subservient to their own personal aggrandizement, or to dictate nominations, or to ostracise republicans who refuse to surrender their manhood and bow in submission to their will.—Evening Post, August 2.

The great increase in state expenses and the creation of an army of needless officers, paid out of the state treasury to perform republican party service, show that the same disposition to impose on the people and squander their money for party gain still prevails in Madison as in Washington.—Wisconsin State Democratic Platform, August, 1890.

The present administration came into power as a result of a deliberate agreement that it would reward the vast army of political jobbers and speculators which for four years had been held at bay by opening to them the federal treasury for miscellaneous pillage. Its sanctimonious professions in favor of civil service reform have been followed by the most flagrant exhibitions of official spoliation ever witnessed.—New Hampshire State Democratic Platform, September, 1890.

We indorse the administration of Benjamin Harrison and the able statesmen selected as his co-laborers and advisers, as being wise, vigorous and patriotic. It has kept the pledges made to the people. * *

We demand that our benevolent institutions be placed above the level of partisan politics, and that they be controlled by boards composed of members of different political parties, appointed by the governor, to the end that the cost of their maintenance may be reduced, and the helpless and unfortunate wards of the state may not be made the victims of unfit appointments dictated by the caucus and made as a reward for party services.—Indiana State Republican Platform, September, 1890.

EXTRACTS FROM THE ADDRESS OF THE LINCOLN INDEPENDENT REPUBLICAN COMMITTEE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The platform of the republican party in Pennsylvania indorses without qualification or reserve, the junior senator of this state, Matthew S. Quay, a man whose very name has entered the political vocabulary as a term of political domination and corruption; a man whose way to political eminence has been won by no distinguished service to the nation or the state, either by the conception or the execution of a single great or beneficent public measure, but solely by chicanery and political corruption, by the creation of an immense army of servile followers through bribes of public office and by the skillful distribution of public patronage. This man has so successfully increased his own power that he is to-day among the most influential, if he is not indeed the most influential, of republicans, and in his own state his personal will has virtually usurped the will of the people. He is at least popularly understood to have controlled the last republican state convention and to have imposed upon it a candidate of his own selection. But to crown his own dishonor and the shame of the commonwealth, he stands for months silent under public, repeated and specific accusations of the greatest official misconduct, of having taken from the treasury of the state large sums of money with the knowledge of its official guardian. In this man the republican party platform expresses entire confidence, and it calls upon the citizens of Pennsylvania to indorse both him and it by the election of Mr. Delamater as governor of the state.

* * * * *

Are the men who saw the republican party begotten, through the eloquence, the statesmanship, the lofty public morality of Sumner, the political genius, the all-embracing humanity and self-sacrifice of Lincoln, through the great and popular hatred of wrong and oppression, through the great and first awakening of a national heart and a national conscience, dead, that they should accept such a lame and impotent, such a disgraceful conclusion to a great party history as this? Indeed, all keen sense of public honor and of justice must have fled the state if its citizens will tolerate this disgrace. It was unswerving devotion to principle as opposed to greed, to selfish expediency, to every low inducement, that made the republican party and its founders great. If we honor them and approve their political policy we can not be false to their example.

CONGRESSMAN KENNEDY ON MATTHEW S. QUAY, IN THE HOUSE, SEPTEMBER 4, 1890.

Some time since I stood up in my place on this floor and denounced a senator from my native state because, when charged with corruption and branded with infamy, he did not arise in his seat and demand an investigation and inquiry that should establish the purity of his actions and his personal honor. One other, occupying the high place in the councils of the party to which I belong, has suffered himself, month in and month out, to be charged with crimes and misdemeanors for which, if guilty, he should have been condemned under the laws of his state and have had meted out to him the fullest measure of its punishment.

This man is a republican. Shall I now remain silent? Is it just and honest to remain in my seat silent because one who is accused of crimes and refuses to seek for vindication is a republican and that republican the recognized leader of my party? Neither decency nor honor would permit me to do so. I do not know whether the charges made against the chairman of the national republican committee are true or false, but I do know that they have been made by journals of character and standing again and again, and I do know that in the face of these charges Mat Quay has remained silent, and has neither sought nor attempted to seek opportunity to vindicate himself of them. I do know that, as a great republican leader, he owed it to the great party at whose head he was either to brand them as infamies or to prove their falsity, or he owed it to that party to stand aside from its leadership.

He has done neither, and for this I denounce him. The republican party can not afford to follow the lead of a branded criminal. He has failed to justify himself, and though opportunity and ample time have been given him, he remains silent. His silence under such circumstances is the confession of guilt. An honorable man does not long dally when his honor is assailed. He has delayed too long to justify the belief in his innocence, and he stands, a convicted criminal before the bar of public opinion. Under such circumstances he should be driven from the head of a party whose very life his presence imperils. The republican party has done enough for its pretended leader. Let him be relegated to the rear. It is no longer a question of his vindication; it is now a question of the life of the party itself.

THE ARISTOCRATIC SYSTEM.

English statisticians have displayed much individual interest in the complicated mechanism and extensive scope of our census-taking, but they have not been inspired thereby to alter their own census scheme, which is simplicity itself. The enumeration will be begun and finished on a single day—Sunday, April 5. In striking contrast with the American method, nothing is here attempted beyond the bare counting, with a few elementary facts as to age and sex, and whether married or single. To do this work there will be 40 000 enumerators in England and Wales. All of these will be appointed by the local registrars of births and deaths, and nothing could be stranger to American notions than that so much as a hint of political influence being used or desired will never be heard of. The higher clerks who are to tabulate the returns will be chosen by public competition, the terms of which will shortly be issued by the civil service commission. No suggestion of partisanship will enter the whole arrangement from top to bottom. Perhaps that is the reason for Mr. Giffen's confidence that the census will be absolutely complete and trustworthy.—London Letter to New York Times, Sept. 7.

THE DEMOCRATIC SYSTEM.

A sample of Porter's methods is afforded by the system adopted to take the census of this city. Here is the metropolis of the nation, a vast aggregation of people from all parts of the world, speaking all sorts of languages, living in all kinds of crowded buildings. The task of taking the census in New York was beset by the utmost difficulties, and required the services of the very highest type of enumerators that could be secured. What type did we have? The method adopted by Mr. Porter's representative in this city was to send out to the "Jakes" and "Barneys" and "Mikes" who "run the machine" in the various districts this circular:

DEAR SIR—You will please forward to this office the list of applicants that the republican organization of your district desires to have named as census-enumerators. This list must be sent here on or before April 1. Yours, C. H. MURRAY.

Comment upon such a performance would be a waste of space. Is it any wonder that the count of New York returned by enumerators thus selected by the republican machine falls fully 100,000 short of the number to which the city is entitled by every test that has applied to all previous censuses?—New York Evening Post, Sept. 12.

BARONS AT WAR.

"I know of no such division," said he, "in the state, and I am surprised that any one should misunderstand the very plain statement and purport of my protest. It was simply and clearly a denunciation of a systematic attempt of one of the Maine senators to control the politics of the state by the use of patronage, by seeking to dictate the most important federal appointments in the city of his residence, and the fact that the same thing had been attempted in my own district induced me to call a halt in the work of setting up a political dictatorship in Maine. I have known of no instance in which any of the representatives from Maine has sought to interfere with the rights or privileges of the senators, but I regard the invasion of Portland and Bangor, to control the selection of public offices, as indefensible and mischievous. * * *

"It is a significant fact," said Mr. Boutelle, "that when Mr. Reed was believed to have a desperate fight on his hands for re-election, the most important offices in his district, and, in some respects, the most important federal office in Maine, the collectorship of Portland, was occupied by one of the leading democrats of the state, whose term expired months ago, because the senators would not consent to the appointment of a man regarded by Mr. Reed as friendly to himself. It is certainly difficult to reconcile this with any theory that the senators were zealously desirous of strengthening the speaker in the greatest contest of his political life."

"You complain of similar treatment in your own district?"

"I have been perfectly frank about that. On the same ground upon which I dispute the right of the senators to thrust upon Mr. Reed a hostile collector, I regard the appointment of a supervisor of the census in my city without consulting me as a gross political indignity. The supervisor had the selection of enumerators in every town in my district, and, while there was no reason why he should be hostile to me, yet the fact of the selection of so important an official in my own town without regard to my wishes was significant. In fact, when the appointment was announced in the morning paper, and it was naturally supposed to have been made by the congressman from the district, the democratic evening paper, in commenting upon it, said its reporters had talked with a large number of prominent republicans, all of whom were surprised at Mr. Boutelle's selection."

"What was Mr. Hale's motive?"

"The obvious motive seems to be to hamper and embarrass me in my congressional district, and, so far as he may have been successful, I think I may justly construe the gratifying support of my constituents as a rebuke to that sort of interference. In other words, my complaint has been and is that the powers granted by the people of Maine for public purposes have been unfairly diverted to the advantage of individuals, in derogation of the rights of others. I believe that in Maine, as elsewhere, public men should stand upon their merits and be judged by the service they may render to the public."—New York Times, Sept. 15, Interview with Representative Boutelle.

THE UNAMERICAN SYSTEM.

Examples from a Recent Examination under the Merit System in Baltimore.

1ST EXERCISE.—WRITING FROM DICTATION.

N. B.—Spelling, use of capitals, punctuation, and all omissions and mistakes will be taken into consideration in marking the exercises of this subject. Penmanship will not be marked on this exercise.

One of the examiners will dictate an exercise of not less than ten lines so distinctly that all persons being examined can hear him. The passage will first be read for information, and then be dictated in phrases of five or six words, at the rate of from fifteen to twenty-five words per minute. If from any cause the competitor miss a word, he should not pause, but leave a blank space and go on with the next words he hears. Three minutes will be allowed after the dictation for punctuation and correction.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS.

Plainfield republicans are signing a petition to be forwarded to Washington asking that the postmaster, E. R. Pope, be "influenced" to discharge the clerks and carriers left in office by the democratic administration, and to substitute in their places "deserving" republicans. Postmaster Pope has held his present office only a few months. Already he has had 124 applicants for positions under him. He has made no changes, but the resignation of one man has enabled him to make his son first assistant postmaster. Because of this alleged family favoritism there has been considerable fault-finding. Some of the applicants for positions are men who were removed four years ago to make room for democrats. Mr. Pope says that he will not imitate the mistakes of predecessors, but will adhere to civil service rules altogether. The existing staff of clerks and carriers is deemed very efficient. The women of Plainfield, who have the most frequent dealings with them, are especially ardent in praising their work. The housewives are just beginning to learn of the petition their husbands are signing, and threaten to prepare an opposition document. The men have already secured 600 signatures.—New York Evening Post, Aug. 12.

—The nomination of John Kirkpatrick for postmaster at South Hadley Falls, sent to the senate to-day, was recommended by Congressman Wallace. Mr. Kirkpatrick is a democrat and a veteran of the war, but there were no other candidates and his reappointment was recommended by both republicans and democrats of the town. He was appointed during the last administration when the office was fourth-class. It has just been raised to the presidential grade, and a nomination by the President was necessary.—Boston Post, May 9.

Office-Holders Defending their Possessions.

Allotments thus acquired, mutually engaged such as accepted them to defend them; and as they all sprang from the same right of conquest, no part could subsist independent of the whole: wherefore all givers as well as receivers were mutually bound to defend each other's possessions. * * * Every receiver of lands, or feudatory, was therefore bound when called upon by his benefactor, or immediate lord of his feud or fee, to do all in his power to defend him. Such benefactor or lord was likewise subordinate to and under the command of his immediate benefactor and superior; and so upwards to the prince or general himself; and the several lords were also reciprocally bound, in their respective gradations, to protect the possessions they had given. Thus the feudal connection was established, a proper military subjection was naturally introduced and an army of feudatories was always ready enlisted and mutually prepared to muster. . . —Blackstone.

FORT WAYNE, IND., Sept. 6, 1890.

—DEAR SIR: Those favoring the candidacy of our fellow-citizen, Mr. George W. Pixley, for treasurer of state, have gratifying assurances that his nomination can be secured by a prompt and tangible evidence that such is our desire. You are hereby invited and requested to go to the state convention, at Indianapolis, to forward his candidacy. The fare for the round trip will not exceed $3.60. Please signify at once to C. R. Higgins whether you accept this invitation. As many as can should go Monday afternoon.

[Mr. C. R. Higgins is the republican postmaster at Fort Wayne.]

—Postmaster C. R. Higgins, of Fort Wayne, was among the civil service reformers who were hustling at the Denison last evening.—Indianapolis Sentinel, Sept. 10.

—The postmasters from Fort Wayne, Terre Haute, Evansville, Lafayette, South Bend and Logansport were conspicuous men in the convention hall yesterday. There were not less than forty of these federal officers present, and five of them presented an unusual scene—drinking together at the Denison bar.—From the Report of the Indiana State Republican Convention in the Indianapolis Sentinel, September 11.

—The republicans of Warlick county met in mass convention in Boonville, Saturday, Sept. 6, and nominated the following county ticket.

* J. B. Cockrum, assistant district-attorney of Indianapolis, came down and took an active part in the convention. He told the boys here how things were worked at Indianapolis, and how this convention must act. They made John chairman of the committee on resolutions, and let him write them to suit himself, and to flatter the bosses at Washington and Indianapolis.—Boonville Dispatch to Indianapolis Sentinel, Sept. 8.

—District Attorney Chambers's speech at the Columbia Club, to-night, will be devoted to democratic iniquities and election methods. He will have for his text that portion of the democratic platform that alleges all political evils against the opponents of that party and claims for it all political purity. Mr. Chambers will detail many instances of democratic bribery, not those of mere assertion, but those that have been established by evidence. He has given great care to this speech, and it will be made up of facts obtained from nearly every county in the state.—Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 5, 1890.

The speech of Hon. Smiley N. Chambers, delivered last night before the Columbia Club, will be found elsewhere in this paper. It abounds in indisputable facts concerning democratic rascality, and gives in detail some of the political infamies committed by that party in Indiana. These crimes have been frequent and flagrant, and the party committing them should be deprived of power by an outraged people. The speech is strong in statement, and will prove an effective campaign document.—Indianapolis Journal, Sept. 6, 1890.

All these years there has been a democratic majority in the legislative department. It is a disgrace to the state, a reflection upon the ability of the people to manage their own affairs, and should and doubtless will be repudiated by the people at the polls. You may investigate the affairs of the cities of the state where democracy prevails and there will be found incompetency, defalcation, and disregard of public rights, as in affairs of the state. * * * From that time [1876] to the present the corrupt use of money has been more or less indulged by the democratic party in every location in Indiana, until everywhere and on all hands it has become a well-recognized fact that the use of money has been limited only by the amount that could be procured. This has brought its legitimate results to the people of the state of Indiana, so that corruption has not been confined to national politics, but has spread into state, county and township elections, ramifying and pervading every corner of the state. Taught in the use of money, democratic leaders in Indiana have resorted to every device known to ingenuity to deceive the voter, to tyrannize him, to corrupt him, to thwart the will of the people, legitimately expressed, at the ballot-box.

Another feature is the corruption of the democratic press. On all hands we find the same spirit which we have heretofore characterized prevailing so that there is no respect for law, nor for the administration of law, where the same comes in conflict with democratic success. * *

As a result, the most ignoble methods were resorted to by democratic leaders [in 1888]; ingenuity, skill and device were all used in originating methods for disturbing and confusing republicans, and breaking up their solid ranks, and for encouraging democracy, and drawing into its ranks all the ragged edges of society. The amount of money brought into the state from New York and the border states of the South, has never been told, but undoubtedly it far exceeded anything that had ever occurred before. Democracy was in charge of the state and federal offices within the state, and the rank and file were led to believe that they would be protected in everything that was done for the success of the party, no difference what its character, nor who was the author of it. Supported by the state central committee, the central committees of the various counties issued corrupt circulars, inviting and urging bribery, intimidation, and every other means for the accomplishment of the defeat of the republican ticket. As a sample of that which was issued in many counties, I give you one issued by the chairman of the democratic county committee of Morgan. * * * * Make the doubtful list as small as possible and mark every one who has to have money as a 'float.' Those who have to be bought are not doubtful, but are 'floats.' Let no one escape. Your prompt attention in this matter will aid materially in the efficiency of our efforts.

"Respectfully,

"N. A. WHITTAKER, Chairman."

The date of this letter is September 7, near two months before the election, and discloses a conspiracy, formed early in the campaign, to carry the election by fraud and corruption. I have before me a copy of a letter sent out by the chairman and secretary of the Decatur county central committee. It was sent from the office of the democratic central committee. In it is found the following advice:

"For the plan of organization we suggest the following: Select with care such men as are safe counselors, and can be trusted. Meet frequently at each other's homes, and canvass all matters pertinent to the coming election. Canvass all doubtful voters. Get the float well in hand. Let it be well understood before the election day arrives what each man is to do. Select men to look after all doubtful and floating voters."

Imagine the good citizens of Decatur getting together in their homes surrounded by their wives and boys, devising ways and means to buy votes, to debauch the ballot-box and destroy the morals of the people. Yet, such is the advice of the democratic management of Decatur county. A similar letter was sent out by the chairman of the Shelby county democratic committee, and largely acted upon by the democrats of that county. As a result of these circulars, it is not surprising that local leaders in the different localities should have been led into excesses, into corruption and intimidation unparalleled in the state of Indiana, and which, it is hoped, will never be repeated.—Extracts from the Speech of District Attorney Smiley N. Chambers, before the Columbia Club, September 5, 1890.

[This is from a United States district attorney appointed by President Harrison to prosecute for all the people of Indiana offenses against the law whether committed by republicans or democrats. This same prosecuting officer said, in December, 1889, regarding his suppression of the warrant for Dudley's arrest: "I exercised the prerogative in this case that I would exercise in any other of like character, and decided that the warrant be not issued upon this affidavit."

And after reading in Dudley's circular: "Your committee will certainly receive from Chairman Huston the assistance necessary to hold our floaters. * Find out who has democratic boodle and steer the democratic workers to them, and make them pay big prices for their own men. Divide the floaters in blocks of five and put a trusted man with necessary funds in charge of these five, and make him responsible that none get away and that all vote our ticket," this same United States district attorney said in an interview in the Indianapolis Journal of December 13:

"I wish also, to state that I have read the letters printed in the press, purporting to be written by the colonel, and, in my opinion, unattended by any extraneous evidence, they do not advise bribery, as appertaining to the election of 1888. The letters, construed in the light of the knowledge that we all possess of how elections in Indiana are conducted by both parties, have nothing in them of a criminal character, but, upon the other hand, when so construed, are honorable, and indicate simply a patriotic interest in the elections."]

—Three days ago N. W. Cunney, the colored collector of the port of Galveston, and the dispenser of federal patronage in that state, made a speech here in which he vilely abused certain leaders of the white republicans by calling them "flee dogs" and "northern dough-faces." To day they have made out papers and forwarded them to Washington charging him with offensive partisanship.—Houston Dispatch to the St. Louis Republic, August 28.

The republican state convention will meet in this city next Wednesday, the 3d prox., and, if all signs are not woefully misleading, it will be the liveliest assemblage of the kind ever held in San Antonio. N. W. Cuney, President Harrison's black collector of customs at Galveston, is the acknowledged leader of the colored faction, as he is also the most influential dispenser of federal patronage in this state under the present administration. The leader of the white faction is yet to be developed.

Hon. Webster Flanagan is coming down here as peacemaker, with a hope of playing the role of the monkey who acted as arbitrator between the two cats quarrelling over a hunk of cheese and marching off with the gubernatorial prize. That is "what he will be here for," so the wisecracks say.

In view of the fierce contention between the "Lily Whites" and the blacks, there is hardly room for doubt that the convention will split. The whites, most of them, will, by preconcerted movement, arise in the convention as one man if Cuney and his colored supporters get control of the organization of the assemblage, march out of the hall and take themselves to Mission Garden, in another part of the city, and proceed to nominate a ticket independent of the blacks. Local republicans to-day made arrangements for renting the Mission Garden for convention purposes, and they make no bones of declaring their intention of assembling there with the whites from other parts of the state if the Cuney crowd does not allow them to have their way in the regular convention.

Two republican Bexar county conventions were held in this city to-day. The colored cohorts, with quite a sprinkling of whites, met at Turner hall with a total attendance of 140, and the "Lily Whites" assembled at the Mission Garden 65 strong, with only one negro present, and he was employed as janitor. Postmaster Johnson, Assistant United States District Attorney Terrell, brother of Harrison's minister to Belgium, and Hon. George Paschal, state district attorney, were the most conspicuous whites at the colored convention and were elected delegates to the state convention. Col. Jim Newcomb, postmaster under Arthur; Judge A. P. Tugwell, ex-collector customs at Eagle Pass, and John A. Bolton, second in command of the G. A. R. in Texas, were the leaders of the "Lily Whites" and head their delegation to the state convention. They declare that they are going to have Postmaster Johnson and Collector Cuney removed from office for offensive partisanship, and likewise that they will occupy seats in the state convention or burst up the whole affair.—San Antonio Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, Aug. 30.

* * *

The republican state convention delegates are beginning to arrive already, and A. W. Cuney, the colored collector of the port of Galveston, is on the ground preparing plans for the campaign, and was in consultation with the federal administration leaders this morning. At this conference it was understood that it was to be war to the knife and the knife to the hilt against the Lily White League. A. B. Reutfie, collector of the port at Brownsville, who is an aspirant to the congressional seat of the seventh district occupied by Mr. Crain, will arrive this evening with a delegation of twelve.—San Antonio Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, Sept. 1.

* * *

The republican state convention was called to order at noon by Executive Committee Chairman Degress, of Austin. There were something near 500 delegates present, forty per cent. of whom were black as Erebus.

Wright, of Lamar county, was put up by the "Lily Whites" for temporary chairman, and Cuney and his colored following pitted R. B. Hawley, of Galveston, against the Lamar man. The Cuney people won and will perhaps continue to win throughout the convention.

When the convention reassembled this evening at five o'clock none of the committees were ready to report, and adjournment was taken until nine o'clock to-morrow morning. Before adjournment the Hon. Webster Flanagan delivered an address. He pleaded for harmony, and said as a republican he knew no white nor black. Harrison, he said, was the best president since Washington; he had expelled from public office more rascals than any of his predecessors. The speaker had been a candidate for office under Harrison and had been disappointed, but felt no bitterness toward the administration, as he recognized that there were not enough offices to go around.—San Antonio Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, Sept. 3.

* * *

The republican state convention was rapped to order this morning promptly at 10 o'clock by temporary chairman Hawley. There were not more than half the delegates present and those who were there had red eyes and a tired look. They had been wrangling in committees with closed doors nearly all night and scores of them had had no sleep.

Every man closed up like a clam when questioned as to the details of the committee proceedings further than to announce with joyful gladness that the "Lily Whites" had been sat upon and mashed so flat that even the traditional pancake appeared mas-tonic in comparison. This was the work of the committee on credentials. Every white contesting delegation was forbidden seats in the convention.

Cuney and his blacks are here for harmony, and they swear they will have it at any cost—or to put it in the language of an ebony statesman from the canebrakes of the Brazos Bottom: "Dis here am a fight between de dog and de coon dis season, and de coon from Galveston done got de enemy in de water whah he want him."

D. C. Kolp, of Wichita, was chosen permanent secretary, with S. C. McCoy, of Galveston, and J. H. Stuart, of Robinson, as assistant secretaries. McCoy is a mulatto, and one of Cuney's main henchman in the Galveston Custom House.

The gubernatorial stock of the Hon. Webster Flanagan took a big jump to-day. It is, however, generally conceded that Judge Bell can have the nomination if he wants it, but his friends say he will not accept it, and Flanagan very openly and bluntly declares himself. He says he is extremely anxious to secure the nomination, even at great personal sacrifice, in order to meet Hogg on the stump all over Texas. Osterhout, of Bell, is also still quite popular, while Rector, of Travis, has a large and big lunged following. The proceedings on the whole to-day were featureless, except for much noise.

The convention reassembled to-night at eight o'clock. The only business transacted was the appointment of the committee on platform and resolutions, composed of one member from each senatorial district. Hon. R. B. Rentfrow, collector of customs at Brownsville, is chairman of the committee. Cuney is not on it.—San Antonio Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, September 4.

* * *

The republican state convention adjourned sine die this afternoon. The Cuney wing of the party return home flushed with victory save the bare nomination of Web Flanagan for governor. They won everything else and they lost that by only a hair's breadth. Flanagan's only opponent was C. W. Ogden of this city, who received only forty six votes less than the successful candidate. The only fight in the convention was over the selection of a chairman of the state executive committee. Cuney wanted to get Degress out and Degress was determined to stay in. After a short, sharp and decisive battle, Cuney put in Lock McDaniel, of Grimes county, by a very close vote.—San Antonio Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, September 5.

—The negro state convention assembled here to-day. Sixty counties are represented by 200 delegates. They are the most intelligent men of the negro race. Speeches have been made by nearly every leading man, and the burden and strength of their addresses have been the unequal division of the federal patronage and the discrimination against the negroes in this respect by the white leaders of the republican party.

The revolt against the white leaders of the republican party is full and complete, and the federal patronage throughout the state must be redistributed or there will be dire disaster, politically, wherever the negroes number many voters. The republican state convention meets in this city on Thursday next, and most of the delegates to this convention are delegates to the republican state convention, and they are instructed to enforce the position of this convention in that body.

A committee will be appointed to wait upon the President and the cabinet officers and present the resolutions to them, and insist that the federal officers throughout the state at once reconstruct their forces and give the negroes their full share of the offices under their control.—Raleigh, N. C., Dispatch to New York Times, Aug. 26.

The republican state convention met here to-day and eighty counties were represented. Great interest was taken in the convention because it was expected that it would be the scene of a bitter fight between the contending factions as represented by J. B. Eaves on the one side and Dr. J. J. Mott on the other. Eaves was rejected by the senate for collector of the fifth district through the influence of Mott. The President, Secretary Windom and Commissioner Mason, of the internal revenue bureau, are all known to be supporters of Eaves, and they are said to feel greatly outraged at his rejection. Some one or all of these gentlemen have given Eaves to understand that if he could obtain an indorsement from the state convention his name would be sent to the senate by the President for collector of the fifth district.

Proceeding upon this assurance, Mr. Eaves organized his forces all over the state and then called the state committee together on the 30th of July and issued the call for the convention to be held to-day. This only gave thirty days' notice in which to elect the delegates by ninety-seven counties. As soon as Dr. Mott and his friends ascertained the plan of battle, and that Eaves was seeking an indorsement from the convention, they did all they could to rally their forces in order to control the convention. Collector White, fourth internal revenue district, put all his deputies and storekeepers and gaugers in moving order, and, of course, Eaves did the same, and the result is that a very large number of the delegates are federal office-holders.

The same scene has been presented to-day as was presented before Cleveland's election, when every convention was controlled by the internal revenue officers. Everything was at white heat when to-day it was announced that the contending factions had usurped the functions of the convention and had settled their difficulties, and that there would be no fight. The arrangement agreed on is this: Eaves is to be re-elected chairman of the state committee, and in consideration thereof he is to indorse some gentleman from the ninth congressional district for collector to succeed himself.

It now turns out that Eaves has played a very shrewd game. He intends to go to Washington and press the President to renominate him to the senate for collector. Eaves says that Ransom and Vance will not oppose his confirmation, that he has put two negroes in his office, and has promised to put in as many more as may be demanded of him, and that Senator Blair will not therefore oppose his confirmation as he did before. It is understood that Jeter C. Pritchard, of Madison county, will be recommended for collector by Eaves after Eaves has failed to be renominated to the senate. Congressman Ewart is for Pritchard. The whole convention has been subordinated to the questions of federal patronage.—Raleigh, N. C., Dispatch to New York Times, Aug. 28.

* * *

The last effort of Collector J. B. Eaves in the convention last night was the introduction by his henchman, W. E. Henderson, colored, a clerk in his office, of a resolution requesting the President to reappoint Eaves collector. This was an attempt to nullify the bargain of the night previous, and brought a storm of objections. It appeared at one time as if there would be a genuine row, but J. C. Pritchard, who is to be Eaves's successor by virtue of Eaves's indorsement, went to Eaves and told him that he would fight that resolution and would expose the bargain and trade between Mott, Eaves and Pritchard. This frightened Eaves, and the resolution was withdrawn.

T. N. Cooper and G. H. Brown are disgusted with Eaves, as both feel that they have been sold out by him. Both expected to have the recommendation of Eaves for collector, and the fact that Pritchard is to have Eaves's support is greatly disappointing to them. Cooper is furious over the fact that Congressman Ewart has indorsed Pritchard.

The general expression to-day as to the result of the conventions of the week is that the republican party has been seriously injured. The domination of the revenue officers and the open and notorious fact that nothing but public plunder in the shape of offices moved the convention has created general disgust.—Raleigh, N. C., Dispatch to N. Y. Times, August 29.

—Mr. Orcutt, the new collector of internal revenue, says the Boston Post, enters actively into the factional contest of the republicans of the sixth Middlesex senatorial district as a delegate to the convention.

—Mr. Currier, the new naval officer, still acts as secretary of the republican state committee of New Hampshire, and lately served in that capacity at a meeting of the managers with Senator Chandler in Boston.

—Senator Higgins, of Delaware, is at present engaged, if reports to trustworthy newspapers are correct, in packing caucuses and otherwise preparing the way for a republican gubernatorial nomination in accordance with his own inclinations. The rank and file of the party have other views. The chief feature of the canvass is the pernicious activity of the federal office-holders. Internal revenue collectors, United States marshals, post-office employes and others are earnestly engaged in turning the crank of the Higgins machine.—Boston Post, Sept. 2.

—Early this morning the office holders of the fifteenth congressional district began to assemble around the court house. Among them were James H. Clark, of Mattoon; Bank Examiner Capt. J. Swisher, Paris; Census Supervisor Charles P. Sitch, Paris; United States Marshal J. C. Glenn, Mattoon; Member State Board of Equalization Jake Bell, Paris, formerly postmaster; Geo. A. Rice, of Ridge Farm, post-office inspector; C. H. Kienzie, St. Joseph, collector of statistics for the census; Dr. I. S. Wilcox, Campaign revenue collector, and concerning whom it is whispered around here that he was confirmed by the senate; W. R. Jewell, Danville, postmaster, and many country postmasters.

The object of the gathering was the republican convention for the fifteenth congressional district. The delegates were selected by Congressman Cannon and his brother "Bill," and they took care that the majority of the delegates should be either office-holders or relatives of office-holders.—Danville Dispatch to St. Louis Republic, Aug. 28.

—"AGENT FOR THE INDIANA REPUBLICAN STATE COMMITTEE. Room No. 7, 631 F street, N. W., WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 15, 1890.—DEAR SIR: Having been designated by the republican state committee of Indiana to receive and forward such funds as the republicans of Washington may see proper to contribute towards defraying the campaign expenses of the present year, I respectfully ask your consideration to the following suggestions:

"First, as intelligent citizens, you are well aware that to organize a party and conduct a campaign requires money. With the most patriotic devotion and self-sacrificing labor on the part of committees and candidates, there are still unavoidable expenses which must be met by the rank and file who desire party success. All parties expect to and do raise money by the voluntary contributions of their members. There are two classes who are always ready to cry out against such contributions—those whose meanness seeks an excuse for refusing to aid in securing the success of the party of which they are the beneficiaries and those whose consciousness of their own corruptness make them able to charge corrupt motives on others. I feel sure that you do not belong to either of these classes, and will feel willing to bear your share of the burdens and necessary expenses.

"Second—as republicans you must desire the success of the party, and especially that we retain control of the next congress in order to complete necessary legislative work. A single congress is not enough in which to harmonize opinions, mature laws to protect the equal rights of all citizens, and determine what is best to be done for the vast and varied material interests of this great country. Since the successful introduction of the 'shot gun,' 'tissue ballot' and 'counting out industries' into the democratic policy in the south, we have not had two successive republican congresses because of the large number of stolen seats the other party has held. As we have special interest in the success of President Harrison's administration, a duty devolves on us to do our utmost to obtain a republican majority in the next house.

"Third—As Indiana republicans, you know the desperate political methods of the democracy of our state, and the infamous means to which they have resorted to hold it. In open and flagrant violation of the constitution of the state they have passed an election law intended to deprive republicans of just and equal representation in congress and the legislature; they have shamefully prostituted the public and charitable institutions of the state to the meanest party uses, and they have doubled the state debt as a result of their mismanagement.

"You are, therefore, confidently appealed to by your fellow republicans of the state, to assist them in the present campaign with so much of the sinews of war as you can afford. This will enable them, by thorough organization and a free use of the means of information, to make a successful appeal to the people of the state. Two years ago we wrested from the democrats the executive and the judicial departments, and this year we should win the legislature. This will give us the senate, to whom we are justly entitled; will secure to us a fair apportionment under the new census, and will enable us to remedy the abuses of the last ten years of democratic misrule.

"To those republicans who are in office allow me to say: You have the same right to contribute to the campaign funds of your party as if you were not in office. No one has a right to assess or to coerce you into giving; but no one has a right to prohibit you. You can not be solicited at your places of official duty, but outside these you can confer and contribute as you please. The civil service laws are designed to protect you in the free exercise of your rights—not to convert you into political eunuchs. Any civil service commissioner, superior officer or fellow employe who attempts to hinder your giving will be himself in violation of the law. I address you, therefore, as free men, as republicans, desirous of aiding your party in all proper and lawful ways.

"That all Indiana republicans, in and out of office, who wish to aid the state committee by their contributions may have the opportunity of so doing, I have the honor to announce that I will be at my office during business hours and will remain there from 4 to 6 o'clock on the following days: August 31 and September 1, 15 and 30. Come and see me as above.

"Very truly yours, W. W. CURRY."

The St. Louis Republic, which prints the above, adds that Curry is an old machine worker whose office adjoins Dudley's, and that the circular has been mailed to every Indiana republican employed in the government service. The dates above given are the days on which the department employes are paid their salaries.

—Nic Karr has been made head dog catcher by Marshal Thomas. He made a hot fight for the place when the marshal went into office, but Thomas wanted him to take the honor of the official title and divide the emoluments with John Loesch, who looked after the marshal's interests in the seventh ward during the campaign. Karr refused to accept it with that condition, and Loesch was appointed. But Loesch and Karr have worked together. They joined hands in an effort to induce the municipal assembly to give them $5,000 for destroying dogs this year. They failed. The appropriation was reduced to $3,000, and now Karr is put in charge of the dog-killing department of the marshal's office. Loesch has recently been quite conspicuous in the fights in his ward, and he may get something "equally as good," but the chances are against him, unless he cultivates

"the boss" more actively.—St. Louis Republic, Sept. 4.

—The appointment of "Jim" Asay, of Ogle county, to a position in the Indian service is generally credited to Mr. Hitt, and it testifies to the fact that patronage is an injury rather than a benefit to our congressmen. The appointee is exceedingly obnoxious. If spoils principles were to control in a department of the public service from which they should be rigorously excluded, Asay should still be excluded. He has not been a working and representative Ogle county republican. It is even asserted by some that he is a democrat, but whatever his politics he does not have that standing in the county which warrants his selection by Mr. Hitt as the recipient of official favors. He is remembered in connection with legal proceedings in the circuit court at Oregon in which a young woman from Chicago was complainant. In course of the trial his conduct was shown in a light far from commendable, and Judge Cartwright rendered decision for the complainant. He is perhaps popular in a certain limited circle where his convivial habits commend him, but the people of Ogle county are generally not of the class who admire men of Asay's stamp. Many feel indignant that such a man should be preferred for official place and obtain it through the favor of Mr. Hitt.—Rockford (Ill.) Register, Aug. 22.

—That was an extraordinary illustration of the spoils system which was described by our Washington correspondent yesterday. A letter-carrier in a western city, with an excellent record, was requested to resign his place, which he naturally refused to do. The republican congressman who had sought to get rid of the carrier, because he was a democrat and the place was wanted for a republican "worker," then induced the post-office department to issue an order for his removal. But the carrier would not give up the fight, and he sent to Washington letters of remonstrance from many of the leading citizens on his route, who declared him well qualified, efficient, and faithful. The congressman then made the plea that he wanted the place for a veteran of the civil war, whereupon the carrier produced a petition for his retention signed by 600 old soldiers whose mail he had been carrying for years. Nevertheless, the order for his removal was not revoked, and the papers for the appointment of his successor had been made out, when his wife appeared in Washington in his behalf. "She visited the department, learned the exact state of things in regard to her husband, and at last accounts was chasing the obdurate member of congress around the city, resolved to convert him with the testimonials she carried with her." The congressman has already spent probably one hundred dollars' worth of the time which the government pays him for devoting to the public interests in this disgusting squabble over a petty office, which pays the incumbent only about $2.50 a day, and the end is not yet!—New York Evening Post, Aug. 29.

—Boss Quay took an active part in the "freezing out" of Sergeant-at-Arms Canaday, although he did not succeed in putting in his man Bailey. Canaday does not retire until July 1. This morning the sergeant-at-arms discharged George H. Mann, a page, who had been appointed at Quay's dictation, and filled the place thus provided by putting in a Montana boy at the request of Mr. Sanders.

Quay was mad, and within ten minutes after the senate met he introduced a resolution directing the sergeant-at-arms to make no changes in his force without the consent of the senate. The resolution was laid over until to-morrow. "Meanwhile Quay's page is out and Sander's page is in, and Canaday is still sergeant-at-arms."—New York Times, June 19.

INDIANAPOLIS, September 5, 1890.

MY DEAR SIR—For about a year and a half we have been sending the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE to the public library. I observed yesterday that it is not on your printed list of periodicals. Our object in sending it is to have it in the usual way brought to the notice of those who frequent the library in the hope that some of them may be led to read it.

If there is any reason why it should not be placed on the printed list we shall be obliged if you will inform us of it. Respectfully,

LUCIUS B. SWIFT,

For the Civil Service Chronicle.

MR. CHARLES EVANS, Librarian.

PUBLIC LIBRARY, September 6, 1890.

DEAR SIR—It has been the intention for some time to revise the list of periodicals and print a new revised list, containing all periodicals now currently received. This will be done as soon as possible. The fact that this was to be done was the sole reason why the CHRONICLE has not been added. The omission was one of several, and I am obliged to you for calling my personal attention to the matter.

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES EVANS, Librarian.

LUCIUS B. SWIFT, Esq.

The list referred to is a printed one of periodicals with additions of names of new papers from time to time inserted in writing and tacked up in the reading-room of the library. While the question when the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE shall go upon the list is being decided, any one wishing to see this paper can get it in the reading-room by asking for it.

THE National League of Civil Service Reform Associations held its annual meeting in Boston, October 1st and 2d. In this congenial atmosphere the League could but get and it got a large hearing. The speech of Mr. Curtis, in Tremont Temple, was listened to by a large and appreciative audience, and was admirably adapted to the occasion. This speech and the papers read and the resolutions will be found elsewhere in this paper. The resolutions justly and fairly point out what the administration has failed to do according to promise. In speaking of the civil service commission the resolutions could not be expected to distinguish individuals. But both in the meetings and at the dinner, where two hundred guests were present, the mention of Mr. Roosevelt's name was always applauded. It is well known that Mr. Thompson is an equally fearless upholder of the law against its enemies and is in accord with Mr. Roosevelt, but being a democrat he is not under a republican administration, and in the present condition of the reform, so effective a spokesman. If the next administration should be of his party we may hope that he will be the commissioner militant to beat off the Grosvenors, Houks, Ewatts and Hattons.

THE men who live by campaigns and elections are trying in every way they dare to scare money out of the department clerks in Washington. Among others, Congressman Grosvenor's brother is particularly bold. Referring to these attempts, Mr. Roosevelt says:

Any government employe who is directly or indirectly concerned in soliciting or receiving money for campaign purposes from any other government employe, whether he does so on his own account or through a club or association which acts as his agent, renders himself liable to prosecution, and whenever we get any evidence against such offenders, we will immediately lay his case before the proper authorities. No government employe need pay a cent unless he wishes to, and we will welcome information from any one as to any effort being made, no matter how indirectly, to force him to subscribe for political purposes.

The country and the clerks now know that this is no sham protection which is offered against political pirates. Prosecutions of violators of the law are not so certain, thanks to President Harrison's prosecutors, but with Mr. Roosevelt ready and certain to make open war, no officer will dismiss a clerk for refusing to contribute. Nothing like this attitude of the commission, of which Mr. Roosevelt is the spokesman, so well shows the progress and gathering strength of the merit system.

THE Pennsylvania campaign presents a sight that gratifies every one who is tired of being ruled by bosses, not to say rascals. A great body of Pennsylvania republicans refuse to vote for Quay's man Delamater, and are actively working for his opponent Pattison, whom the democrats elected governor of the state in 1882. Quay has carried the golden-rule maxim of Ingalls too far, and a large number of ministers are aroused against him. A meeting which packed the Academy of Music in Philadelphia was held October 20, to give public expression to the protest. There is no question but that the revolt is widespread and embraces many thousands of the best republicans in Pennsylvania. Whatever the result, the agitation will add to the number of independent voters and will bring into activity against boss rule a large number of new men. There is a majority of 80,000 to overcome. There would be no hesitation in saying that this would be done were it not for the means possible with Quay. As Mr. Bonaparte says, if we had not seen Gorman under like circumstances make the figures in Maryland foot up right for his side, we should feel sure of Quay's defeat now. It may again be remarked for the benefit of President Harrison and Mr. Wanamaker that Quay does not and can not deny that he stole money from the Pennsylvania treasury; and that he could not remain in public life if deprived of the federal patronage. The latter the Lincoln republicans have already told the President in a formal communication.

MR. ROBERT LINCOLN has interfered in the Pennsylvania matter by writing a letter saying that the anti-Quay republicans have no right to use his father's name and call themselves Lincoln republicans. It was hoped that this letter was a forgery, as it smacked too much of a man of few wits defending a knave. As the New York Evening Post says, Mr. Lincoln can not in this manner write his father up, but he can very decidedly write himself down. Mr. Herbert Welsh thus puts him to shame:

"You further say that you can not agree 'in the soundness of a position which is based on an assumption of representing the opinions of Republican leaders who can no longer speak for themselves.' Your father, my dear sir, be it said in all sincerity and reverence, was one of that goodly company of martyrs and of prophets, who, 'being dead, yet speak.' You do him less honor than we to suppose the contrary. Neither the lapse of years nor the debasement of the name which his speech and acts made glorious can silence his words in the heart of the American people. Neither the words nor the counsels of Abraham Lincoln are of private or family interpretation. They are the common property of the nation."

THE Buffalo common council thought it was a "jigger man" than the law and it appointed some street and health inspectors in entire disregard of the New York civil service law. Mr. Sherman S. Rogers, representing the Buffalo Civil Service Reform Association, promptly took the common council into court, and has won a succession of victories in the special term, in the general term, and now in the court of appeals. The payment of salaries to the persons improperly appointed is enjoined. In its opinion handed down October 7, the court of appeals says of the merit system:

"If the system were to be carried out to its fullest extent by appropriate legislation, and if the laws thus enacted were to be enforced bona fide and with cordial heartiness by the men to whose hands it would necessarily be confided, it has been confidently predicted that the improvements in our entire civil service would be such that no unprejudiced citizen would ever give his consent to return to the old order of things. * * * That the former system was bad, very bad indeed, is a fact regarding which it is almost impossible to dispute. * * * That the results, if the legislation be fairly carried out, will be immeasurably superior to those obtained under the old system, is a prediction most confidently made by those whose knowledge upon the subject is the greatest. It is somewhat difficult to imagine a worse than the old system of appointments to civil office. That a letter-carrier should lose his position because his views upon the question of the tariff were not in accordance with the ruling powers seems to be the very height of absurdity."

ALL GIVERS AS WELL AS RECEIVERS WERE MUTUALLY BOUND TO DEFEND EACH OTHER'S POSSESSIONS.—Blackstone.

The middle ages in Europe had its local despots, its robber barons, who seized the control of its cities and provinces, levied tribute on citizens and toll from passers-by. At present dungeons and daggers are discarded from the use of the successors of these early tyrants. But not the less really is the power used and we made the prey and the sport of a class as infamous in the sight of any true man as any robber-baron of the fifteenth or sixteenth century. The weapons they use now are vastly more potent than prison or sword. They are organization and money. The very form of our institutions makes them potent, and to the whole extent that our institutions are designed for the discharge of duty by virtuous citizens are they adapted to serve the purposes of vile demagogues, when the respectable class become negligent of public duty and unvigilant as to the condition of the state, and permit themselves to be betrayed by appeals to their own selfish interests and carried away by cheap party cries to prefer anything to the pure welfare of the state and the honest administration of government.—From the Sermon of Rev. Joseph May on the present situation in Pennsylvania.

NOTES.

THE Baltimore Sun, of October 22, prints the address of Mr. John Hemsley Johnson before the tax-payers' association, on "The Merit System of Appointing City Officials."

THE Civil Service Record, for October, has the speeches in full made at the dinner given by the various associations in Massachusetts upon the occasion of the meeting of the National League. They read as well as they sounded.

THE Civil Service Record, for September, prints Mr. Roosevelt's statement before the congressional committee investigating the civil service. It also publishes the appearance of Congressman Grosvenor before the committee and his statement and final discomfiture by Mr. Roosevelt. The whole article is of great interest and value.

THE October Civil Service Reformer contains a very clever editorial on the significance of a so-called request for voluntary subscriptions recently received by the employes of the internal revenue service in Baltimore. The money raised was to be exclusively used for the benefit of the canvass of the Hon. Sidney E. Mudd in the fifth congressional district, stated Senator Coffin who "held up" the employes. They knew that Senator Coffin was the personal and political friend of the collector, and that Mudd, who seeks re-election, had largely contributed to the collector's appointment, and, as Mr. Quay would say, under all the circumstances Senator Coffin's request could hardly be disregarded.

THIRD REPORT OF THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE OF THE NATIONAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE.

Presidential Postmasters.

To the Executive Committee of the National Civil Service Reform League:

Your special committee, appointed to inquire into the condition of the federal service and the operation of the reform law, has completed its investigation of removals and resignations of presidential postmasters during the first year of the present administration.

It gave us satisfaction to note in our last report the improved condition of the patent office and the adherence to civil service principles in its management. We are not able to discover the same adherence to business methods in respect to the changes made among presidential postmasters. In investigating these changes, we have attempted to ascertain:

1. Their number.
2. The motive, whether made for political reasons or to promote the efficiency of the service.

Our first effort was to ascertain what changes had been made. For the purpose of obtaining official information, our chairman opened a correspondence with the officers of the post-office department, which is fully set forth in the following letter addressed by him to the President on March 27, 1890, and in the letters therein referred to and annexed to this report:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1890.

Hon. Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States:

DEAR SIR—On February 20, I wrote to Mr. J. Lowrie Bell, general superintendent of the railway mail service, asking him how I could secure copies of the daily bulletin of the orders affecting the postal service, and obtain access to past files of this daily bulletin. On February 21, he answered that it could only be furnished for official purposes; that the file was kept at his office; and that, if I would call and show why I should examine it, I would, if proper, be allowed to do so. On February 22, I answered, saying that a special committee was recently appointed by the National Civil Service Reform League to inquire into the present condition of the civil service with reference to this reform, and that I was placed in charge of this work in Washington, that a list of appointments and removals of postmasters was necessary, and asking whether I might be allowed to look over these past files and take copies of such portions as might seem necessary, or whether such inspection would be inadmissible. On March 1, I received an answer from Postmaster-General Wanamaker, that the department was governed by a well-established precedent, which denied to the public the privilege of inspecting papers in appointment cases for many sound reasons, in furtherance of which such papers had invariably been deemed privileged and confidential with the department. It will be observed that I asked nothing more than to inspect past files of the daily bulletin in the office of the general superintendent of the railway mail service, and that I am told that such papers have invariably been deemed privileged and confidential.

Thinking there must be some misapprehension on the part of the postmaster-general, I wrote him on March 6 that the files I desired to look over were the files of the daily bulletin containing lists of appointments and men removed, and not any other files, and that I understood these were given to the public press, and did not see how they could be deemed confidential. I stated that all I desired to see was a record of the removals and appointments, and not of any other files or papers relating in any other manner to such removals and appointments. To this I received an answer from the postmaster-general, dated March 11, politely requesting me to call upon him at my earliest convenience. On the afternoon of March 14 I accordingly called upon the postmaster-general, but he declined to permit an inspection of these files of the daily bulletin, telling me I had no business to see them.

On April 26, 1889, Mr. William Potts, secretary of the league, asked Mr. Wanamaker for information as to the names of postmasters who have died, resigned, or been removed since the incoming of the present administration, and the names of those who have been appointed during the same period, and also their offices. Mr. Wanamaker replied May 10 that the information asked was furnished daily through the press in announcing the appointments made, and that the changes were furnished in manifold to the representatives of the press, embracing the name of the office and the former official, the cause of the change, whether from resignation, death, improvement of the service, or removal, and the name of the new appointee. Mr. Wanamaker said that it would be impossible for the working force of the department to furnish the special information sought, and that it would be a violation of the regulations to admit outsiders to perform any work in connection with the official and legal papers of the department.

On June 18, 1889, Mr. J. Hemsley Johnson, the editor of the Civil Service Reformer, a newspaper published in Baltimore, wrote a letter to the postmaster-general asking for the total number of removals in the railway mail service between March 4 and June 1, 1889. Mr. Wanamaker answered that there was a daily statement given to the public press of all the changes made, and added the following: "As we understand it, your paper has thus far given scarcely anything but misrepresentations by way of alleged facts to the people in discussing this question. We are very much gratified to see this change in your disposition, and a desire to deal frankly and fairly, and to come to first sources to gain official facts before taking up official discussion. Therefore, if you are ready to begin the discussion on the basis of truth and candor, and willing to correct the false statements heretofore made in your journal, and to say frankly to the public that said previous information was wrong, and that you henceforth intend to discuss matters connected with the postal service intelligently and fairly, on actual official data, we should be glad to furnish you with any information at our command."

I enclose copies of this correspondence for your inspection.

Without considering now whether the record of removals and appointments is not so far a public record as to entitle any citizen to its inspection at such reasonable hours as may be consistent with the business of the department, permit me to say that the refusals to allow it ought to be more consistent. Mr. Wanamaker refuses to allow me to look over the files of appointments and removals because such papers have invariably been deemed privileged and confidential, and yet he tells Mr. Potts and the editor of the Reformer that they are furnished daily to the public press. He says to Mr. Potts that it would be impossible for the force of the office to furnish the special information, and a violation of the regulations to admit outsiders to obtain it; and yet he says to the editor of the Reformer that, if the latter will retract certain unspecified statements made in that journal, and say that the Reformer intends to discuss matters connected with the postal service on actual official data, he will be glad to furnish that paper with any information at his command.

I think you will see that these statements are not consistent, and before publishing this correspondence I respectfully submit it for such consideration as it may seem to you to deserve.

Very respectfully,

WM. DUDLEY FOULKE.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, March 19, 1890. }

Hon. Wm. D. Foulke, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR MR. FOULKE—The President directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th inst., with the accompanying copies of correspondence. Very truly yours,

E. W. HALFORD, Private Secretary.

Your committee is of the opinion that the lists of postmasters removed and appointed ought to be a public record,—that any person dealing with the department should have the right to know who is the lawfully commissioned officer, when he was appointed, and when his term would expire, and ought not to be required to establish a special interest before being permitted to inspect this list, any more than if it were the record of a court of justice or of a legislative body. If the postmaster-general has the discretionary right to refuse such inspection, the exercise of this right can not fail to incur the distrust of those who believe that the public service should be administered with such publicity as not to shrink from examination.

The past numbers of the daily bulletin issued to the press had become scattered and lost before your committee was appointed; and it is impossible thus to obtain a complete official list of the changes made, especially in relation to fourth-class post-offices. The results of our inquiries will perhaps show why the postmaster-general considered it necessary to refuse access to this information. The mere number of such removals (which the department offered to furnish) would of itself throw no light upon the motives for which they were made; and without the names of the offices, of the men removed, and of the new appointees, it would be manifestly impossible for us to obtain information of value. We have, however, been able to obtain this information so far as the changes in presidential post-offices are concerned, in other ways; and, if it is not derived wholly from the postmaster-general's own list, it is because he declined to furnish it.

A partial enumeration of the changes in presidential offices, those made between March 4 and July 1, 1889, had been already given in the report of the postmaster-general for 1889. It is as follows (see p. 19):

By deaths.....	24
By resignations.....	176
By expirations.....	105
By offices becoming presidential.....	119
By removals for various reasons.....	136
Total	560

And the report says of these removals, "55 were removed upon inspectors' and other official reports, 23 others had served over four years, 22 others had an average service of nearly four years, and the remaining 36 were removed to secure better service." This report reveals a curious system resorted to in the post-office department to explain removals. In the first place, changes made by resignations and by expirations of terms are excluded before these removals are counted. Then we are told that among the men removed 23 had served over four years (although the term for which they were commissioned had not expired), and "22 others had an average service of nearly four years." This is certainly a peculiar reason for the removal of an efficient postmaster before the expiration of his term.

If A, B, C and D are four unexceptionable postmasters, and A has been in office two years, and B, C and D have been in three years and eleven months, this will give an average term of "nearly four years"; but it is a rather poor reason for the removal of even B, C and D, to say nothing of A, who has served only two years, and whose average is thus extended by this involuntary companionship. There is no claim that these men are removed for improper conduct, nor even to secure a better service; for those classes are specially mentioned. According to the postmaster-general's report, each of these removals appears to be without other reason than the iniquity of serving an average term with some other unknown person of "nearly four years."

But the statements in this report go further: "55 were removed upon inspectors' and other official reports; while the remaining 36 were removed to secure a better service." It thus appears that as to this remainder there were no official reports in reference to the good of the service; and the information upon this point must have come from unofficial sources. We shall examine hereafter somewhat in detail the character of such information and the way in which these removals were made.

The nominations to presidential post-offices are sent by the President to the senate, and appear scattered through the records of congress. An examination of these records has enabled us to ascertain the changes in these offices with substantial accuracy. The changes in presidential offices made during the first year, as given by Mr. Clarkson, first assistant postmaster-general, are as follows:

1. On deaths.....	48
2. On resignations.....	374
3. On expirations.....	521
4. On offices becoming presidential.....	227
5. Removals:
A. On inspectors' and other government officials' reports.....	298
B. Upon expiration of four years' service and second commission not yet expired.....	201
C. Upon undoubted evidences of mismanagement, without reports.....	114
Total.....	1,783

The entire number of presidential postmasters, according to the report of the postmaster-general on July 1, 1889, was 2,662 (see p. 12.) Two hundred and twenty-seven offices became presidential between March 4, 1889, and March 4, 1890, according to Mr. Clarkson's statement above. Of these, 119 had become presidential on July 1, 1889, according to the postmaster-general's report above referred to. One hundred and eight offices therefore became presidential after July 1, 1889, and before March 4, 1890, making the total number of presidential offices on March 4, 1890, 2,270. It is thus shown that over 64 per cent. of these officers were changed during the first year of the present administration. The statement made by the post-office department, however, indicates that only 613 of such changes, or about 23 per cent., have been made by the removal of the incumbents, and that the remaining changes have been upon deaths, resignations, expirations of terms, and upon the respective offices becoming presidential. It will be noticed that the number of changes owing to the death of the incumbent is only 48. The changes on account of the offices becoming presidential are in their nature very similar to removals, since there would appear to be no better reason why an efficient fourth-class postmaster should be displaced when the business of his office increases so as to make it presidential, than why the same change should be made if the office had always been presidential. If such change is made for political reasons merely, it is equally a violation of the promise that "fidelity and efficiency" should be "the only sure tenure of office."

We determined, however, in view of the graver evils resulting from changes made during the incumbents' four years' term to confine our attention to the more important cases of resignations and removals, and to ascertain,—

1. Whether the alleged resignations were voluntary or were made under pressure for political reasons; and

2. Whether the removals were, as alleged in the above statements of the postmaster-general and first assistant postmaster-general, made upon official reports and upon other undoubted evidences of mismanagement and "for the good of the service," or whether these terms were used as a cloak to cover removals made for political reasons.

Your committee, therefore, addressed to each postmaster removed or resigned, as well as to his successor, a communication calling for the facts regarding the change. The following was addressed to the postmaster removed or resigned:

DEAR SIR—We understand that you were displaced from the office of ——— on the ——— day of ———. Would you be willing to state to this committee the circumstances of this change?

1st. Were any causes assigned for it? if so, what were they, and by whom assigned? If you resigned was your resignation requested or suggested? if so, by whom? If in writing, will you kindly inclose a copy?

2d. By whom were you succeeded?

3d. To what political party do you belong? To what party does your successor belong?

4th. What political services did you render while in office? What position, if any, did you hold in your party organization? Were you connected with any newspaper? if so, give its name.

5th. What political services, if any, did your successor render in the last campaign or previously? What position, if any, did he hold in the party organization to which he belonged? Was he connected with any newspaper? if so, give the name of such paper.

6th. Do you know upon whose recommendation or influence, if any, you were displaced or your successor appointed?

7th. Give any facts known to you regarding the motive or reasons for your displacement and his appointment.

8th. When did your term of office expire?

9th. Please state as specifically as possible any facts you know regarding the efficiency of the administration of the office before and since your removal.

10th. Who was your predecessor, and how long had he held office?

11th. When were you appointed?

When the answer to such communication was received, we embodied the substance of such answer in a letter to the new appointee, with the request that if in any respect the information was incorrect, or he desired to add any other facts in reference to the change, he would communicate the same to your committee. In all cases where the postmaster removed or resigned did not answer our inquiries, the appointee was addressed in the following letter:

DEAR SIR—We understand you were appointed to the office of ——— on the ——— day of ———, in the place of ———.

Previous to your appointment had you any experience in the duties of the office? If so, what was it?

What political claims, if any, had you upon the office?

Did you take part in the last campaign? What position did you hold in the party organization, if any? Are you a member of the republican party? Were you connected with any newspaper (if so, what was it? and in what capacity?)

Upon whose recommendation or influence was the appointment made? What were the circumstances which led to your appointment?

When did your predecessor's term of office terminate?

In thus getting information from both sides, and giving both postmasters a chance to be heard, we believed that we would arrive at the truth as nearly as it was possible to do so by written correspondence. The answers to these communications were filed, tabulated and classified; and from these answers we are enabled to report, it is believed, with substantial accuracy in regard to the system pursued. We made these inquiries in 927 cases, 574 being removals and 353 resignations. We have received answers in 558 cases (a little more than 60 per cent. of the whole number concerning which inquiry was made), giving more or less fully the information asked for. In 321 of these cases the answers came from the postmasters removed or resigned, in 90 cases from the successors only, and in 147 cases from both. Shortly after we commenced addressing inquiries to the new appointees, First Assistant Postmaster-General Clarkson, in an interview sent through the associated press to all the leading papers in the country, said:

We are receiving letters from newly appointed postmasters who have been addressed in this way. The inquiries sent out, in every instance that I have seen, show that the case has been pre-judged and the change made assumed to be wrong. It is evidently an effort to get statements from removed and disappointed officials for political use, and some of the letters show an intention to try to induce the new postmaster to make statements of defence where no defence is needed. The postmasters seem to realize that they have reports to make only to their superior officers. No political capital can be made out of these changes. The President has made no removals except for cause—for delinquency in official duties, inefficiency of service, or violation of law. He has refused to make any changes for partisan reasons. Changes made for cause have been on the reports of inspectors, showing a demand for the change in the interest of the public service.

It is hardly necessary to say that if the first assistant postmaster-general had desired to convey to these appointees an intimation that they were not to answer these inquiries, or, if they did answer, what the tenor of the answer should be, he could not well have used words more aptly chosen for the purpose.

RESIGNATIONS.

We received answers in 143 cases to our inquiries as to resignations. In 95 of these it appeared that such resignations were voluntary, and in 48 cases that they were not voluntary, but were requested by the congressman of the district or by other influential parties, who were believed to have the disposal of the office in their hands. In some cases inducements were offered in the shape of a postponement of the time for the change or an offer by the proposed successor to pay a good price for the fixtures of the office when the appointment should be made; and sometimes the resignation was procured by threats of immediate removal. Among the instances of such resignations, we would call attention to the following letters from J. P. Dolliver, M. C., to Patrick Cane, postmaster at Fort Dodge, Ia., written ten days after the inauguration of President Harrison:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11, 1889.
Mr. P. Cain, Fort Dodge, Ia.:

DEAR SIR—Will you have the kindness to forward to me, to be filed in the department, your resignation as postmaster at Fort Dodge, to take effect on the appointment of your successor?

Very truly, J. P. DOLLIVER.

P. S.—If this is done, your successor will not be named till July 1.

J. P. D.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 4, 1889.
Mr. P. Cain, Fort Dodge, Iowa:

DEAR SIR—Your letter enclosing your resignation as postmaster at Fort Dodge, to take effect July 1, is received. I thank you for the promptness and willingness with which you have decided to lay down the cares of an office on the change of administration.

Hoping you may be as successful in your future political moves as you have been in the past,
I am yours very truly, J. P. DOLLIVER.

The following letter from M. S. Brewer, M. C., to Charles Cowan, postmaster at Ovid, Mich., speaks for itself:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
PONTIAC, April 13, 1889.

Charles Cowan, Esq., Ovid, Michigan:

MY DEAR SIR—Your letter of the 17th duly received, and contents noted. My dear fellow, you last fall were a very "offensive partisan;" in fact, it was the worst case of that fatal malady that I had knowledge of in this district. I feel it my duty to have a change made in postmaster at your place as soon as convenient. There will be many cases in presidential offices where I shall feel perfectly willing to let the applicants hold their time out; but in your case you seemed to stake your political or rather your official life on the result of the election, and the tide of fortune moved against you. I have no personal or revengeful feeling in the matter, but deem it my duty to do what I can to make the change suggested. I am in no great hurry about the matter, and do not wish to oppress you in any way. Permit me to suggest that, if you will place your resignation in my hands to take effect at the close of the present quarter, the 30th of June, I will arrange it that you can hold on till then. I simply make this suggestion for your consideration. I shall start for Washington to-morrow night, and would be glad to know about the matter before leaving.

I am truly yours, M. S. BREWER.

P. S.—This will be kept confidential, should you wish it.

(The italics in all the letters in this report are ours.) The postmaster resigned.

The following is the correspondence between George W. Andrews, former postmaster at Murphysboro, Ill., and George W. Smith, M. C.:

1922 H STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 20, 1889.

Hon. George W. Andrews, Murphysboro, Ill.:

FRIEND ANDREWS—So far, I believe, your conduct and mine has been in keeping with the friendly relations existing between us. Circumstances now are such that I am compelled to act a little earlier than anticipated in reference to the post-office at Murphysboro. Your conduct toward me has been manly, gentlemanly, and honorable. The favor will not be forgotten. By your voluntary resignation, placed confidentially in my hands, you placed me in a position to favor a political opponent and a personal friend. I have carefully guarded your future as I would wish you to guard mine. Matters have arisen, personal to myself, which absolutely demand immediate action on my part. Those matters I can not make public. I desire to have the appointment of a postmaster at Murphysboro at once. In the nature of things, you know it will be several days after an appointment is made before the office could possibly change hands. On receipt of this wire me at my expense O. K., and I will at once settle the matter. Do not ask the reasons for such a request, as you can as a politician readily account for it in various ways. Your record will be clear. Treat this communication in the same manner you would wish such a one from yourself to me treated. Wire immediately on receipt of this. On receipt of such dispatch I will understand that your resignation already sent me, which by its terms was to take effect July 30, is, by your consent, to take effect immediately.

It is raining very hard here. In fact, it rains about one-half the time. With kindest regards, believe me, very truly, Your friend,

GEORGE W. SMITH.

Copy of telegram.

To G. W. SMITH,

1922 H Street, N. W.,

Washington, D. C.

You have my permission to O. K. it, if desired.

C. W. ANDREWS.

J. P. Gaspar, postmaster at Kingsley, Iowa, resigned on January 30, 1890. The circumstances leading to his resignation are clearly shown in the correspondence between him and I. S. Struble, M. C., of which he has sent us the following copy:

LE MARS, IA., Aug. 26, 1889.

Peter Gaspar, Esq., Kingsley, Ia.:

DEAR SIR—Within the last eight or ten days such movements have been made in relation to the Kingsley post office as convinces me that it will be wise for you to look the inevitable in the face and prepare for a change. If you see proper to tender your resignation quietly, I will forward the same without recommendation, thus leaving you to be the apparent mover in the case, and willingly surrender the office you have so acceptably filled during your term.

One other potent feature in the case is the fact, as I am advised, that the parties in whose store the office has been and is now kept, are defendants in a case brought by one of the highest authorities in the state to enjoin them from selling liquors unlawfully. This, as you see, gives me good ground to recommend your removal. I prefer, however, that you should resign, if you desire to do so, rather than to recommend your removal. Let me hear from you by return mail, and believe me,

Yours very truly,

I. S. STRUBLE.

Of this Mr. Gaspar writes us:

My reply to Struble was, in substance, that I would like to know the cause of my proposed removal (in justice to myself), and would rest the case (on my part) with the republican patrons of this office.

Here is Mr. Struble's second letter:

LE MARS, IA., Aug. 31, 1889.

J. P. Gaspar, Esq.:

DEAR SIR—Replying to your favor of the 28th inst., will say that as yet I am not prepared to advise you upon what ground your removal may be recommended. It has not been decided to recommend; but action in that direction is quite probable at an early date.

I am strongly of the opinion that it would be better all round, and just as well for you upon any substantial point, if you tender your resignation rather than have charges preferred against you, as I am informed there will be soon. Yours truly,

I. S. STRUBLE.

Copy of letter written to one John McIntosh:

LE MARS, IA., August 30, 1889.

John McIntosh, Esq., Kingsley, Ia.:

DEAR SIR—I am in receipt of yours of the 28th inst., replying to which I will say that it only adds to my embarrassment, already sufficient by reason of having to choose between republican applicants for post-office, to be informed that some of my republican friends in and about Kingsley are desirous of having the present postmaster retained, and especially if such friends will allow themselves to become to any considerable extent concerned in the matter. The line on which I have acted is this—to make no move myself with a view to having democratic post office incumbents displaced by republicans until such time as the republican patrons of the office should themselves lead off in attempts to have a removal and a new appointment, or four years from appointment had expired. This has been my position in relation to the Kingsley office; and I have kept quiet about it until a number of republicans became active in the matter, and evinced a strong desire that a change might occur.

My opinion, after some experience about these post-office matters, is that, when republican patrons to any considerable extent begin to act relative to a change, the sooner thereafter the case can be disposed of, on a basis of the expression of the republican patrons, the better for the party and community; and so I feel now in relation to the Kingsley case. The sooner a new man is appointed there, the sooner the community will recover from the agitation and possible excitement in relation to the appointment of the most important official of the town. I wish the republican patrons of the Kingsley post-office, however they may appreciate Mr. Gaspar, might take a sensible view of the situation, and come as near as possible uniting in the thought of an early disposition of the case in the interest of the party and the peace of the community in that part of the country. It is my understanding that substantial charges will be preferred against Mr. Gaspar, and, if such shall be sent to me, I will, according to my uniform custom in such cases, consider them, and make such indorsement thereon as may at the time seem right. If no formal charges are preferred, I shall, within a comparatively short time, decide between the applicants, and recommend the one who, in my opinion, has the greatest weight of republican sentiment in his support, not being governed by number merely. This is my feeling now, supported, as it is, by the strong belief, based, as I have indicated, on some experience, that the most satisfactory way out of a post-office controversy is as early a decision in the case as can intelligently be reached upon consultation with the republican patrons. Shall be pleased to hear from you on this or any other subject at any time or to meet you personally. Yours truly, I. S. STRUBLE.

James S. Catherwood, former postmaster at Hoopston, Ill., writes that "Joseph G. Cannon (M. C.) was here looking for a cause to remove me. I tendered my resignation on condition that they would buy the fixtures." Charles W. Warner, the new appointee, writes: "Catherwood, knowing he had only six months to serve, was anxious to sell his outfit to some responsible republican successor. Mr. Cannon (M. C.) called an election. There were six candidates. I received one hundred and fifty-eight out of three hundred and ninety-one votes. Catherwood thereupon resigned, and I was appointed."

Another method is shown by a letter from Mr. Frank C. Morse, the postmaster appointed by the present administration at Colfax, Wash. He says:

The history of the matter is this: Mr. Berry was sheriff of the county and a candidate for re-election. Being defeated at the polls, he circulated a petition asking his appointment as postmaster. Five days before his term of office expired, Mr. Berry started to Washington with his petition, taking the resignation of Mr. La Rue (the former postmaster) with him. How he obtained this resignation I do not know; but I was afterwards shown a copy of a contract made between Mr. Berry and Mr. La Rue, in which Mr. Berry agreed to pay Mr. La Rue $1,000 for the office fixtures in case Mr. Berry should be appointed postmaster, and I have always believed this procured the resignation. All this occurred before I had taken any steps toward securing the appointment. In fact, I knew nothing of Mr. La Rue's intended resignation; nor did I know that Mr. Berry had started for Washington until he was gone some four days, the whole matter being kept as secret as possible. As soon as it was learned that Mr. La Rue had resigned, Mr. Fullerton and others of my friends circulated a petition asking for my appointment. Mr. Fullerton procured a second resignation from Mr. La Rue; and my petition, Mr. La Rue's resignation, and a copy of the contract above mentioned, were sent to Mr. Allen [John B. Allen, then M. C.], and my appointment as postmaster followed in due course of time.

W. N. Hensley, formerly postmaster at Columbus, Neb., and now county judge of Platt county, informs us that he was told on various occasions by the leaders of the republican party that he would be removed first in May, 1889, and again in July, and finally by the confidential political advisers of Mr. Dorsey (the republican congressman of the district), that his removal would be ordered about the first of September, and that charges would be preferred against him. He says that, upon request, he was permitted to see such charges, and found same to be that he was appointed to the office for political services rendered his party, and for no other reason. These charges were signed by the man who became his successor and a few others. He says, "I was led to believe that my removal was only a question of a very short time, unless I resigned."

The statement made by Carl Kramer, the present postmaster, is: "Mr. Hensley resigned because he knew he could get a better price for his fixtures then than at the end of his term, and mainly because he wanted to enter at once the race for county judge." Mr. Kramer does not deny or qualify the statement as to the charges made by him for his predecessor's removal.

Mr. W. T. McGinness, postmaster at Minden, Neb., says: "Why I resigned was because W. D. Hart (my successor), had everything his own way. It was 'take so much, and resign at once, or I will not take your outfit.' I was too poor a man not to accept." A letter of inquiry from the committee to Mr. Hart failed to elicit an answer.

From such instances as the above, the conclusion is obvious that many of these so-called resignations were not such in fact, but that the changes thus made were, in spirit and essence, removals for political purposes.

Respectfully submitted,

GEO. WM. CURTIS TO THE LEAGUE*

I salute the city in which we are assembled. Founded upon Puritan principles by Puritan courage, foremost in the great controversy of the colonies with the crown and of the Union with slavery, from the Arbella to the tea-ships, from John Winthrop to John Albion Andrew, from Sir Henry Vane to Ralph Waldo Emerson, her voice has been the voice of progressive liberty and her history the story of advancing civilization. No good American cause but Boston has been its champion. Here James Otis thundered against the writs of assistance and Samuel Adams defied the king. Through these streets Joseph Warren hastened to Bunker Hill, and from yonder common marched the first Union regiment of the civil war. Here Adams and Quincy pleaded, and

*The address of the president at the annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League, Boston, October 1, 1890.

Channing taught, and Garrison demanded immediate emancipation. Here, as the mighty debate that shook the Union deepened, Sumner besought Webster to heed the changing aspects of the time and add to his great title, Defender of the Constitution, the greater name, Defender of Humanity. Here, when Webster declined the call, his party fell, the party which had been the organized political force of the conscience and intelligence of New England. To the moral firmness and practical wisdom of the lineal successors of the revolutionary whigs, the conscience whigs of Boston and Massachusetts, the beneficent national results of the last half of the closing century in this country are largely due.

Boston, therefore, as the American nursery of political reform and of the fundamental American principle that good morals and good politics are inseparable, has seen all the vicissitudes of early reform and of uncompromising reformers. Here they have passed through all the maladies incident to infancy in reforms as in manhood. They have taken all the degrees of obloquy, ridicule, wrath, scorn, persecution and social ostracism. But reforms and reformers have survived. Hostility has changed to homage, ridicule has become respect, anger is admiration now, and the hatred of an hour is transfigured into endless gratitude.

Indeed some of our fellow-citizens are of opinion that reform in this country has done its work so thoroughly that nothing remains to do—that we are so great, free, intelligent and prosperous a people that it is absolutely Pharisaic and unpatriotic to try to point out specks upon the sun, and that for every little American infelicity we ought to be consoled by the misery of foreigners, the military rigors of Germany, or the Siberian terrors of Russia. There is an amusing readiness to suspect in all criticism of ourselves a lurking preference of other lands, which is much like supposing that a demand for clean streets in Boston implies a secret belief that the streets of New York are cleaner.

Undoubtedly we are a very great, a very free, a very intelligent and a very prosperous nation. Our friends, the other great nations over the sea, declare that we are always boisterously saying so; that we are perpetually and offensively crowing our Yankee doodle-doo, and are unnecessarily fond of playing Jack Horner, putting in our thumb and pulling out our plumb and vociferating that we are a very great and good boy. Undoubtedly our critics state the case fairly. We are constantly proclaiming that undeniable truth, and the best book that was ever written about us, Mr. Bryce's American Commonwealth, says distinctly in the very ear of our elder brother Bull, "He is a very remarkable boy." Our older European friends who complain that we are vain-glorious forget that they, too, celebrate their own superiority. The Frenchman who does not proclaim the glory of France, the Briton who does not loudly sing that Britannia rules the waves and much of the shore, is not a typical Frenchman or Englishman. Thackeray says in one of his early papers, meditating in Paris upon an impressive historical picture commemorating an act of French heroism, which never occurred, "Thus the great truth is handed down from father to son, that a Briton, a Frenchman, an Ashantee, a Hohenzollernsismaringenite is superior to all the rest of the world, and by this truth the dullards of the respective nations swear, and by it statesmen govern."

GOOD AMERICANS AND BAD.

Undoubtedly we are a great, intelligent, and prosperous nation, but it does not follow that there are not immense abuses in our political methods, dangerous tendencies in our public life, and charlatans, demagogues and rogues among our public men. Those who acknowledge it, who propose to reform dangerous tendencies, and who pitilessly expose rogues of every degree, are not bad Americans, but good Americans; they are not pessimists, but patriots. Because we are the youngest born and best beloved, the very Benjamin of Liberty; because we have done much shall we scornfully deny that there is anything more to do? Mr. Choate tells a story of a good old federalist—perhaps he mentions another party name—who was reproached for refusing to support, let us say, the Alien and Sedition bill

"What!" remonstrated his friends, "have you deserted, have you apostatized, have you lost your pride and abandoned your principles, are you no longer a federalist?" "Abandoned my principles," he answered, "I am a better federalist than ever, but I don't see why, because I am a true-blue federalist, I should be a darned fool all the time." We are justly proud that we are Americans, but one chief source of our pride ought to be the fact that we see our faults clearly, speak of them plainly and urgently appeal to each other to reform them, in perfect confidence that the sons will not shame the fathers by dread of heroic self-correction.

Justly proud of our country we may be, but no sensible American is proud of a disposition in congress to make merchandise of patriotism, or to offer under any pretense to buy with money the votes of large classes of citizens, or to tolerate without rebuke conduct intolerable among gentlemen and honorable men. No patriotic American is proud of the control of a state by lottery gamblers, nor of the terrorized suppression of voters nor of their coercion by employers. No self-respecting American is proud of elections in doubtful states carried by "soap" or by buying mules or by marshalling voters in blocks of five, nor of national legislation palpably in the interest of owners of commodities and of classes of citizens. He is not proud when, seeing in the great cities of other countries municipal order, cleanliness and economy, he sees the local government of of the greatest city in his own country under the control of its ignorance, venality and vice, and not of its intelligence, industry and public spirit; nor is his American pride consoled by the remark that the city has just such a government as it chooses and deserves. He is not proud when he sees reputable and upright Americans, from some fancied political necessity, acquiescing in the party leadership of those who have no answer for the most damaging and detailed personal accusations of a kind and under circumstances unprecedented in our history. He is not proud when he sees a degrading and demoralizing system of appointments and removals in the public service such as might be supposed to prevail in Costa Rica or Honduras, in Turkey or the Asian provinces of Russia, extolled as especially American. He is not proud when a senator of the United States says in his place upon occasion of the impeachment of a high public officer, that he has heard the taunt from foreigners that the only product of our institutions in which we surpass all other nations beyond question is our corruption. Nor is he proud when he is told that in a republic his only choice of action is symbolized by Thaddeus Stevens's reported question in a contested election case in the house, "Well, then, which is our damned rascal?" Every American, I repeat, is justly proud of being an American, but he is not proud of such things as these. What he is justly proud of is the American willingness to acknowledge such abuses when they exist and the American determination to correct them.

I am not saying that other times were better than ours. Public abuses and party spirit and patriotic despondency are as old as political society. Eighty years ago William Wirt said he sought in vain for a man fit for the presidency or for great responsibility. Chancellor Livingston died in 1813, but not until he had said that more talent and learning were demanded in congress. I doubt if any member of congress now is of the chancellor's opinion, and if we should venture to regret the national shame and disgrace of certain scenes in the capitol, there would be a prompt chorus to reply that congress is as good as it ever was. Perhaps it is, but I never heard that it was any consolation to a drowning man to be told that one of his ancestors was hung. If an observer were disposed to wish that some things were different in congress, he might not feel that he was answered satisfactorily by being told that Chancellor Livingston wished the same thing eighty years ago. I am not now extolling the earlier day nor praising the superior virtue of our fathers. But it is not a noble people which excuses its own faults by exposing its fathers' shame. Happily time idealizes the past as distance softens the sharp outlines of receding mountains, and it is always well to measure ourselves, if not with our actual historic ancestors, then with what our filial and patriotic reverence believes them to have been. The heroes who traced their descent from gods were spurred by a divine emulation. It will do us in New York no harm when we come to nominate a governor to remember that John Jay and DeWitt Clinton have been governors of New York, nor are we Americans less likely to select a fitting man for the Presidency, if we recall that Washington and the Adamses, Jefferson, Madison and Abraham Lincoln have been our Presidents.

CORRUPTION AT HOME AND ABROAD.

Again, because I mention things which are disgraceful and dangerous in our own country, I am not saying that other countries are more illustrative of a higher public welfare and private happiness than ours. For myself, I have seen Naples, but I prefer New York. I know no place in which I would rather live than the place in which I do live. But I do not therefore think Tammany Hall the gate of heaven. When we acknowledge and decry an evil tendency in our time and among ourselves, we do not deny its existence elsewhere at other times. In this country we are largely men of English stock. Our political traditions, usages and spirit are mainly English. Now every man in any land who speaks the English tongue and is sprung of English blood, is, or ought to be, honestly proud of his great lineage of constitutional liberty and if he be worthy of it he does not deplore his political origin. But enriched by other blood and under other friendly conditions we have grafted the English stock, as we believe, with a fresher life, until on the American continent it spread into a wider sweep of hospitable shade and towers more loftily toward an equal heaven. Yet there is an American puerility which scoffs at the healthy and vigorous American exposure and rebuke of American evils and dangers, as due to overweening admiration and envy of what our fathers truly and fondly called the mother-country. But I confess that it strikes me differently.

There are just reasons for American admiration of England, but superior political virtue is not one of them. Lord Chatham paid a famous tribute to the continental congress, and the most upright modern statesman of France, Guizot, agreed with him that no nation had ever such a group of able and high-minded public men to guide its first steps as the people of the American republic. The force of that impulse has not yet expired. It is the spirit of those men, not of their British opponents, which stimulates the American protest against political corruption. When I hear of buying and selling votes, of the recklessness of party spirit, of jobs and bribery, of the prostitution and degradation of the public service, of political corruption and charlatanry, I do not recall the men of the continental congress and the constitutional convention, but I remember Walpole and Newcastle, and George the Third's agents turning parliament into a market, and Edmund Burke's denunciations of the rotten boroughs and his trumpet-call for reform, and the more recent and amusing melodrama of Lord Jingo Beaconsfield, and to my English critic who assures me of his poignant grief at seeing in my country what I also behold, I can only reply, "So English you know." And to the shallow, swaggering American who decries the protest as a feeble imitation of British fashion, I say, read the history of your own country and try to understand American manhood!

WHO ARE THE PESSIMISTS?

But then I must honestly add that grappling vigorously with domestic abuses of every kind and effectively correcting them, is, also, "so English, you know," and in nothing more than in this disposition do we Americans illustrate the tradition of our race and prove our descent from the champion of constitutional liberty. Whether other times and countries were better or worse than ours, our pride in America would be a paltry emotion if it did not lift us to scorn such things as I have mentioned and highly to resolve that in our time and in our country they shall cease to be. Like the cruel abuse of prisoners and the insane, like the noisome filth of cities and the unpitied wretchedness of poverty, if they were to be expected in the eighteenth century, they are disgraceful in the nineteenth. If they were good enough for Europe and the colonies, they are too bad for America and the United States. If they were good enough for our fathers, they are not good enough for their sons.

No American, it seems to me, is so unworthy the name as he who attempts to extenuate or defend any national abuse, who denies or tries to hide it, or who derides as pessimists and Pharisees those who indignantly disown it and raise the cry of reform. If a man proposes the redress of any public wrong he is asked severely whether he considers himself so much wiser and better than other men that he must disturb the existing order and pose as a saint? If he denounces an evil, he is exhorted to beware of spiritual pride. If he points out a dangerous public tendency or censures the action of a party, he is advised to cultivate good humor, to look on the bright side, to remember that the world is a very good world, at least the best going, and very much better than it was a hundred years ago.

Undoubtedly it is, but would it have been better if everybody had then insisted that it was the best of all possible worlds, and that we must not despond if sometimes a cloud gathered in the sky, or a Benedict Arnold appeared in the patriot army, or even a Judas Iscariot among the chosen twelve? Christ, I think, did not doubt the beloved disciple nor the coming of his kingdom, although he knew and said that the betrayer sat with him at table. I believe we do not read that Washington either thought it wiser that Arnold's treachery should be denied or belittled, or that he or any other patriot despaired, although the treason was so grave. Julius Caesar, or Marlborough, or Frederick, would hardly be called great generals if they had rebuked the soldier who reported that their lines were beginning to break. When the sea is pouring into the ship through an open seam everybody is aware of it. But it is then too late. It is the watch who reports the first starting of the seam who saves the ship.

It is an ill sign when honorable public men find in exposure and denunciation of public abuses evidence of the Pharisaic disposition and a tendency in the critic to think himself holier than other men. Was Martin Luther, cheerfully defending his faith against the princes of Christendom, a Pharisee? Were the English Puritans, iconoclasts in church and state but saviors of liberty, pessimists? Were Patrick Henry demanding liberty or death, and Wendell Phillips in the night of slavery murmuring the music of the morning, birds of ill omen? Was Abraham Lincoln saying of the American Union, a house divided against itself can not stand, assuming to be holier than other Americans? To win a cheap cheer I have known even intelligent men to sneer at the scholar in politics. But in a republic founded upon the common school such a sneer seems to me to show a momentary loss of common sense. It implies that the political opinions of educated men are unimportant and that ignorance is a safer counsellor of the republic. If the gentleman who in this very hall last stooped to that sneer had asked himself what would have been the fortune of this state and this country without its educated leadership from Samuel Adams to Charles Sumner, both sons of Massachusetts, both scholars in politics from Harvard College, he might have spared his country, his party, and himself, the essential recreancy to America and to manhood which lies in a sneer at education. To the cant about the Pharisaism of reform there is one short and final answer. The man who tells the truth is a holier man than the liar. The man who does not steal is a better man than the thief. The senator from Massachusetts declaring that politics are moral principles applied to public affairs, is a truer patriot and a nobler American than the senator from Kansas declaring that the decalogue and the golden rule have no place in a political campaign.

CORRUPTION IN BOTH THE PARTIES.

Our plea for civil service reform rests upon the actual situation. Other public questions than that of political corruption engage the public mind, but none takes precedence of it in importance. We say of it what Dunning said of the power of the Crown, it has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. Under our government reform can be accomplished only by party administration. Yet the chief obstruction is the fact that the evil is common to both parties. No intelligent man would seriously allege, whatever partisan orators and newspapers may assume, that buying votes or prostituting the whole power of the public patronage in every form of appointment and removal, of salaries, of contracts, of judicial references, of lucrative opportunities, are practices confined to one party, or that what is known as the machine of one party is better than that of the other. The old democratic Plaquemine frauds in Louisiana were like the old whig pipe-laying frauds in New York. The modern republican "soap" and "fat-frying," and the money raised for secret campaign funds of which no account is ever rendered, belong to the same system of corruption as the modern democratic mule buyings and money barrels, and Tammany sales of judicial nominations. These things are not distinctively republican or democratic. They are the common crimes of parties, the common disgrace of the national name, the common danger of American institutions, the common reproach of American citizenship, and it is the common duty of that citizenship to arrest and correct them. Reform of the civil service is one of the plainest, most direct, and most effective methods of correction because it reaches the great fundamental corruption fund, the enormous wages of public employes and the vast opportunities of public contracts, because it disbands the organized office-holders, the political janizaries of the republic, all constituting a system of coercion and bribery universally practiced, with the authority of long tradition and of national acquiescence.

The government itself in this way sanctions corruption. It leads the way in public demoralization and on the greatest scale tempts to the commission of crimes which its own laws punish. By treating the emoluments of public employment as rewards for the discharge of the common duties of citizens, the party of administration, whatever it may be, corrupts the motives of political action, promotes cheating and violence at the polls, and resorts to an insidious form of the bribery which the laws condemn. If a man may properly sell his vote for five hundred dollars in the guise of a public office, or fifty thousand dollars in the form of a job, he may as properly sell it for five dollars in cash. When a party practically promises a general sack of the public salary fund in the event of its success, it appeals to the most venal motives, and invites votes not by faith in its purpose to advance the public welfare, but by hope of individual pecuniary gain. Partisan prostitution of the public service is radical treachery to popular government, because it makes private interest and not public welfare the motive of political action. If, as shrewd observers hold, the most obvious change in American character within the century is the decline of public spirit, one of its most fruitful causes is the spoils system, and to the same source—the expectation of reward for the discharge of the public duty which rests upon every citizen—may be traced the distorted and demoralized public sentiment which largely prevails in regard to military pensions and reckless public expenditure. To argue that the common duty of American citizenship in peace or war will not be discharged without bribery of place or money is to acknowledge that honest and efficient government is not in itself the highest and only legitimate reward, and to admit that corruption has already done its fatal work. There can be no more hopeless pessimism than this, and no greater treachery to the fundamental American principle. When government itself puts a price upon public spirit it degrades and demoralizes the national character and every relation of life, inviting the people to measure all action by the standard of money. But when the government which does this is itself the people, it is plain that they can confront no greater peril nor consider any question more momentous.

THE PERFORMANCE OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

In the interest of reform it is the annual duty of the League to test the performance of the administration by the principles of reform, and I can best discharge this duty this year by considering a question which is frequently and strongly urged upon my attention. It is this: Is the conviction of the necessity of reform so general, is public opinion upon the subject so ripe, that the friends of reform may wisely abandon a separate movement and merge their action in that of some existing party? In other words, is there already a political party which is actually a party of reform? If there be such a party, I invoke the inquisitive shade of Flanagan and ask what are we here for? As reformers the League is composed of protectionists, advocates of a revenue tariff, prohibitionists and independents, republicans, democrats and mugwumps. In answering the question, therefore, I shall bear this fact in mind, however plainly I may speak.

The republican party has unquestionably declared itself in the strongest manner to be a party of civil service reform. At the same time and with equal force it announced that it was a party of protection, and it also demanded effective legislation to secure the integrity and purity of elections. These were the three cardinal declarations of the platform, and one of them was especially addressed to civil service reformers. Has the course of events during the year and since our last meeting justified the assertion of eminent republicans that all honest and practical reformers ought to adhere to a party which has proved its fidelity to reform? If it has done so there can be but one answer. But has it done so?

In accordance with its declaration of protection the republican congress rapidly matured a tariff at which, as many republicans think, even Henry Clay would have blushed, and in its eagerness to fulfill its pledge, hardly stopping for debate, it passed the tariff bill in the house, and the delay in the senate led to protests and complications which seemed to threaten a serious breach in the party. The party platform also demanded a free vote and a fair count, and to secure them the party leaders prepared a bill which with the same ardor was swept through the house, and again irritated party journals chafed at the slow senate, and, like the galleries of the French convention of '93, imperatively demanded the passage of the bill. With all this zeal and eager haste not to break its pledged faith with the country and to carry out the promised policy of protection and of free elections, we might naturally expect the party to have shown equal zeal in fulfilling its other great promise of civil service reform. A revised tariff, an election bill and civil service reform were the three great party promises. They were the three distinct pledges, as I think every honest republican will agree, upon which the party appealed to the country. If, with Mr. Lincoln, it had said one war at a time and this time the war is for protection, there could have been no question or misunderstanding. But it did not say so. While, however, it was content with merely making the promises of a protective tariff and an election law, it did not pledge itself to keep them. But the promise of civil service reform it expressly proclaimed that it would not fail to keep.

THE BREADTH OF THE PROMISES.

What was this promise? Was it only to enforce a law already on the statute book which is confessedly but a tentative beginning of reform? It was very much more. The platform affirmed that reform ought to be completed by extension to all grades of the service to which it is applicable, that the spirit and purpose of reform should be observed to all executive appointments, and that all laws at variance with existing reform legislation should be repealed. This was the promise. The candidate accepted it and reiterated the pledge. Upon this comprehensive and unequivocal declaration and upon that for protection and for an election law the party went to the country. The country at the election adopted the platform as the policy of the administration. It authorized a revision of the tariff, the enactment of an election law, the extension of the reformed system to every grade of the public service to which it is applicable, appointments and removals according to the spirit and purpose of reform, and repeal all laws at variance with reform legislation. It is now a year and seven months since the party with this authorization came into complete control of every branch of the government, and we have the highest assurance that every promise has been fulfilled and every pledge redeemed.

On the 26th of August, Mr. McKinley, the distinguished leader of the House of Representatives, said in Ohio, "I do not recall any legislative body which has so thoroughly kept the pledges of the party electing it as the present majority in the House of Representatives." In commenting the next day with admiration upon the speech, the New York Tribune said, "The House, at least, has thoroughly kept the pledges of the republican party." On the 4th of September, at Portland, in Maine, the speaker of the house declared amid the enthusiastic acclamation of his audience. "We have achieved all that the party promised and more. Most platforms are but glittering generalities good enough for the campaign, but our last platform has been treated by the house of representatives like a deed of trust." The speaker and the leader did not mean that the house alone has been faithful, because that would imply the recreancy of the executive and the senate and impeach the good faith of the party before the country. The evident intention is to claim proudly that the party has thoroughly redeemed, or is in course of redeeming, its pledges; that a revised tariff bill has been practically passed; that a national election law is in progress; that congress is extending the reformed system wherever it is applicable; that appointments and removals have been made according to the principles of reform, and that all laws at variance with them are in course of repeal. Let us test the accuracy of this unqualified assertion by the facts in regard to the pledge of reform in the civil service.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

To how many grades of the service to which it is applicable has the reform system been extended? Not one. How far has the spirit and purpose of reform been observed in all executive appointments? There are about 3,600 postmasters appointed by the President. All of them but four hundred have been changed. There are more than 60,000 fourth class postmasters appointed by the postmaster-general. Almost half of the whole number and much the larger part of those in desirable offices have been changed within the nineteen months of the administration, the largest record of changes, I believe, ever made within the same time. It was promised that the spirit and purpose of reform should be observed. That spirit and purpose demand the retention of public officers of the highest efficiency in places which are not political. How many such officers like Mr. Pearson, late postmaster of New York, and Mr. Saltonstall, late collector of Boston, have been retained? In place of such officers, how many successors have been appointed primarily for fitness and not for politics? Every community can answer. The platform declared that all laws at variance with the object of reform legislation should be repealed. The power to repeal was given by the election. Chief among these laws and chiefly intended by those who drew the declaration were the laws which prescribe official terms of four years, one of the earliest and greatest victories of the spoils system. This declaration in favor of the repeal was drawn six years ago. It has been solemnly published in the same words by two successive conventions. During the six years how many of these laws have been repealed? How many party conventions or party journals have demanded their repeal? How many republican members of congress have proposed to repeal them or any other laws which facilitate corruption by patronage? So far as I am aware, not one.

The party administration declared that all these things were to be done, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectually avoided. Is it to avoid those dangers that the post-office department has been administered in a more partisan spirit than ever before; that the postmaster-general has declared that he should not think of appointing a democrat if he could find a fit republican; that the assistant postmaster-general laughed to scorn one of the chief party pledges under which he became a public officer, and was enthusiastically congratulated upon his contempt of the pledge by an organized association of members of the party, and that the whole postal service of the country has been reconstructed for party purposes? Senator Hiscock, of New York, to spur the senate to action upon the tariff, said that not to pass the tariff bill would be not only a violation of the most solemn party pledges, but it would be perfidy to a direct trust imposed upon congress by the voters in 1888. How was this trust imposed but by the result of the election? And how does the election impose the fulfillment of one promise and not another? How is the declaration in favor of civil service reform a less solemn pledge of the party, or a less direct trust imposed by the election upon congress, and how is it less perfidy for the President, the house and the postmaster-general and his assistant, deliberately to violate one solemn pledge of the platform than for the senate to disregard another?

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY NOT THE PARTY OF REFORM.

Why should not reasonable and intelligent men tell the truth frankly? The year has demonstrated incontestably that while the republican party, absolutely dominant in the administration, is a party of protection, it is not a party of civil service reform. Its careful and elaborate tariff declarations were sincere. They were intended to be the substance of the platform, because the republican leaders thought that Mr. Cleveland had thrown away the chance of the democratic party by his message of 1887, and they were sure that upon the issue of protection they could carry the country. But the republican platform declaration of 1884 upon civil service reform was reiterated in the same words in 1888, not as a cardinal article of party faith like the non-extension of slavery in 1860, or the unconditional prosecution of the war in 1864, or the measures of reconstruction in 1868 and 1872, but both as a bribe and a lure for independent voters. No sincere republican, I think, would say that the party and the platform in 1888 meant civil service reform in the same sense that they meant protection, or that they had meant the restriction of slavery in 1860. The political devastation of the post-office and other offices, which has been accomplished within nineteen months would have been impossible under a reform administration as the reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis under a protection administration. It is undeniable that in passing a tariff bill the republican party has kept its promise. It is equally undeniable that in the general partisan pillage of the civil service, the republican party has broken its promise.

CREDIT FOR WHAT HAS BEEN DONE.

This is not to say that nothing has been done, nor that the reform law has been either grossly violated or generally disregarded. It is only saying that the party can not honestly claim the confidence of civil service reformers. The law indeed, might have been repealed, as republican representatives in congress and republican journals have desired. But it is still a law. The commission might have been paralyzed, but it remains efficient and alert. Mr. Commissioner Roosevelt, whose fidelity and zeal can not be questioned, assures us that ninety-two per cent. of employees who were appointed in the classified service under the late democratic administration still hold their places, and that the law has been fairly enforced. Congress, also, after some republican opposition, has granted the commission five additional clerks, with salaries amounting to $6,600. The prompt protest of the League and of the friends of reform prevented the nullification of the rules by congress in the appointment of additional medical pension examiners, and some postmasters, upon urgent local requests, have been retained. McKinley, also, in the house, when arguing for the appropriation for the five clerks, declared that if his party is pledged to one thing more than another, it is to the civil service reform law, which, he added, "Is sustained by the best sentiment of the country, republicans and democrats alike." He was seconded by Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, who stated with force and lucidity the principles of reform. The New York Tri- bune, also the Philadelphia Press, Telegraph, Ledger and American, the Chicago Inter-Ocean, the Boston Journal and Worcester Spy, and other leading republican organs, vigorously advocated reform.

These are all very agreeable and very significant facts, for they show the steady rise of public opinion. But what I have stated is the total fulfillment during the year of the great promise of reform. There has been no increase of appropriation except for the five clerks, and congress has not yet acted upon any other of the recommendations made in the last report of the commission. There has been no pretence that the service has not been treated as spoils; there has been no repeal of the four years' laws or attempt to repeal them; there has been no enlargement of the classified service by executive or legislative action since the 30th of June, 1889. The number of persons embraced in the classified service is larger, perhaps, by three thousand than it was a year ago, but this is due wholly to the growth of the service previously classified, which now includes probably about 32,000 places. If this were the manner in which the republican promise of tariff revision and of an election law had been fulfilled, would the speaker of the house and the leader of its majority have celebrated with so joyful a hallelujah the thorough fulfillment of every party pledge and the sacred observance of the party promises? If private trustees had so executed a deed of trust would they have been proudly eager to call public attention to their performance?

The leader of the house and the republican journals which advocate reform in the abstract would hardly admit that the reform declarations of Mr. Cleveland and his secretary of the treasury, Mr. Fairchild, the appointment of Mr. Pearson, the fair enforcement of the reform law, and many other excellent acts of the late administration, with the strong support of many friendly papers, proved the democratic party to be a party of reform. They would be wholly justified. No intelligent man would venture such an assertion and certainly such facts do not prove it. But they prove it quite as much as some excellent appointments of President Harrison, and the fair enforcement of the reform law, and the frank declarations of Mr. McKinley, and Mr. Lodge, and the admirable articles of certain newspapers, prove the republican to be a party of reform. Of what avail, as such proof, are the words of Mr. McKinley against the contemptuous words and despoiling deeds of Mr. Clarkson? But is Mr. Clarkson denounced and repudiated by the republican press, by republican conventions, by republican orators? Mr. Butterworth in the house doubts for one brilliant moment the wisdom of certain details of the tariff bill; Mr. Plumb, in the senate prefers a lower tax on crockery; Mr. Halstead in the press doubts the timeliness and expediency of the election bill; Mr. Blaine himself is unable to see in the tariff bill visions of greedy foreign markets opening to the American farmer—and instantly the party heavens darken, in newspaper offices thunder of warning growls and the lightning of denunciation flashes, the lurid air resounds with the explosion of dreadful epithets, "renegade," "apostate," "traitor," "assistant democrat." The whole party is in an uproar; the hesitating heretics are warned to remember the solemn promises of the platform, the awful mandate of the country, and to pause shuddering but repentant upon the brink—which, when the vote is taken, they wisely do.

IS CLARKSON THE REPRESENTATIVE OF HIS PARTY?

But if one platform pledge be so vital and its least neglect or infringement so fatal, why not another? If Mr. Plumb be condemned as a deputy democrat, and Mr. Halstead branded as an apostate, and even Mr. Blaine rock in the doldrums of party doubt, not because of rejection or scorn of any party pledge, but merely because of difference of view as to the degree or method of applying an accepted party principle, why should Mr. Clarkson be feasted and cheered by fellow republicans after contemptuously rejecting a professed party principle, ruthlessly violating a party pledge, and at every cross-roads in the Union gaily posting his party as a liar? The reason is not that Mr. McKinley and Mr. Lodge and the party papers which I mentioned are playing false, but simply that they are playing. Republican organs called the republican tariff dissenters and republicans who would defer the passage of the election bill Benedict Arnolds, because the party is aggressively a party of high protection and of a national election law. But they do not call Mr. Clarkson Judas Iscariot because the party leaders generally, and their captains of hundreds and lieutenants of fifties, scorn civil service reform, and heartily approve and applaud Mr. Clarkson's course.

I said, three years ago, that, however worthy of respect and confidence for many reasons the democratic administration might be, this League did not regard it "as in any strict sense of the words a civil service reform administration." So I say now of its successor. It would be a great misfortune for the cause of reform if it were supposed that the League held certain excellent executive appointments, and the unqualified declarations of the leader of the house, and the strong expressions of some leading republican journals, and the retention of ninety-two per cent. of the employes in the classified service, which was equally true of the last administration, gratifying and encouraging as such signs undoubtedly are, to be a fulfillment of the republican pledge to observe the spirit and purpose of reform in all executive appointments, and to correct the dangerous evils of patronage. If it be said that the spirit and purpose of reform is a phrase of doubtful meaning, it is certainly a phrase no more doubtful than the American spirit and the spirit of liberty. However doubtful it may be, it is certain that it does not mean a practical clean sweep of the service, except that part included within the law. I ask any candid republican how many republican conventions this year, except in Massachusetts, have even remembered to mention reform, or how soon reform is likely to be achieved by the party at its present rate of progress? I ask him whether that party would ever have stayed the territorial devastation of slavery, have aroused the glorious enthusiasm of the American people, or have consumed our national sin in the fervid glow of patriotism, if it had been no more the party of liberty than it is of civil service reform? At the close of the war for the Union, when the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery was adopted, Mr. Garrison, president of the American anti-slavery society, declared that its object was accomplished, and proposed that the society be dissolved. When the republican party is in the act of making its pledge of civil service reform, like its pledges of protection and of an election law, an actual performance, if I am then still president of the League, I shall gladly entertain a motion for its dissolution.

HOPE FOR THE FUTURE.

But if I admit that the country is divided practically into two parties and that reform is not the present serious purpose of either of them, do I not concede a general and hopeless public indifference upon the subject? I answer that I concede only what is true of every reform at the beginning. "The first thing," said Alexander Hamilton, "in all great operations of such a government as ours is to secure the opinion of the people." Reformers make opinion, and opinion makes parties. First the abolitionists, then the republicans. Seven years ago the reform law was passed in a spasm of congressional terror from the reverse of the election. It did not represent mature public conviction, but it did show congressional consciousness of the drift of public opinion. This year the whole weight and character of the house refused to repeal the law, while its leader affirmed that the best sentiment of the country demanded reform. The house and the leader, indeed, were content with the affirmation and did not try to satisfy the demand. But so far opinion has ripened. The reformer who would despond because no party has yet adopted reform, would despair of day because the sun does not rise at dawn.

The opinions of thoughtful men, the convictions of the fireside and of the private citizens, affect very slowly party action. The American feels that he can act effectively only with a party, and it is one of the chief evils of the spoils system that reckless abuse of patronage, the most lavish and acknowledged corruption, have made party despotism so absolute that the conscience and intelligence of the country are largely enslaved by unprincipled ignorance and insolent cunning. Even public men are shy of their own consciences lest they should obstruct their own advancement. Like Lord Melbourne they are afraid that "this damned morality will ruin everything." Honest and patriotic citizens wince at the methods by which often candidates are nominated and hang their heads as they reluctantly vote for them, following ignoble leaders and strengthening public wrongs. Young men with the generous political ambition of their race burning to reach that lofty prize, the noble leadership of men, find to their dismay that the hard condition is bowing down to the hat of Gesler and losing their self-respect.

Civil service reform has the future because it means crushing this machine, overthrowing this tyranny, recovering political independence, and emancipating American citizenship. It means parties that stand for conviction, for self-respect in the public service, for political morality and honest government. It is not yet established for the same reason that slavery was not destroyed at once when its enormity was perceived and acknowledged. Like political corruption, slavery was entrenched in tradition, interest, ignorance, prejudice, possession, and only gradually did conviction ripen into purpose and private wish tower into indomitable public will. It was a dark shadow in which long and shamefully the country walked, its conscience wounded, its name disgraced. But the Union emerged in the clear light of liberty, and there is no American who would turn backward to the evil day. The same conscience, the same intelligence that at last overthrew slavery, now proposes with the same undismayed persistence to stay political corruption, and every sign shows that, like our brothers of the last generation, we, too, are walking toward the light.

THE RELATION OF CIVIL SERVICE REFORM TO OTHER REFORMS.*

For the past ten years our government has been and it still is engaged in a costly but indispensable work, that of restoring the national defenses by sea and land, grown dangerously obsolete, through the progress of military and maritime industries since the close of our civil war. The experience of this great undertaking has shown that a sufficient and appropriate plant must be first provided to afford a reasonable prospect of success in any form of mechanical construction on a large scale. To build good steamships and cast good guns we must have suitable shipyards and foundries: attempts to obtain the product without furnishing proper tools in the first instance have invariably resulted in disappointment: an inadequate plant means an imperfect output, short-lived at best, and of limited and uncertain efficiency while it lasts. That we should seek to make something first and to get the means of making it afterwards is a priori illogical: the same method has been proved by trial at once wasteful and ineffective.

It is the function of civil service reform to provide for all other reforms, whether legislative or administrative, in our polity, the necessary plant for their work. They can become realities only through the instrumentality of public men fit to mould them in a shape for lasting and practical utility and our politics for a generation's space before the growth of civil service reform had supplied no public men of this type, and can now supply only here and there one of them, a fruitful and promising but as yet infinitesimal leaven for the lump in which it is hidden. To suppose that the politicians who make up the great bulk of either house of congress will or can deal worthily with the problems presented by our tariff, our currency, our pension system—to ask that they and their humbler fellows in state legislatures and city councils should furnish remedies or even palliatives for public evils arising from the liquor traffic or from labor disputes is, to my mind, as irrational as to expect figs from thistles; to try to get such work out of such workmen is as if Secretary Tracy should order another Maine built on the same stocks and with the same materials that might furnish forth an old seventy-four.

This incapacity does not, however, arise from the undoubted fact that most of our public men are intellectually, or for want of education, incapable of understanding the merits or appreciating the importance of these questions. A very limited acquaintance with our legislative bodies leads me to think that these treat most satisfactorily the topics about which their members know and care the least, since they are then open to the influence of volunteer experts. When there is neither "money" nor "politics" in a proposed measure, the average American politician is a very fair legislator, provided that reputable citizens will take the trouble to tell him just what he should do. He is usually timid and patient, anxious (when it costs him nothing) to conciliate public opinion and accustomed to being bored: he repeats so constantly the party shibboleth that he may have half persuaded himself he believes that, but beyond it he has few prejudices and no opinions. He is therefore a good subject for judicious guidance, and, since he considers all enthusiasm as factitious and all professions as insincere as he knows his own to be, he is protected from the contagion of a visionary fanaticism. But in measures relating to the questions I have mentioned he finds always either "money" or "politics" or both, and in such case he is utterly wanting: wherever there may be some one able and willing to buy him, his sale depends only upon the amount and form of the price offered, and ex necessitate rei a would-be purchaser is found as soon as his public action begins to touch the pockets of wealthy or influential persons or classes, long accustomed to control legislation by systematic corruption. As an illustration, take the question of tariff reform. Whether the tariff should be based upon principles of free trade or of protection—that is to say, whether its aim should be primarily to produce the greatest revenue while imposing the least burden on those taxed, or to make some or all branches of productive industry in the country more profitable to those pursuing them—it is neither my province nor my purpose to discuss. Whichever principles we adopt, their application in modifying our present laws involves the sacrifice or advancement of powerful interests—powerful, because able to dispose of much money or many votes. A change in the laws can not at once meet the view of both producers and consumers of the article affected; it must inevitably injure pecuniarily one class or the other as individuals, although, of course, if wisely conceived, it may benefit both as members of the community. And although mere consumers make up usually a mass too amorphous and unwieldy to be conscious of its interests or able to defend them, inasmuch as the finished product of one industry constitutes, in numberless instances the raw material of another, a bitter strife and a keen competition for legislative favor between different groups of producers must attend any attempt to change, whether in one direction or the other, the existing provisions of our revenue laws, be these, as a matter of fact, wise or unwise, salutary or the reverse. The task demands real statesmanship and of no mean order: a veritable Serbonian bog of intrigue and bribery will be created if those who grapple with it have any but the highest standard of morality and honor. What, then, is their standard? It has been within a few months fairly enough defined by one of themselves.

"The purification of politics," says a senator of the United States, "is an iridescent dream. The decalogue and the golden rule have no place in a political campaign. The object is success. To defeat the antagonist and expel the party in power is the purpose. The modern cant about the corruption of politics is fatiguing in the extreme. It proceeds from the tea-custard and syllabub dilettanteism, the frivolous and desultory sentimentalism of epicenes." There is certainly nothing obscure or equivocal about this language; it expresses a theory of ethics which all can understand, and with which the world is unhappily familiar. Mutatis mutandis it might be echoed and is acted upon by every unfaithful servant or trustee, every dishonest trader, every habitual swindler, every common thief. All of these hold practically that "the decalogue and the golden rule have no place in" their trade, all consider that for them "the object" and the only object "is success," all find "cant" about their own corruption "fatiguing in the extreme," although I doubt whether either they or the senator object to this because it is insipid; it "fatigues" them because they know it is true. The man who uttered these words may not be a wholly normal specimen of professional politicians; comparatively few of these would publicly admit that in any field of thought or action they had just as much and just as little conscience as a brute; perhaps the majority would try to persuade themselves that they had more. It is unusual to find one to whom the sentiments natural to a man of integrity and honor have become so unfamiliar that he can not even see the practical advantage of counterfeiting them, who is not a hypocrite only because his utter want of sympathy with rectitude prevents his understanding that the simulation of rectitude may pay. But the words, themselves, if exceptionally candid, none the less describe with substantial truth the code of morals recognized more or less consciously by our politicians and logically resulting from the conditions of their business. When out of office "to...expel the party in power is the purpose" of their labors, not as a means, be it remembered, but as an end; not that they may thus gain something great for the country or for humanity, but that each one of them may gain something little for himself. "The object is success, to defeat the antagonist," but only that the victors may seize and enjoy his place; the use they will make of it is a wholly secondary consideration, or rather this is not considered at all; it goes without saying that they will use power when they have gained it, only to retain their hold on it as long as possible and to make all they can for themselves out of it meantime. And in their efforts to attain this end, efforts as purely selfish as the struggle of a carnivorous animal for his prey, moral restraints are unknown, and the promptings of patriotism, of charity, of self-respect, have no place. Any regard for the decalogue or the golden rule seems to them "dilettanteism" and "sentimentalism;" for "practical" men these are

"Words, mere words."

In plain English, then, the profession of politics, as understood by a spoilsman, is an essentially immoral profession, like the profession of a gambler or a confidence man. An honest man may enter it, but he must, sooner or later, cease either to be honest or to be a politician.

It is surely needless to speculate how those to whom one or another change in the tariff may mean wealth or ruin will treat men such as these. The saying is not of yesterday:

"In quorum manibus iniquitates sunt dextera eorum repleta est muneribus."

It will be more to the purpose if I point out that the character of our public men and the inducements wherewith alone they can be approached with reasonable hope of success by those seeking favors at their hands, explain the curious phenomenon, so often noted and lamented by tariff reformers, that they seem to have no idea of proportion in dealing with our industries, and often sacrifice one of them to advance the interests of another, although the latter may be utterly insignificant, both in amount of capital and in number of laborers employed, when compared with the former. Supposing legislative action inspired by a thought of the public good, such a course is, on any conceivable theory of political economy, inexplicable, but supposing such action to be inspired simply by some form of bribery, direct or indirect, is intelligible enough. Two or three men can corrupt more promptly and secretly, and with less risk of subsequent indiscretion and consequently more effectively and safely, than a score or a hundred can. A single capitalist, having nobody else to inform or consult as to his course, and able to tell with almost mathematical accuracy what profits will accrue to him from a given law when made, and how much he can therefore afford to invest in the requisite law making machinery, will have great advantages in his competition with a multitude of manufacturers scattered throughout the country and unaccustomed to act in concert, of whom each will usually seek to throw on others the burden of defending their common interest, and among whom there is danger, proportioned to their number, of finding some "epicene" too much affected by "tea-custard and syllabub" views of ethics to perceive the necessity of indulgence or even of discreet silence regarding the peculiar methods of modern American statesmanship.

I have used the tariff as an apt illustration, but what I have said applies with equal truth to our pension system or our currency, or any other subject of national concern in which there is room for gain or loss to individual interests. Conflicting theories about bimetallism or a single standard do not impede a rational solution for the silver question; the wealth and influence of our "silver kings" do; we should hear little enough about "dependent pensions" or "service pensions" if the would-be pensioners were few in numbers or had no votes. For I need hardly say that whether a man is bribed to vote against what in his best judgment he believes to be the public interest by so much cash in his own pocket or by the payment or promise or hope of cash for the party-treasury, or by the expectancy of thus getting offices or votes or help of any kind for himself or others, makes no manner of difference as to the moral question. A politician may as well, so far as his self-respect or his public utility is affected, be owned by a rich man or a rich corporation as by the Farmers' Alliance or the Knights of Labor or the Grand Army of the Republic; he is a bale of the same goods, whatever may be his trade-mark.

To rid our country thoroughly and once for all of these dangerous and noxious counterfeits of statesmen, and thus make room for the genuine article, which we produced in good measure a hundred years ago, we have only to do away with the incidents of public life which have arisen within those hundred years and made it no fit career for honorable men. Washington, Jefferson, and Adams, Patrick Henry and Alexander Hamilton grew up from another political soil from that which nourished the senator I have quoted; if we would have again among our rulers "epicenes" and "dilettanti" such as these we must "thoroughly purge" our meadows of that which has choked out the good wheat and give them over to tares and cockle. We must do away with the swinish scuffle for support at the taxpayers' cost which has become all that "politics" mean to the mass of our public men, and make a political campaign once more something in which the decalogue and the golden rule have a place. When we have done this—in other words, when we have practically applied the essential principles of civil service reform throughout our federal, state and municipal governments, we shall have again, as we had once, under the same conditions, men in public life able to consider in proposed changes of law more than the hopes they may arouse of personal or party gain. And when we have thus deserved such rulers and, by deserving them, obtained them, we may hope for those reforms which only their rule can give us. To ask that civil service reform wait while we reform the tariff or the currency, or anything else, is to ask that a surgeon cut out the tumor first and sharpen his knife afterwards, that a shipwright wait for his dockyard and meantime build his ship.

ALL OTHER REFORMS SHOULD BE SUBORDINATED TO CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.*

Our civil government, state and national, has developed into a huge boss system. The country is districted for boss purposes. The district of a boss is limited only by his limitations as a manipulator. With Quay and Gorman the district is a state; with the late John J. O'Brien, it was a single assembly district of New York; with Collector Nathan, it is the twenty-third ward of Brooklyn. No one will do violence to credulity by pretending that the bosses have any genuine political principles. A year ago, at the meeting of the League, it was said that "to promise or confer public office as a bait or reward for personal or party service is always and everywhere immoral; it is a breach of trust and a form of bribery." The truth of that statement can never be shaken.

*A paper read by Lucius B. Swift before the National Civil Service Reform League in Boston, October 2, 1890.

Yet it is by that immorality and by that bribery that the bosses thrive and increase in power and rule this nation. It is not necessary before this audience to show that their heel-marks cover the country. I only say that, well as we know them, we do not grasp the magnitude of a system whose outcroppings extend from the appointment of Meade as police justice in New York City, to Clarkson manipulating his 30,000 postmasters a year; and whose field reaches from the dog catcher to the governor, and from the elevator-boy to the President. If an executive or legislative office-holder is not a boss or the agent of a boss, he is a rare exception. In general there is spread over the country a tough network of township, city, county, state and national office-holders, standing to each other as principal or agent, master or man, boss or worker. Along with such evil government as we have, goes this vast exploitation of the offices for spoil. These are the ins, ready to catch at any issue, and say or do anything that will leave them masters of the offices. And, as has been stated many times, man for man and side by side with these are the outs, ready to catch at any issue and say or do anything that will in turn make them masters of the offices. The bribery is plain and simple, from the township trustee of the township embracing Indianapolis, paying with clerkships the small party hustlers who assisted him to election, to the President paying with marshalships and post-offices the men who voted for him in the nominating convention.

Our 65,000,000 of people have seen this going on at their very doors, until even the children knew without being told that if Smith succeeds, Jones, who has worked day and night for Smith's nomination and election, will get from Smith a clerkship. They know that this is to be Jones's pay and that he works for this contingent fee. At every four corners in our forty-two states the people for two generations have seen such bribes paid with state and federal offices.

I have said that we do not grasp the magnitude of the boss system; neither is it necessary for me to explain to you its strength; and yet, we do not realize its strength. In the twenty-odd years' struggle to uproot this system, some progress has been made. Nevertheless, it remains generally true that to retain or get the offices is the present object of our parties, in every field of operation; and the desire for this object is, with spasmodic exceptions, the regulator of American legislation, of American executive government, of the formulated opinions of American parties and public men, and of the exercise of political power. This is its strength.

HOW THE PEOPLE ARE FOOLED.

The bosses know, first, that they live by the offices, and second, that if the people once realize the evils of patronage they will take away the offices. The skill of the machine is therefore directed to diverting the attention of the people from this division and enjoyment of spoils. To this end, issues true or false are urged forward. For many years southern outrages, an issue which never did and never was intended to lead to any practicable measure, blinded the majority and enabled the republican machine to keep the offices. In Pennsylvania, to-day, Quay raises jeopardized protection like a wall close to the eyes of republicans to blind them to the criminal evil of himself as a man and of his literally feudal rulership of his state. For years the people of the state of Maryland, in a manner disgraceful to themselves, have permitted Gorman to keep his heel on their necks, solely by his control of the offices; and in every campaign when they might have overthrown him, he has blinded them by the cry that such a result would lead to national party disaster.

When a machine has fixed upon an issue as one which will enable it to succeed, it does not permit dissent. Mr. Randall is a notable instance. But to most party bosses an issue has only its expedient side, and when taken up by their party machine it never staggers those who may have been for years on the opposite side.

Some years ago Senator Voorhees made many speeches to show that the record of his party was misrepresented upon the tariff question—that it was and had been protection. Now Mr. Voorhees makes speeches proposing to hang the men who are profiting by protection. Again, Senator Gorman, the overlord of overlords, two years ago was a protectionist. To-day he is a tariff reformer. No one will ask us to believe that the merits of the tariff question had anything to do with this change of heart. Mr. Gorman read in the signs of the times that his party machine was against him, and that he must bring about this change if he would continue as the absolute party controller of offices in Maryland.

Thus, occasionally adjusting themselves to what they consider a minor demand, the bosses remain the controllers of the governmental spirit of the country, and they guide it skilfully away from acts which would undermine the only foundation upon which they stand or can stand—the use of the offices as spoil. If they think justice will hurt their party chances, they stop the course of justice. For instance, the guilt of Mahone's campaign fund clerks is clear and the evidence is ready. But they are not punished because the party bosses have the notion (a mistaken notion, to be sure), that punishment would weaken election chances. The eleventh hour indictment just decided upon proves my argument.

THE STEERING PROCESS.

They can not control the rise of discussion, but their skill, to a degree often consummate, is displayed in a steering process that permits a discussion to come to a beneficent end, or anchors it or wrecks it, according as it is necessary to avoid defeat at the polls, with the consequent loss of the offices. In our legislatures, if good legislation will help them, they pauper that much to the moral sentiment of the people. Any legislation which endangers them is blocked at any stage they desire. We have a late illustration. The bill to regulate elections was on the highroad to final passage. At a word from Quay, professed principles went to the winds and the bill was meekly laid aside.

While the bosses control the switches and brakes of the legislative road, it is useless to hope for legislation based upon business and patriotic principles. This is shown by the recent course and present condition of the tariff question. The prominent idea and discussion connected with the early administration of President Cleveland was in relation to the civil service. The antagonism of his party machine to the civil service reform views and acts of Mr. Cleveland was fully expressed in the Indianapolis Sentinel in November, 1886, which said: "The un-American policy he has pursued in dealing with the party and the partisans that elected him to office is the direct cause of the apathy of the party in so many sections of the country. He has done all he could to destroy the party organization. He has chilled the honorable ambition of young men and grievously abused the old leaders. Mr. Cleveland must either prove himself a democrat in the remaining years of his administration or prepare to meet emphatic repudiation by his party."

With this threatening attitude the bosses of his party confronted Mr. Cleveland until he brought forward the tariff issue, upon which the bulk of them seemed willing to unite, and he took the first step by a message to congress devoted exclusively to that subject. To thus state this great change, and at the same time to say that defeat was expected upon the tariff issue, is an incongruity.

The second step to divert meddlesome attention from the division of spoil was the Mills bill, a step guided by the unseen power of the bosses. The intention was to frame a bill upon which they could carry the country, and the result may be called a measure with free trade leanings for republican communities and protective leanings for democratic communities. It was a fortunate thing for civil service reform that this attempt to shelve it was punished by defeat. Any other result would have left this cause discredited, too weak even for the contempt of the bosses, and alive only in the half dozen places where "local option" might permit the law to be enforced.

The republican machine, in its turn, has elaborated a tariff bill such, and no other, as it believes will help its election chances. The tables are turned. We have protection for republican districts, and free trade for democratic districts.

If it were not so serious, all this would be laughable as the play of children or fools. In fact, it is a mockery of government. It is but stating the commonest principle of government to say that any legislation touching our present tariff should be the result of the unbiased investigation and report of skilled men. Yet such statement only emphasizes the chimerical quality of the hope of such legislation under the boss system. And the same is true generally. The enactment of our public laws is advocated with the halting advocacy caused by the skeleton in the party closet—the fear of losing the spoil of office. Those interested in all questions which relate to the currency, to taxation, to the regulation of the liquor traffic, to our great Indian trust, or which cluster around the cause of labor, or any other subject arising with a progressive people, have found, and will find that the measure of relief granted is gauged by its supposed effect upon the continued power of the Quays and the Gormans over the spoil of office.

THE PREY OF THE BOSSES.

With their power well in hand as they have had it for years, the bosses prey upon all they help or can harm. Formerly the Indianapolis post-office paid $1,200. In 1888 the pension office in that city was called upon for $600, part of which was collected in violation of law. In that year the Indiana republican candidate for reporter of the supreme court paid $2,250. The candidates for the judgeships of the courts sitting at Indianapolis are each regularly assessed $500 upon a salary of $2,500. In larger cities and offices all over the country these figures are many times multiplied, and when these sums are again multiplied by the number of state and national offices which still pay assessments, the result shows a startling sum of money to be devoted to the perpetuation of the buccaneering power which extorts it. Great moneyed interests can be helped or hurt by boss legislation. Jay Gould gave his check for $50,000 to the late John J. O'Brien to the use of the O'Brien machine, and Mr. Wanamaker, then a new recruit to the machine, suggested that the Northern Pacific Railway should help the campaign of 1888 with $100,000.

With the money thus gathered, the bosses in the struggle for the offices leave their mark in the shape of 20,000 floaters in Indiana, and in like proportion in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and other states.

Our boss system of officeholders, with its paramount boss and a graded line of under-bosses, has thus become a quasi-feudal system, without the romance or the courtesy or the honor of feudalism. It is the footpad in armor. It uses various interests for its own ends and lets itself for hire to various interests. Destroy it and leave every reform and every interest standing alone, and spontaneous discussion, followed by the untrammelled action of the people, will reward every agitation with that result to which the civilization of the country entitles it.

Therefore I say that the destruction of the spoils system ought to regulate individual political effort. Not that other reforms may not have sympathy and support. But in every case there comes a time when the roads part. Then there can be no compromise, no hesitation. The pursuit of these bloodsuckers upon all our civil government should be relentless. To cease this attack at any point and unite with this common enemy with the hope of benefiting some other object is to strengthen the common enemy and fill him with joy. Such deviation prolongs the unequal struggle on our hands and does not accomplish its object.

Our cause has suffered and is in danger of suffering from such deviation in a single case only; but that is a case of such magnitude as to cause concern and call for protest. I refer to the number of thinking and distinguished men who are entirely with us in opinion, but who would now lay aside civil service reform on behalf of, or would now subordinate it to effort for a modification or abolition of, the tariff. They are certainly mistaken. It was useless that they joined their clean-handed effort with such efforts as the use of the offices to break down the refractory protectionist Congressman Randall, and with the wholesale subsidy of the western press, and with the use of the pension bureau as a political machine, and with the use of the civil service as a trip-hammer to help one-half of the people strike the other. The means do not justify the end. Civil service reform wars against such weapons, no matter in what hand or cause.

Deviation from it now but helps to raise up more bosses and strengthen the boss system. The congressman from the Indianapolis district is a typical instance. He has ability, and in trying circumstances he has displayed the highest skill in unscrupulous manipulation of the offices. He is the enemy of the merit system. His issue is tariff modification. To follow him upon that issue is to help build up a man who might become to Indiana what Platt is to New York, Mahone to Virginia, Quay to Pennsylvania and Gorman to Maryland. The thought is intolerable. And yet I submit that the advocacy of tariff modification, as it is now offered, gives no satisfactory reward and actually helps the bosses to obscure civil service reform and extend their own rule. And the poison of office—exploitation for spoil—is left with increased virulence to course its way through every hamlet, town and city in all the states of this Union. It ruins public morals. It is the destroyer of nations. No man can look at our national, state and city governments and deny that it is the crying evil of our time. The call to destroy it rings in the ears of every man who loves his country. Our faces should be always towards it, and our hands should be always against it.

NOTES OF THE DISCUSSION.

[From the Boston Journal and the Boston Post.]

At the conclusion of the reading of Mr. Swift's paper, Mr. R. Francis Wood, of Philadelphia, moved that Mr. Bonaparte's and Mr. Swift's papers be printed. Mr. Everett P. Wheeler, of New York, moved as an amendment that the papers be printed separately, and Mr. Wood accepted the amendment. He must take exceptions to some of Mr. Swift's statements, and did not think that they should be sent forth entire as expressing the views of the league. He must take exception to the statements made therein, which he thought was in error, that President Cleveland's tariff message was put forth in response to the demands of the party bosses. Secretary Fairchild had told him, the speaker, that what led to the writing of the message, and the equally noticeable report of the secretary of the treasury, which accompanied it, was their absolute conviction of the necessity of the immediate presentation of that question to the country. Mr. Wheeler vigorously denounced the use of money in elections, and in the bribery of committees and legislators. The league should aim to do away with this evil as heartily as it did to abolish the evil of party patronage. The league should not confine its work to one branch of reform.

Winslow Warren, Esq., of Boston, said that while he agreed with much that Mr. Bonaparte and Mr. Swift had said, he could not agree with it all. He could not agree with Mr. Bonaparte in his laudation of the political methods of Hamilton and others of the old leaders in comparison with those of the leaders of to-day. Neither could he agree with Mr. Swift that the Mills bill or the McKinley bill, abominable as he thought the latter, was devised for the purpose of shelving, or meant the shelving, of civil service reform. We should be averse to having all the views expressed in those papers go forth as an official expression of the views of the league.

Col. Charles R. Codman, of Boston, said that if he had understood Mr. Swift aright he had declared that civil service reform was of such transcendent importance that the members of the league must abandon all the other great reforms of the day.

Mr. Swift interrupted at this point to say that his position had evidently been misunderstood. His position was that when civil service reformers came to a point where the road parted between an advocacy of civil service reform and any other reform, they should choose the former.

Col. Codman resuming, said that if the league should take the position that civil service reform was of transcendent importance, the only consistent course for its members to take would be to form a third political party and be civil service reformers, first, last, and all the time, as the prohibitionists were prohibitionists first, last and all the time.

Mr. Wheeler moved that the whole matter of printing the papers be referred to the executive committee, with instructions to print, and authority to prepare the papers, with the statement that the league did not indorse them.

President Curtis thought such action would be establishing a most unfortunate precedent; it would look as though the league were putting forth a disclaimer. He did not believe that the league, in printing his own annual addresses before it in its proceedings, deliberately adopted in advance all the views embodied in it. If he did think so, he should certainly feel very much constrained in the preparation of those addresses.

Sherman S. Rogers, Esq., of Buffalo, hoped Mr. Wheeler's motion would not prevail. The mere printing of the papers did not place upon them the league's imprimatur. He was not quite sure how far he should follow Mr. Swift, but he thought very far, even so far as to hold that civil service reform was of paramount importance.

Richard H. Dana, Esq., moved as an amendment that the papers be printed so that the members of the league might have an opportunity to consider the opinions of the authors therein so ably expressed.

Mr. Bonaparte said that he should feel the same embarrassment as the president if his paper were to be taken as an official expression of the views of the league.

Henry J. Richmond, Esq., of Buffalo, supported Mr. Dana's amendment.

President Curtis interrupted to ask why, if the president's address were not to be prefaced with the statement that the league was not responsible for the views in it, the paper read by any member of the League should be so prefaced.

Mr. Richmond replied that there was a great difference between the president and an humble private in the ranks like himself. He suggested that hereafter the annual printed proceedings be prefaced with the statement that the league must not be held responsible for the views therein contained. Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Dana both accepted this amendment.

Mr. George Fred Williams, of Dedham, said he should be very much opposed to having Mr. Swift's views, or some of them, go forth to the world as those of the league or his own. Mr. Swift's statement in regard to Mr. Cleveland's object in putting forth his tariff message was to shelve civil service reform. That, he understood, was merely Mr. Swift's inference. But he, the speaker, knew it was wholly false.

Mr. Myers moved as an amendment that the addresses be printed and that the question of prefixing them with any explanation be referred to the executive committee, with full power to deal with it as they deemed fit. This amendment was accepted by Messrs. Wheeler and Dana, but was lost.

Mr. Wheeler said the printing of the papers without some such explanation as indicated would cause grave trouble in New York.

President Curtis said that certainly no man in his senses would accept Mr. Swift's statement as to the origin of Mr. Cleveland's tariff message as being the view of the league.

The result of the long discussion was the adoption of the following motion: That the executive committee be directed, in preparing papers for publication hereafter, to prefix a note or statement to them to the general effect that the league is not responsible for the views therein expressed.

THE RESOLUTIONS.

[The committee on resolutions were George William Curtis, Charles J. Bonaparte, Edward Carey, Henry H. Sprague and Lucius B. Swift.]

The National Civil Service Reform League, in common with all citizens who desire the overthrow of the great and perilous evil known as the spoils system, congratulates the country that the attempt to nullify the reform law during the present session of congress was decisively defeated in the house of representatives; that the law was defended by distinguished and able members of both political parties, and that the leader of the majority of the house declared that his party was pledged to nothing more than to civil service reform, which, he said truly, was sustained by the best opinion of both parties, republicans and democrats alike.

The League gladly recognizes the fact that about thirty-two thousand places in the public service are now filled upon free and fair competition by merit alone; while Commissioner Roosevelt gives public assurance that 92 per cent. of clerks so appointed under the late administration have been retained under the present administration.

The League records with satisfaction the wholesome precedents of the action of the attorney-general of the United States in sustaining, after long controversy, the civil service commission, and in causing the revocation of appointments made in defiance of the reform law; and the indictment, although after long delay, by the grand jury of the district of Columbia of the president and treasurer of a political club in Washington for soliciting political contributions from government employees. With equal satisfaction, the league recalls the success of the friends of reform in frustrating an attempt in congress to evade the reform law by securing the appointment of pension examiners without the prescribed examination.

The league regards the complete, forcible and comprehensive explanation and defence of the principles, operation and results of reform which was made by the national civil service commission before the committee of investigation of the house of representatives, as a great and timely public service, for which the commission is entitled to public gratitude. It again congratulates the country upon the admirable choice of civil service commissioners made by the present administration; a selection the merit of which has been demonstrated by the ability and efficiency with which they have performed the duties of their office; and the league mentions with pleasure, as a sign of the progress of public opinion, the unqualified advocacy of the principles of reform by many of the leading journals of both national parties in the country.

Whilst according to the national administration the amplest credit for whatever advance may have been made in the practical application of civil service reform to the conduct of public business, it is nevertheless our duty to again remind the country of the pledges made by the successful party at the last presidential election, and to note how far these pledges have been kept.

The pledges of the party of administration were, first, that reform of the civil service, already auspiciously begun, should be completed by further extension of the reformed system to all grades of the service to which it is applicable; second, that the spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive appointments; third, that all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed.

These pledges have been disregarded; the reformed system has not been extended; not only have not the spirit and purpose of reform been observed in all executive appointments, but they have been often and gravely violated; that laws at variance with reform legislation have not been repealed, nor has there been any proposition for their repeal.

Against this practical contempt of pledges the league records its unqualified protest.

The arbitrary removal of postmasters for no other cause than their political opinions or party affiliations, resulting in a partisan devastation of an important branch of the public service, is a breach of faith with the country and a grave offense against pure politics and the interests of an efficient public service.

The league holds that the important duty of taking the census should have been committed to officers selected because of their fitness, and with no regard to political or partisan considerations, and it sees in the general dissatisfaction throughout the country with the results of the census a logical consequence of disregard of these principles.

While holding that the power of removal should be vested in appointing officers subject only to a sound discretion, the league also holds that no opportunity for changing the public service which is not political, for partisan reasons should be permitted. It therefore urges all friends of reform to press upon public attention and on congress the repeal of the laws prescribing fixed terms of office, which were designed to facilitate partisan charges without the odium of express and positive removal.

Places which are not political and which are filled by appointment should be vacated, except by death or resignation, only by the deliberate act of responsible appointing officers, after fair opportunity of explanation or denial of charges, and, in order that such officers may be held strictly to their responsibility, the widest publicity should be given to removals, and such officers should be required by law publicly to record the reason for removals made by their authority.

The experience of Boston and Cambridge has proved the entire practicability of extending the system of selection by merit to the labor service of those cities, and in view of the renewal of our coast defenses and of the reconstruction of our navy, the league recommends the application of the same system to the selection of laborers in the national navy yards, and the extension of the examinations to all other positions in the navy yards to which they are applicable, and it renews its recommendation for a similar extension of the merit system to the Indian service.

As a measure of relief from one of the worst and most widely diffused abuses of the spoils system, the league approves the principles and object of the bill introduced in congress during the present session to regulate the appointment of fourth-class postmasters, by causing their selection to be made upon business principles and without regard to political interests and opinions.

The league reaffirms its unswerving fidelity to the American and democratic principle of the equal right of every citizen to seek and to compete on equal terms for appointment to office without the necessity of asking aid from party friends or political leaders.

The practicability and benefit of civil service reform have been amply and conclusively demonstrated, and as the necessity of reform was never more urgent, the league declares that, in the interest of honest government, of the freedom and purity of the ballot and of the overthrow of political corruption, it will prosecute with unflagging energy its appeal to that matured opinion of the American people which steadily and happily reforms every abuse that menaces the welfare of the republic.

God give us men! a time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands;

Men whom the lust of office can not kill:

Men whom the spoils of office can not buy;

Men who possess opinion and a will;

Men who have honor, men who will not lie;

Men who can stand before a demagogue

And damn his treacherous flatterings without winking;

Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog.

In public duty and private thinking.

THE election in Massachusetts will greatly strengthen congress in the matter of sincere believers in civil service reform, a large number of its new members from that state having been for years open advocates of the reform. We may now expect aggressive movement and that the democratic house will be powerfully urged to pass the bill regulating the appointment of fourth class post-masters, and to repeal the four years' tenure act, and to give the civil service commission liberal financial support.

THE result of the recent election in Pennsylvania is the most magnificent victory that has been gained since the beginning of the struggle to break down the spoils system. That system had reached its final development in that state. The situation of affairs with Quay and the government of Pennsylvania was not widely different from the situation after Rome had conferred the tribunitian power upon its boss for the time being. This was to a great extent realized in Pennsylvania, and Quay's inability to answer to the charge of embezzlement merely brought the matter to a focus. The reformers, with a boldness that can not be too highly commended, undertook to convince the people of Pennsylvania that they must decide whether they would rule themselves or be ruled by one man because he controlled the federal and state patronage. This issue was never departed from, and upon it the reformers accomplished the almost incredible feat of changing 80,000 majority to 17,000 the other way. Surely after this it may everywhere be felt that in a righteous cause no majority is too great to be overcome. After Mahone and Quay one wonders where the administration will next use the patronage to carry an election. To have rendered the least help to the result in Pennsylvania will always be a satisfaction. The names of the great leaders in the movement will always be held in grateful remembrance, and not the least satisfactory part of the result is the high grade of intelligence shown by the people of the state in grasping and mastering the situation.

THE effort to redeem New York from Tammany failed disastrously. The facts of the corrupting influences of this organization were widely spread, and there appeared to be against it strong and irresistible elements. But there were too many like Mr. Astor whose reply to a request for help was: "Regret, am free from all political interests." The only depressing thing about such a failure is that the burden of really patriotic, unselfish citizens becomes greater. These have to carry a weight of timid and selfish people who quickly seize upon any excuse to stop a troublesome and disagreeable contest. But the municipal league does not intend to quit the good war, and probably in spite of himself Mr. Astor and his kind will enjoy in the future the pleasant results of their work. Above all things it is to be hoped that those patriotic clergymen who believe that the decalogue has a place in New York City government will not be dismayed, but will keep on helping.

MR. FOULKE ought to be a shining example to citizens like Mr. Astor, that is, on the supposition that they are interested enough to know what Mr. Foulke is doing. He is a thoroughly equipped guard for the civil service reformers of the country. He stops at Washington, where the spoilsmen are thickest and noisiest, and he keeps track of what they are doing and promptly calls attention to them when they are operating any little schemes for the division of spoil. The Civil Service Reformer for November has a report of an interview he had with Postmaster-General Wanamaker, which the latter must find unpleasant reading. Mr. Porter has recently found Mr. Foulke a tough adversary to tackle regarding his political census. What Mr. Foulke has done as chairman of the committee to investigate the operations of the civil service is well known to readers of this paper.

THE Indiana Civil Service Reform Association is in need of funds for the distribution of documents and for carrying on a correspondence over the state. There has long been the plan of preparing an especial appeal to the clergy of the state to lend their aid in the effort against the spoils system, but to print and mail such an address would require several hundred dollars. If those who believe in the objects of the Association, would assist in increasing its membership, they would thereby materially increase its power of usefulness. As an instance, the other day six people in New Albany were suggested as in sympathy with civil service reform. At the first request three joined the state association. A slight individual effort by members over the state would add hundreds to the membership.

CAUSES OF DEFEAT.

Within the field of this paper there were powerful elements which contributed to the results of the recent elections. The course of the administration made the reform element indifferent or hostile. This was the only source from which it could expect strength outside of its regular partisans. This was the most effective aid to President Cleveland when he was elected, and four years later nearly its whole strength was given with enthusiasm and success to President Harrison. The outrageous treatment of Postmaster Pearson followed, to be supplemented later by the turning out of Col. Burt, Mr. Graves, Collector Saltonstall and others of the same stamp. The administration turned in to help Mahone put Virginia under his heel. A reasonable request to provide for a non-partisan selection of census employes was refused and that important work was put into the hands of 60,000 party hacks, who have taken a census which has not and never will have the confidence of the country. Headsman Clarkson was allowed and encouraged to remove postmasters at the rate of thirty thousand a year. The Indian service has been disgracefully used as spoil and the Indian Rights Association, which has a better knowledge of the needs of the Indians than the administration itself, has been treated by the administration with insult and contempt. Officers have been removed upon secret charges without being allowed to know the charges. The boss system was encouraged on every hand. In Indiana it was Michener, chairman of the state republican committee; in Texas it was men like the negro collector Cuney; in New York it was Tom Platt. The crowning disgrace was Quay, in Pennsylvania, controlling every federal office, and who led two cabinet officers, Wanamaker and Blaine, by the nose into the state to make speeches for him. Assessments of office-holders went unpunished and unchecked. The McFarlands, the Bagbys and the Ransdells, though wholly unworthy, were kept in the service. Office-holders were encouraged to interfere in the campaign. Commissioner Raum, who is believed by the great majority of the people to have compromised himself with pension attorneys until he is unfit to retain his office, was sent out, in apparent willful defiance of public opinion to make campaign speeches. The increased majority of Congressman Cooper is a fitting answer, and is in part due to this very thing. The Indiana district attorney was permitted to remain in office after he had publicly declared that Dudley's proposed plan for taking care of the floaters evinced only a patriotic interest in the elections. If the administration can do any worse it has two years yet in which to do it. If it means to do any better it has no time to lose.

The President has divided spoil as it was never divided before. Never before has so much been given out for personal or party service in the same length of time. Yet the seekers of spoil are not his friends. They dislike him and they hope he will not be re-nominated. The chief duty of the President is to manage the civil service, and always excepting the work which comes within the field of the civil service commission, it must be said that President Harrison has been so far a failure. When he looks at his feats with Mahone and Quay and the rest, he must admit this to himself. President Cleveland was a very similar failure, and when elections in 1886 indicated to him the tone of the people, he did not heed it but got farther away from the whole subject of civil service reform. Will President Harrison do likewise or will he now bring himself to realize that his one great work is to get the spoils system out of the civil service. If he would give his next two years to an unrelenting fight against the spoils system, he would at least go out of office at the end of his term with the respect of the people.

CLARIFIED VIEWS.

The writer has been turning over the pages of the Civil Service Record from 1886 to 1888, and his conclusion is that no where has civil service reform advanced more than among civil service reformers. Examine the report of the civil service commission on the Philadelphia post-office, where upon finding that there are no applicants for examination, except among those of the postmaster's own politics, the commission, like a Greek chorus, helplessly says: "Partisan prejudice, created by a partisan press for party purposes, keeps democrats out of the civil service examinations when the republican party is in power and keeps republicans out when the democratic party is in power," and further, "When the law shall have been accepted in good faith by both the great political parties, and appointing officers shall all, by official word and act, declare their determination to execute it faithfully, there will be no longer question of the unpartisan operation of examinations for the classified civil service."

Such helplessness seems to-day absurd. Judged by the inquiry sent out by Mr. Cushing for Mr. Wanamaker, asking:

Why should not both parties discard all their insincere professions for the law, and have the patriotism to go back to the old system?

the law has not yet been accepted in "good faith." But a commission with Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Thompson on it does not have to wait for a change of heart with the Wannamakers and Clarksons. A request through the public press for applicants to come forward for examination without reference to politics, and the promise of fair treatment brings the applicants of all political opinions. When the southern states do not have the quota of appointments to which they are entitled, because they have not furnished enough applicants for the eligible lists, this difficulty is solved in the same downright and simple fashion. Southern editors and congressmen are urged to use their influence to induce people from these states to try the examination. The request is successful.

A timid, irresolute commission is always a contingency, but the great body of believers in civil service reform the country over, will not again acquiesce in the notion that the spirit of the reform law can not be secured until the politicians are converted, and that the civil service commission has no sphere but to record what they see and hear, and be humbugged and bullied by politicians.

Again, examine an address before the Massachusetts reform club in April, 1887, by Dr. William Everett, a sincere friend of civil service reform. It reads to-day like some of those curious whig documents before the war on the slave question. Dr. Everett spoke for a large number of civil service reformers, when he said, "We must stop weighing the President in a perpetual pair of scales, and weighing him against every new appointment to see whether he goes up or down, or hangs in equilibrio."

* * * It is not my intention to defend all the President's appointments. * * * What I look to is that, while some civil service reformers feel disappointed, and are answering "no" to my question, "whether the cause has received all the co-operation from Mr. Cleveland that we had a right to expect," the spoilsmen all over the country, of both parties, feel much more disappointed; and they are grumbling all the time that he has done so much for us, while some of us are whining, shall I say, because he has done so little. * * * Moreover, there is no doubt he gives his own personal attention to appointments more than any President has done for years. * * * But if on the other hand, you do trust President Cleveland, you must trust him entirely. You must see him remove and appoint according to his best judgment, without threatening to withhold your trust if the next removal and the next appointment do not suit you."

Dr. Everett, in his recent spirited campaign in Massachusetts, did not follow his own prescription, and it is well for the progress of civil service reform that the fog of 1887 has lifted about him. Nor was any such advice given by those who believe that with all his shortcomings President Harrison has done for civil service reform more than did his predecessor in this, that he has given the country the best civil service commission it has ever had, which is not disputed, and that for the first time, through the influence of this commission, there have been comparatively few dismissals traceable to politics from the competitive service, and many applicants of all politics have come for examination and received appointments in it. But no one, because of this, says to-day that therefore we must trust the President "entirely." No one disputes the unpopularity of the present executive with the spoilsmen, nor that their rumblings and grumbings exceed those of the civil service reformers. The New York Times of November 21 contains the following in its report of a meeting of a republican county committee to discipline somebody for the paucity of patronage:

The claim has been made repeatedly that too many democrats were kept in office at the custom house, the post-office, and elsewhere. With some men it has been the popular thing to "growl" at Collector Erhardt because he did not appoint more republicans to office. When Mr. Erhardt's friends pointed out that the civil service laws were in the way, the hungry hosts only grew hungrier still and cried louder for office than ever.

But nobody is found to repeat Dr. Everett's sophistry that therefore the President is doing all he can and more than we should expect for reform. Again, no one disputes that President Harrison has gone into the matter of giving his personal consideration to appointments to a degree greater even than his predecessor, and that his health has suffered, but no one now regards that as any palliative for using public offices to pay personal or party debts.

These are some of the many encouraging signs of the chill and refreshing breeze that has, in the last four years, relieved us of much cant as to how much political morality is due from a public man; and it is well to acknowledge our debt in this respect to Senator Ingalls. The shock of his bold declaration that the decalogue has no place in politics was the thing that brought home to many honest people the fact that unconsciously they had been judging men in public life by a different code from that applied to other people and in which the decalogue did not have the place of honor.

One thing is certain, whoever the next president, he will not be judged according to Dr. Everett's standard of 1887. He will not be trusted entirely. Nor will he be judged by what he finds it convenient as a politician to do to redeem the country from spoils and bosses. He will be judged by what he actually does for civil service reform, measured by what remains to be done. Civil service reformers, for the first time, in fighting Quay, learned the meaning of taking the public entirely into their confidence, making all their protests public and permitting no private explanations and excuses from a chief executive who may secretly have sympathized with them, while at the same time he was unwilling to brave the consequences of the vengeance of a great boss. Whoever the next president, he must expect every appointment and every dismissal to be examined by the facts at hand in the various communities; he will not, uncriticised, "remove and appoint according to his best judgment." He will not be treated as an all-wise, all-beneficent dictator, but as a president subject, from the very fact of having been successful in getting elected, to many entangling alliances, and as, therefore, a proper subject for vigilant watchfulness. If he hobnobs with Quays and Gormans, or if he wears the imperial robes while they parcel out the spoils of conquest, the wrath of his fellow-citizens will fall upon him in the same increasing proportion that it fell upon President Harrison's for his alliance with Quay, over what fell upon President Cleveland for his alliance with Gorman.

FOURTH REPORT

Of the Special Committee of the National Civil Service Reform League.

REMOVALS UPON SECRET CHARGES.

To the Executive Committee of the National Civil Service Reform League:

Your special committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the federal service and the operation of the reform law, would respectfully submit the following report as to the system of removals of presidential postmasters upon secret charges:

Out of 356 answers received to our questions whether or not any cause for removal was given to the man removed, it appeared that in only 47 cases was such cause assigned, in 10 cases the matter was disputed, and in 299 cases it appeared, from uncontradicted statements, that the incumbent was removed without any cause being given for his removal. In a very large number of cases he solicited information from the post-office department as to the character of the charges; but this information was almost invariably refused. If he ever learned what the charges were, he learned it by private inquiry from other sources, generally from hearsay and rumor merely. In many instances the new appointee, in answer to our inquiry as to the causes of the removal, while declining to state these causes himself, refers us to written charges on file in the department. As Mr. Wanamaker tells us that "all papers in appointment cases have invariably been deemed privileged and confidential with the department," and as the postmasters themselves are refused access to the charges upon which they are removed, but little can be done to lift the veil which conceals these secret accusations.

The following instances are submitted.

William Wilson writes in regard to his removal from the post-office at Chadron, Neb.:

I immediately wrote President Harrison that I only asked the privilege and right of an American citizen—that is, to defend myself; that, if there were any charges against me, I would like to have an opportunity to answer them. In reply I received the following (copy):

"Mr. William Wilson, Chadron, Neb.:

"DEAR SIR—The President directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, and to inform you that it has been referred to the Hon. Postmaster-General, to whom all further communications upon the subject should be addressed.

"Very respectfully yours,

"ELIJAH W. HALFORD, Private Secretary."

I was never able to hear from the Hon. Postmaster-General or any one else.

Jas. A. McKenna, postmaster at Long Island City, N. Y., was removed and no cause stated. On Sept. 6, 1889, he wrote to the first assistant postmaster-general as follows:

UNITED STATES POST-OFFICE,
LONG ISLAND CITY, QUEENS CO., STATE OF NEW YORK.
September 6, 1889.

Hon. J. S. Clarkson, First Assistant Postmaster-General,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR—In the New York Tribune of August 27 there is quoted an interview with you, in which you are made to say that "the department was in constant receipt of complaints against Postmaster McKenna, some of them being of a serious character, and clearly proving careless management of the office.

Inasmuch as the President has seen fit to remove me from my position as postmaster of Long Island City, these charges will be a serious injury and drawback to me in any business I may now be obliged to take up, and, as I am not conscious of any dereliction of duty, I respectfully request that I may be allowed to inspect the charges referred to, or may be allowed to have a copy thereof, in order that I may submit an answer to the same, not hoping for retention in office, but to clear my future from a cloud that might otherwise rest over it. I have never heard of any charges against me, except as stated in the above interview; and I assume it is not the intention or desire of the President to have me leave my office under unfounded charges.

Very respectfully,

JAS. A. MCKENNA,

Postmaster L. I. City.

The only answer he ever received to his communication was the letter of which the following copy was sent to us:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.
OFFICE OF THE
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
WASHINGTON, Sept. 7, 1889.

DEAR SIR—In the absence of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of the 6th inst., which will receive his attention on his return, in about a week.

Respectfully yours,

COKER CLARKSON, Private Secretary.

JAS. A. MCKENNA, Esq., Postmaster, Long Island City, N. Y.

Elijah Ratnour, former postmaster, of Weeping Water, Neb., wrote to the assistant postmaster-general, asking the cause of his removal, of which he had not been informed. The following is sent to us by him as a copy of the answer received:

Yours of Nov. 23, 1889, received, asking the cause of your removal. When your successor receives his commission, turn the office over to him without further notice.

Yours truly,

J. S. CLARKSON, First Assistant P. G.

Mr. Butler, his successor, informs us that the causes assigned for Mr. Ratnour's removal "are on file with the President."

Jacob Van Riper was postmaster at Rutherford, N. J. He was removed, and wrote to the President asking what charges, if any, had been preferred against him. The receipt of his letter was acknowledged by the President's private secretary on July 10, 1889, and he was informed that it had been referred to the postmaster-general. He obtained no further information as to the cause of his removal.

Henry S. Farnum was removed from the post-office at Uxbridge, Mass., on November 20, 1889, as he understood, upon the report of Inspector Stoddard, and his successor, Crysis T. Scott, was appointed by recommendation of Congressman Walker. Judge A. A. Putnam wrote to the postmaster-general as follows: "I do very respectfully request of the department that Mr. Farnum be permitted to know for what specific cause or causes his removal from office was recommended, and, to the end that justice be done him, and the state of facts bearing upon the matter of his removal be made apparent to the people of this town, he should be permitted to meet whatever charges may have been made impugning his integrity or competency." No information was furnished.

D. W. Pratt, postmaster at Farmington, Me., removed Dec. 18, 1889, writes: "I wrote the Postmaster-General last December, asking him what law I had violated. He acknowledged the receipt of my letter, but has never answered it."

Harry C. Evans was removed as postmaster at Bloomfield, Ia., and when Congressman Walter J. Hays inquired on his behalf the reasons for the removal, an answer is returned of which Mr. Evans sends us the following copy:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 3, 1890.

MY DEAR SIR—In response to your letter of January 30, asking to be advised "what, if any, charges were made against H. C. Evans, late postmaster at Bloomfield, Ia., as basis of his removal," I would say that the change was made on statements of reliable people in Bloomfield for the improvement of the postal service. It seemed a pretty clear case; and I would be glad to send you the statements, except that they were made by private citizens and in a confidential manner. The fact that Mr. A. H. Fortune, previous postmaster in the same city, was removed by President Cleveland before the expiration of his term, no doubt had something to do with the eagerness of the republicans in Bloomfield to replace Mr. Evans with a republican postmaster. I know personally the persons making the complaints, and was satisfied of the truth of their statements; and I presume it was largely on my assurance as to the sufficiency of these statements that the almost invariable rule adopted by the present administration of sending an inspector to verify such statements was not followed in this case. Very truly yours,

J. S. CLARKSON, F. A. Postmaster-General.

HON. WALTER I. HAYES, M. C., Washington, D. C.

A. H. W. Carpenter, postmaster at New Bedford, Mass., addressed to the postmaster-general the following letter:

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., April 26, 1889.

SIR—Having learned through Mr. L. Le B. Holmes that I have been removed from the office of postmaster upon charges of incompetency and inefficiency, made by Pay Director Gilbert E. Thornton, United States Navy, and indorsed by Hon. Charles S. Randall, and realizing that there is no just ground for such a charge, I would most respectfully ask that the post-office department make a thorough investigation of the case, that I may have an opportunity to exonerate myself. Very respectfully,

A. W. CARPENTER.

HON. JNO. WANAMAKER, P. M. G., Washington, D. C.

But he failed to obtain this opportunity. He writes to your committee as follows in respect to his knowledge of the cause of his removal:

One day Mr. Gilbert E. Thornton, pay director in the navy, called at the post-office and demanded that his letters should be given to him as soon as the mail arrived in the morning, i. e., that the mail should be gone through with, and his letters given to him before the other patrons of the office were served. Now the morning mail brings to this office from two thousand to four thousand letters daily, and I have known it to go as high as fifty-five hundred.

There are usually from fifty to sixty people in the lobby upon the arrival of the morning mail, waiting for their letters to be boxed. I told Mr. Thornton I could not go through the mail and select his letters before serving the rest of the patrons, but that as soon as the mail reached the office it would be distributed as quickly as it was possible to do it, and that then he should have his mail.

Mr. L. Le B. Holmes, of the law firm of Stetson & Green, of this city, called upon the postmaster-general, who told him I was removed upon charges of incompetency preferred by an officer of the navy, indorsed by Charles S. Randall, representative in congress from this district. He declined to let Mr. Holmes see the charges, but I learned afterwards that the charge made by Mr. Thornton was inefficiency in not handling his mail properly when he was in New Bedford, the same being government business. I know of no other charges that were brought against me.

Mr. L. Le B. Holmes who was a member of the republican city committee of New Bedford, wrote as follows to the postmaster-general in respect to his refusal to investigate this removal: "The investigation asked for would have fully shown all that I represented to you, and the groundlessness of the charges against Mr. Carpenter.

Yet the investigation requested was not granted, obviously because the department did not regard it important to ascertain the truth or falsity of the charges upon which it had removed Mr. Carpenter.

As a republican who has witnessed the whole transaction, I ought to and do feel humiliated. It is a revelation as to the conduct of the administration of my own party.

Its platform and the letter of acceptance of President Harrison distinctly promised that should not be done which I have seen done here with my own eyes. Nor is that even fairly stating it. Not only has an honest and efficient public officer been dismissed from the service on a charge of incompetency, but he has been turned out of office under a cloud, and denied even the opportunity of proving the utter falsity of such a charge.

If this is the spirit of civil service reform, civil service reform should be denounced by all honest men. The old way of removing an official because he was not of our party was more honest and decent.

A letter addressed to the new postmaster, and answered by him, failed to elicit any other or different statement of the facts concerning this removal.

William H. Greenhow, removed from the office of postmaster at Hornellsville, N. Y., addressed the post-office department on the 3d of December, 1889, asking if any charges had been filed against his management of the office. He received the following answer:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 6, 1889.

SIR—Yours of the 3d inst. relative to charges against the management of the post-office at Hornellsville, Steuben county, N. Y., and requesting a copy of same, has been received and placed upon the files of this office. In reply, I beg to inform you that it is not the custom of the department to furnish postmasters with copies of charges against them, except in cases provided by section 25, page 727, of the "Official Postal Guide" for 1889.

Very respectfully, J. S. CLARKSON,
F. A. Postmaster General.

[The section referred to is found among "Suggestions to the Public on Postal Subjects," and contains the following: "Copies of papers on the files of the department will not be furnished on the application of individuals, except in cases where a suit is commenced and pending, involving the substance of the paper or document itself, and then only on the certificate of counsel showing that such papers or documents are material as evidence in the trial or preparation for trial of the cause, and stating wherein such materiality consists, with such other proof of materiality as may be required by the postmaster-general."]

It will thus be seen that by the rules of the department, as interpreted by Mr. Clarkson, no copies of charges can be furnished to the men whose removal is contemplated or perhaps already made.

The following letter is from the postmaster-general in regard to the cause of the removal of Mr. Langham as postmaster at Hawley:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL, }
WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 1, 1890. }

SIR—In reply to your letter of the 29th ultimo, I have to advise you that, according to the best information received at the department, a change in the office of postmaster at Hawley, Pa., was made in the interest of better mail service.

Very respectfully,

JOHN WANAMAKER, Postmaster-General.

MR. P. J. LANGHAM, Hawley, Pa.

James DeLaney was removed as postmaster at Orlando, Fla.; and if any charges were made against his administration, he was unable to find out what they were. His successor, Mr. Ingram Fletcher, writes: "There were charges preferred against Mr. DeLaney by certain republicans; but what they were I know not, as I never saw them. Mr. Charles E. Ferguson and I believe in civil service reform; and, feeling like most every other citizen, that Mr. DeLaney had made an efficient officer, we asked that he be retained until his time expired, unless he had violated some postal law. Mr. Ferguson asked to see the charges, but they were not shown to him."

Mr. H. E. Bundy was removed from the post-office at Oneonta, N. Y., no notice being given to him of any charges preferred, and he knew of none until his removal from office.

Mr. George E. Bachelder, the post-office inspector, who had inspected his office only a few weeks before the removal, writes to him a letter of which he sends us the following copy:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF POST-OFFICE INSPECTOR,
ALBANY, N. Y., June 2, 1889. }

Mr. H. E. Bundy, Oneonta, N. Y.:

FRIEND BUNDY—I am surprised that there is a change in postmaster at your post-office. Supposed you would stay as long as any one differing from the present administration.

You have my best wishes for success in whatever you venture, as I am sure, from the executive ability shown by you in the management of the post-office, you are entitled to success in any business that you undertake.

Yours respectfully,

GEORGE E. BACHELDER, P. O. I.

The tendency of political intrigues for appointments and removals to perpetuate themselves can not be better illustrated than by the case of the post-office at Wyoming, Ill. In this case the incumbent was removed, and no cause assigned, so far as he knew. This fact being communicated to Augustus G. Hammond, his successor, Mr. Hammond answers that the cause was the manner in which Mr. Thomas secured his own appointment, being the result of a political intrigue. Now, if this proceeding is to be used in like manner against Mr. Hammond upon the next change of administration, it is pretty evident that the removals upon charges and counter-charges could go on indefinitely, and this quite without reference to the fact whether the office had been administered efficiently or not.

Mr. J. H. Middleton, former postmaster at West Hoboken, N. J., states that no cause was assigned for his removal:

My successor was asked to make a charge, but answered, no charge could be made against me, as I ran the office to the satisfaction of the people.

To this his successor, Julius Klumpp, answered:

I did not use my influence to have the said gentleman removed, or was asked to prefer charges, or that I said no charges could be made, as he ran the office to the satisfaction of the people. How could I say such a thing? Because we are aware, and the good book says, mankind is not infallible, consequently charges could always be made if required.

Your committee can not too strongly express its reprobation of the continuance of this system of removals upon secret charges by unknown accusers without opportunity for defence, explanation, or denial. It is inquisitorial in its character, and totally inconsistent with republican institutions and with our present civilization. It encourages falsehood and slander, which are thus protected by the veil of official secrecy, and the confiscation of the office for the benefit of the informer completes the injustice. No efficient civil service can be procured until such a system is utterly overthrown. It leads to the appointment of the men who are the most unfit to carry on the business of the government, the slanderer and maligner receiving the place as a reward for his evil doings. This system could easily be abolished if the inspector or the department, previous to the removal, should be required to acquaint the officer accused with the nature of the charge against him and hear what he had to say. If such a vast number of removals were not made for purely political reasons, this would not be by any means an impossible or even a difficult task. It is only because the energies of the department and of the inspectors are exhausted in an improper and immoral effort to turn men out without cause for political reasons that they might find it difficult to give the necessary time to an investigation of charges, where publicity would be some guarantee that they were honestly made.

It would be just as absurd to expect a judge to decide a case properly when he heard nothing but the plaintiff's statement as to expect removals to be properly made under such a system as this. Your committee is of the opinion that there is no evil in the spoils system as inherently wicked as this, whereby both the livelihood and reputation of innocent men are liable to be overthrown by secret and false accusations.

In connection with these removals upon secret charges, it may be well to recall the expressions made by Mr. Harrison in the senate upon this subject in his speech of March 26, 1886, as reported in the Congressional Record, vol. 7, No. 3, page 2,790, et seq. In reference to executive nominations then pending in the senate, he said:

Let me say now that, if the prompt and just demand which was made in many cases by the incumbents of these offices, when they were suspended under charges, to be advised of the character of those charges and to have an opportunity, however little it might influence the mind of the executive, to place on file their ample refutation of the slanders and lies that had crept into the departments against them—if that denials had been allowed, I must believe that most of the cases that are held up before the senate would have been withdrawn or have gone through. . . .

In many of these cases it leaked out in the community where the officer resided that charges had been filed against him. Some base fellows had been used for that unholy office, and, being advised that charges had been sent, the appeal was made to heads of the different departments, and, I believe, in many cases to the President himself, to be advised of the character of the charges made. . . . Here was an accusation, a hearing, a sentence and an execution without the accused being advised of the character of the charges against him. . . .

What is it these people ask? An honorable discharge after honorable service. That is all. They ask that they may go out of the offices, to the duties of which they have devoted themselves with conscientious fidelity, with an honorable discharge. . . .

As I shall show presently, democratic newspapers and many democratic congressmen do not approve of the policy that stimulates and invites charges against the characters of men and women and hides these charges from the light of day. That is the issue; and, great as the constitutional questions involved here may be, it is practically a greater question whether this government in its civil service shall be administered as in the Star Chamber, where accusations may be lodged and heard and decided without the knowledge of the man whose interests are to be affected and whose character is to be blackened. . . . Will you unite here in support of a proposition which denies to a republican removed knowledge of the charges filed against him in a public department of this government? . . . My colleague (Mr. Voorhees) arraigned the senate because, he said, we were condemning the attorney-general unheard. . . . What does he think, then, of these trials that have been going on from day to day in the secrecy of the postmaster-general's office, with closed doors? These charges, by the thousand, are piled upon his table, and he assorts them over, and, without letting the persons accused know or have any intimation that they are accused at all, he deprives them of office and, so far as such judgment can, of their good reputation. . . .

My colleague said yesterday that the first feeling of the masses was for fair play. . . . Does he think this is fair play? In every Anglo-Saxon heart, and especially in the western heart, among the frontiersmen, who always believed in a fair fight, there is that imbedded sense of justice and fair play which resents and denounces these unfair methods.

Mr. Harrison quotes with approval the following extract from the Freeman, an independent paper at Indianapolis:

A place is wanted for a camp-follower. Of course, it must be forthcoming. But Vilas has said that no one will be removed unless charges be preferred. So some convict or gutter-snipe is hired to blacken the character of the man who is unfortunate enough to hold the coveted place. When he is bounced, he tries to find out what is the reason for it; and he is told that he can not be allowed to see the charges or to be faced by his accuser. He goes out under a cloud of suspicion. We say this is outrageous. It is one of the fundamental rules of Anglo-Saxon liberty that every man shall be entitled to a fair trial. And this swearing away the character of American citizens can not be apologized for by the warmest friend of the administration.

Mr. Harrison then refers to the case of the postmaster at Shelbyville, as follows:

Last summer he was suspended from office. It was understood through the town that some charges had been presented against him. The men who made them did not disclose themselves, and he could gather at home no intimation as to their character. Whether they affected his personal integrity, whether they charged a mal-administration of the office, or whether he was simply charged with being a republican, he could not tell. He sat down and addressed the postmaster-general a letter, asking, in the most respectful way, to be advised of the character of the charges against him. He got no answer. Need I add that? Who did get an answer? Failing to get an answer from the postmaster-general, he addressed me this letter [here Mr. Harrison quotes the letter, asking for a copy of the charges preferred against him, and says]: Upon that letter I wrote, on the 9th day of July, 1885, this indorsement: "Respectfully referred to the Honorable Postmaster-General. I hope you will not deny the request of Mr. Bone to be advised of the character of any charges filed against him, and to have an opportunity to meet them. The slip he encloses from the democratic newspaper shows how good an officer he has made; and his good civil record, with a long, gallant service in the war for the union, entitles him, I think, to a favorable consideration of his request," and adds: Not only this soldier's appeal to know, but my appeal in his behalf, went unanswered from the post-office, and remain unanswered to this day. I want to know if there is a democratic senator here who approves of that sort of treatment of a citizen. I want to know if there is one who, much more, approves of that sort of treatment of a man who for four years fought for his country in the hour of its pressing danger. If the democratic party means to unite upon this issue and in defense of these practices, then I welcome the issue.

Mr. Harrison then cites the case of Isabelle Dela Hunt, somewhat similar in character, as well as a number of others, and says:

I do lift up a hearty prayer that we may never have a President who will not pursue and compel his cabinet officers to pursue a civil service policy pure and simple upon a just basis, allowing men accused to be heard, and deciding against them only upon competent proof and fairly, either have that kind of a civil service, or, for God's sake let us have that other frank and bold, if brutal, method of turning men and women out simply for political opinion. Let us have one or the other. They will not mingle. It was the conflict of these currents—the President on one side, endeavoring to be responsive to his self-imposed pledges, and the pressure of his party on the other—that has driven those who were at the heads of the departments, in the attempt to preserve and maintain the President's professions and at the same time to give to the hungry who were demanding to be fed,—it was an attempt to reconcile the irreconcilable that has brought this wretched condition of things in which men and women are condemned without a hearing. Let us have one or the other, pure and simple.

It seems incredible that the administration of the man who uttered these words should perpetuate this system of removals upon secret charges. Yet such is the fact.

Your committee concur most heartily with the expressions quoted above. They furnish the best standard of criticism possible of the system of removals which is still practiced in the post-office department. It can never be unjust to the President to judge him by his own standard of duty, by his own conceptions of justice and fair play. The fittest condemnation of his own acts is found in his own words. Nor will it do to shift the responsibility from the chief executive to the heads of these departments. Mr. Harrison has told us why it can not be so evaded: "I do lift up a hearty prayer that we may never have a President who will not either pursue or compel his cabinet officers to pursue a civil service policy pure and simple, . . . or," etc. It is not the postmaster-general and his first assistant who, in the last analysis, is responsible. It is the President, who appointed Wanamaker and Clarkson, and who permitted these things to be.

Respectfully submitted,

THE CAUSE.

THE President will do well to heed a staunch republican paper like the Minneapolis Journal, which warns him thus:

"The President appears to have been captured by the looting element from the time he got comfortably seated in the white house. His appointees for postmaster-general and assistant-postmaster were extremely hostile to the reform, and they have ignored the law and defied it ever since they went into office. The administration has made a complete failure of itself so far as the civil service reform pledges are concerned. This failure is to be deeply regretted. Every such failure hurts the republican party. It has declared for civil service reform. It must place an administration in power which is brave enough to execute that reform."

In 1888 the people of the United States trusted us with their political power. Now, the first power was the power to appoint postmasters and all the various officers of this great government of ours; and that power, instead of being a strength to any party, is a weakness to any party, and upon that basis nearly all the public men who fall in public life by the wayside fall by the exercise of patronage. I say to you now, if I had the power I would not allow a member of congress to recommend any man for any office whatever. I would take from your political agents all the power that is vested in them by custom—not by law; I would take from them all that power, and I would not even allow a member of congress to recommend postmasters, because it is an element of weakness; it weakens the member of the house and senate, and it makes a cause of constant trouble and quarrel, and I think the time will soon come, and the republican party will be the agent in that great reform, when a law will be passed separating entirely the appointing power from the law-making power.—Senator Sherman at Pittsburgh, October, 1890.

Mr. Leonidas F. Houk, of Tennessee, is one of the most aggressive republican opponents of reform in the civil service, and in the debate of last winter upon the appropriation for the commission, he made one of the most vehement speeches in denunciation of the reformed system. He held in substance that the entire public service should be regarded as the lawful plunder of the victorious party.

Mr. Houck's majority two years ago was more than 13,000. This year he has been re-elected by about 5,000 majority, and in response to the question, what had caused the republican disaster, he said that it was not the McKinley bill, which was "an element of strength instead of weakness," and is the kind of bill which the republican party will never abandon, nor was it the force bill, nor anything that congress has done, but, he said, according to the report, the defeat "is principally attributable to the matter of offices and dissatisfaction at the distribution of patronage, a dissatisfaction that always follows a change of administration from one party to another."

Of course the dissatisfaction which defeats an administration party is within the party, not in the opposition party. Mr. Houck therefore holds that it was republican disgust, not the repudiation of republican policy by the country, which led to defeat. His remark implies that if the administration, by its distribution of spoils, had not disgusted republicans so that they angrily voted against themselves, they would have carried the election. In other words, the effort to strengthen the party by spoils has overwhelmed it with the greatest disaster in its annals. There could not be a stronger argument for civil service reform than this statement of a bitter enemy. —Harper's Weekly, Nov. 22.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

*Allotments thus acquired, mutually engaged such as accepted them to defend them; and as they all sprang from the same right of conquest, no part could subsist independent of the whole; wherefore all givers as well as receivers were mutually bound to defend each other's possessions. * * * Every receiver of lands, or feudatory, was therefore bound when called upon by his benefactor, or immediate lord of his feud or fee, to do all in his power to defend him. Such benefactor or lord was likewise subordinate to and under the command of his immediate benefactor and superior; and so upwards to the prince or general himself; and the several lords were also reciprocally bound, in their respective gradations, to protect the possessions they had given. Thus the feudal connection was established, a proper military subjection was naturally introduced and an army of feudatories was always ready enlisted and mutually prepared to muster. . . —BLACKSTONE.*

—A collector of internal revenue for the first New York district, which includes the city of Brooklyn, has always been known to exercise an enormous political influence. He is in a position to hold a rod of iron over the head of every liquor dealer or cigar manufacturer or retailer whom he may for any reason desire to injure. Through this influence the liquor dealers especially have been forced to contribute both time and money to local politics.

Now they are being forced to elect William C. Wallace to congress in the third district. Positive proof of this became public yesterday, together with a letter signed by Ernst Nathan, the United States internal revenue collector, copies of which had been sent to every liquor dealer and cigar manufacturer in town. Nathan is the man who recently showed himself to be the local republican "boss," and in that capacity forced the renomination of Wallace for congress and dictated the nomination of every other candidate on the republican general ticket.

During the past week it became evident that Mr. William J. Coombs, the democratic candidate for congress in the third district, was making a great fight. It has been known for several days that Nathan tried to get up a deal by which votes for Courtney should be given for votes for Wallace. This was refused, the democrats claiming that they could win without any trading. This led Nathan to resort to the influence of his office, and he had letters like the following printed:

BROOKLYN, Oct. 25, 1890.

DEAR SIR—The Hon. William C. Wallace having been renominated for member of congress for the third district, comprising the seventh, thirteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first and twenty-third wards, and being very much interested in his reelection, I would deem it a personal favor if you will interest yourself among your friends by advocating his election. Respectfully yours,

ERNST NATHAN.

This was regarded as likely to be thrown into the waste basket, so two days later Nathan had the following official stamp placed in the left-hand corner of each letter:

"Ernst Nathan, Collector Internal Revenue. Oct. 27, 1890. First District, Brooklyn, N. Y."

Then he sent these "orders"—for that's the light in which they have been regarded by those who received them—to the liquor dealers and cigarmakers. One man who received the above took it to the managers of Mr. Coombs's canvass and complained about being intimidated in such a manner.

"This is nothing but intimidation," he said, "and it will force many men to vote for Wallace. This fellow, Nathan, could cause us much annoyance by hauling us up on every slight infraction of the law. His deputies gave an example of what could be done recently when they extorted bribes from liquor dealers when the stamps on empty beer barrels were found to have been torn off. There are many other ways in which Nathan can put us to trouble and expense, and this circular means that he will do it if we vote against Wallace."

A Times reporter saw Collector Nathan yesterday and obtained from him a confession that the above letter had been sent out; "but," said Nathan, "I sent copies only to my personal friends."

"Then why was your official stamp placed in one corner two days after the letters were printed?"

"That was merely to identify the letter; to show where it came from. You see, some of the people might have forgotten me."

"But did you not say the letters were sent only to personal friends and were intended to be from Ernst Nathan and not from the United States collector of internal revenue?"

"Oh, certainly," responded Nathan; "but, you see, people may have forgotten me."

"Have you not many personal friends among liquor dealers and cigarmakers, Mr. Nathan?"

"Yes. I am a manufacturer of cigars myself."

"Well, did not some of these circulars get to at least a few of those personal friends?"

"Perhaps they did," was the reply, "but I don't know."—New York Times, Nov. 2.

—Mr. Samuel Stratton, who is president of the Union of State Republican Associations, announces that the associations each have a roster which shows every man, woman and child in the service in Washington. It is the intention to send every republican voter home for election day, and to accept subscriptions for campaign purposes. The clubs, Mr. Stratton says, are picking up in membership very rapidly. He said:

"During the Cleveland administration they got timid and left us, but are coming back in swarms now. At present the Illinois, Ohio, Kansas, Indiana, Michigan, Pennsylvania and New York people are well organized, and Connecticut, Maryland, the Carolinas, Virginia, the District of Columbia and Tennessee are falling into line. We now have a total membership of about fourteen hundred. During the Cleveland administration not a single one of these clubs kept up its organization. They were afraid to take an active part in politics, but recent republican successes, and especially Reed's boom, have entered their bones, and they now want to crawl under the canvas. The mugwumps, interlopers and half-breed fellows are bracing up and declaring themselves."—Boston Post, Sept. 16.

—There is one office-holder in Washington who believes thoroughly in the spoils system. His name is Daniel Grosvenor. He is a brother of the Ohio congressman who came out second-best in a skirmish with Civil Service Commissioner Roosevelt a few months ago. He held office in the treasury department under former republican administrations, and when President Cleveland came in he was allowed to remain; but about three years ago he received his dismissal for a breach of discipline, and practiced as an attorney till President Harrison was inaugurated, when he soon found his way back to his old place.

Mr. Grosvenor is one of the most notable members of the Ohio republican association, and made a flamboyant speech at a private meeting the other evening, the gist of which has leaked into the local prints. When asked by your correspondent whether he had been correctly reported, he answered:

"I have not seen the accounts, and, as I do not crave newspaper notoriety, I have certainly not authorized any of them."

"You are represented as finding fault with the slow way in which the money has come in from the government employes for campaign purposes."

"Well, I did say that. I have no hesitancy in stating anywhere that I am far from satisfied with the rate at which campaign contributions have been offered. What else do they accuse me of?"

"You are quoted as urging a more efficient method of collecting money from the clerks."

"I am, eh? Well, I did say something of that sort, too. I remember saying that, in my opinion, any man who wouldn't put up his money for the support of the party that gives him his bread and butter ought to be turned out of his place. And that is just exactly what I do think."

"But there is a hint given of some plan you have devised whereby the civil service law can be evaded."

"Yes, I proposed such a plan, and there were plenty of those present who approved it. But some of them, toward the close of the meeting, got frightened and went back on the whole thing."

"And the details of your plan were —"

"Ah, my friend, I am not giving them away to the enemy," and Mr. Grosvenor chuckled. "No, sir, it may be adopted yet, so you needn't try to get me to expose it. I'll simply say that it is a very good one and ought to have been taken up. Is there anything else? No? Good-day."

From other sources it is learned that Grosvenor's plan was to have every clerk notified by the state association to call at the city post-office and get a letter which he would find addressed to him there. The letter would be, of course, the dunning circular from his club. It is held by Grosvenor that the post-office is not a "government office" in the sense intended by the law against soliciting political subscriptions, and hence that no prosecution could follow such a device. The question at once suggests itself, why it would not be a more direct and easy process to send the circular to each clerk at his residence, where the law could not reach it? The answer is, that in case of recent changes of residence, or owing to some other hindrance, the circulars might go astray. If a clerk is notified personally at his desk by an officer of his club that a letter is in the post-office for him, and he does not call for it, that "spots" him at once as "disloyal." If he does call for it and does not respond with a gift of cash, he goes upon the black list unless he can give a satisfactory explanation.

Samuel R. Stratton, the "high-cockalorum" of the state republican clubs in Washington, is out in an interview this morning in which he says of the clerks who are going home to vote: "I issued at least 100 certificates to day to clerks who wished to avail themselves of the half-fare rates. The railroads at first wanted to limit the tickets to four days before and four days after the election. This, however, would not have allowed the clerks to go home and work for the party before election day. So a larger limit was fixed. Quite a number of the department clerks and officials have already gone home, and are making speeches for the party. R. Theophilus, assistant disbursing officer of the house, who is a Welshman, has gone to talk republicanism to the Welsh people in Representative Bayne's district. C. W. Filer, chief of the war and navy division in the pension office, and secretary of the Connecticut republican association, is making good use of his leave by helping the republicans in his state. A number of government printing office employes have gone home to talk and vote. I shall leave on Saturday, and am already booked for speeches in Pennsylvania towns."

Stratton has a clerkship at the capitol, and is on the pay-roll of congress.—Dispatch to New York Evening Post, Oct. 23.

—The control of this matter, according to the Washington Post, is under the direction of Samuel R. Stratton, president of the "union of republican state associations." Mr. Stratton is a federal office-holder from Pennsylvania. He is described in an interview to-day as being enthusiastic over the prospects of republican success. He said:

"The outlook is good so far as we people in Washington are concerned, and remember now that I speak for the organizations within the radius of our union of state republican associations. There was never greater activity and energy put forth in getting every qualified voter home for the November election."

"Have you lists prepared from your own state of the voters employed in the various departments, and are the state organizations similarly provided?"

"Yes, we have a roster showing every man, woman and child from the state of Pennsylvania employed in the government service. To-night this roster will be overhauled, and the faithful will be checked with a blue mark. The doubtful men and pretenders, and the fellows who hide behind the civil service will be checked in red."

"The unfaithful will be known?"

"Every man. He will be marked. I ought not to give this away, but there are a few of our people who have lost their legal residence in the states, who have been formed into a sort of vigilance committee to keep watch on the stragglers and report them after election."

"Are all the associations on the alert in this particular?"

"So far as I know, no guilty man will be allowed to escape, and the appointing power of the government will be obliged to take cognizance of this report after the election is over."

This, in other words, is a brutally frank admission that government employes who do not contribute both their time and money to the interests of the republican party will be reported to the appointing power in the different departments with a view to securing their dismissal. The "bosses" estimate that of the employes who will thus be dragooned into going home, 600 belong to New York, 200 to Massachusetts, 1,500 to Maryland, 200 to Indiana, 600 to Pennsylvania, 30 to Wisconsin, 80 to Ohio, 150 to Illinois, 70 to Connecticut, 50 to Michigan, 80 to North Carolina, 30 to Iowa, 500 to Virginia, 100 to New Hampshire, 30 to Delaware, 30 to Rhode Island, and 30 to Kansas.—Boston Post, Oct. 20.

—When Representative Willard Howland of Chelsea, was conducting a campaign for the nomination as secretary of the commonwealth on the republican ticket, one of his newspaper organs charged that the custom house was backing Colonel William M. Olin, and beyond that claimed that custom house influence was attempting to control the policy of the party in the state as in years past under republican administrations. Officials in the custom house are certainly engaging in politics this year as they never did under Collector Saltonstall during the administration of President Cleveland. Upon the stump for the republican tickets in the state this fall have been heard Collector Alanson W. Beard and Deputy Collector John L. Swift, while Inspector of Customs Edward Fitzwilliams has given a large part of his time since the campaign opened to speaking at rallies throughout the state. Upon the list of republican speakers displayed at the republican state committee headquarters on School street, there also appears the name of Special Agent of the Treasury Department Charles H. Litchman. Naval Officer Frank D. Currier, of New Hampshire, is secretary of the republican state committee of that state and is now on the stump there. He is very little at the naval office owing to the press of campaign work. Internal Revenue Collector Frank E. Orcutt has taken a lively interest in the present campaign, with McIlrose politics especially, and was in the state convention. Dr. E. G. Frothingham, of Haverhill, is examiner of drugs at the custom house and also chairman of the republican city committee of Haverhill. At a republican rally there last week he called the meeting to order, and is doing very active work in the politics of his city and state. Two other active politicians are Messenger Flanagan, of the collector's department, and Night Inspector J. J. McCarthy. Both of these men are taking an active part in the politics of their localities, and the former is said to be absent from his post a large share of the time. "Under President Cleveland," said a custom house official last night, "not a federal officer in Massachusetts went on the stump. More than that, no federal officers took any part in politics, except to vote as they thought right, and no influence was brought to bear to cause them to vote. To-day every United States official in the state of republican proclivities is being used for political purposes to the neglect of official duties. Under Collector Saltonstall some of the officers asked permission to take part in politics, but he declined to give it. He circulated the order of President Cleveland prohibiting federal officials from taking part in politics, through all the divisions, and the clerks read it and indorsed it on the back as having read it. Consequently the printed copies of the order contained the signatures of all the men, so that they could not, if brought to task for going into politics other than to vote, plead that they did not know about the order. There was never any cause for complaint against anybody, however, on the score of violating Mr. Cleveland's order."—Boston Post, Nov. 3.

—The Republican can not support the claims of Joseph G. Cannon this year, because they are adverse to the best interests of the republican party in the district. Mr. Cannon is the candidate this year, not by the free and untrammelled voice of the republican party of the district, but by the crafty manipulation of a well organized factional Cannon machine, which has controlled the nominating conventions of the district for more than a dozen years past.

This factional machine is fostered by a perpetual district committee, selected biennially by delegates picked, usually, by the committeeman himself in his county convention. Chas. P. Hitch, whose federal office-holding under the influence of Mr. Cannon makes him, except for voting purposes, a non-resident of the district, is now, and has for the past ten years, been the committeeman from Edgar county; Postmaster Weaver represents Coles; ex-Postmaster Wright, Champaign; Post-office Inspector Dice, Vermillion, and L. L. Parker, Douglas county. These constitute the present committee. Thus this committee is, and has been, selfishly Cannonized for years. Republicans who do not favor the life-term policy of Mr. Cannon have not a representative or a friend in this committee. Why are non-officeholding republicans studiously kept off the congressional committee? Nor is this kind of selection of committeemen confined to the congressional committee. It runs on through to the smallest committee. Everything is Cannonized in the fifteenth district. Every aspirant for any office, little or big, is closely scrutinized by machine bosses, and unless he willingly subscribes fealty to the factional machine, he is a marked subject and ostracised at once and in every way.—Paris [Ill.] Republican on Congressman Cannon.

—Jo. Cannon accounts for the opposition of some half dozen republican papers in his district by declaring that the editors are disappointed aspirants for post-offices.—Rockford [Ill.] Register, Oct. 24.

—The Ohio men who hold office in Washington are the latest sufferers from the republican campaign assessments. Each clerk and government employe from Ohio received to-day a notice from the executive committee of the republican state committee that William Mayse had been authorized to receive subscriptions from Ohio men, and that as the committee was in need of money, it was expected that the contributions would be liberal. Mr. Mayse, who is a note broker of Ninth street, is treasurer of the Ohio state association.

The notice informs the clerks that Mayse will keep, for the state committee, a complete record of their contributions, a copy of which will be furnished to the association. It was, of course, unnecessary to tell the clerks what use would be made of this record. They understood perfectly well that it is a threat to punish any one who fails to appear upon it as a contributor.—Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 20.

—The men who are managing William Kramer's campaign for sheriff were disturbed yesterday by a well authenticated rumor to the effect that Nathan [internal revenue collector] and Nichols were preparing to sell out their man in the wards comprising the third congressional district in order to save Wallace. This story has been circulated among democrats for several days, but it was not until yesterday that the Kramer people put any faith in it. Then they started an investigation, which, it is said, opened their eyes. They learned of several instances of trading on the part of republicans, and then hurried to Nathan with their proofs. He denied all knowledge of such a thing, and said it would be the height of folly to knife the only German on the republican ticket. He promised to investigate the matter and put a stop to all deals. Kramer, according to his managers, is not going to sit down and put entire faith in Nathan's promise.—New York Times, Oct. 29.

—The republicans at this end of the state have been crying to Blaine, and he would not hear them. A special messenger was sent to Chicago in the person of Revenue Collector Warmcastle, to plead with the secretary of state to make one speech in Pittsburgh.—Pittsburgh Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 29.

—Internal Revenue Commissioner John W. Mason thought he would assist in the defeat of Representative Wm. L. Wilson, of West Virginia. Mr. M. F. Hall is a prominent republican in Mr. Wilson's district, and the editor of the Phillippi Republican. Mr. J. E. Hall is a well-known democrat of Phillippi, and a warm friend of Mr. Wilson. Commissioner Mason thought he could give the republican editor a "pointer or two" for use against Wilson, and wrote about it to Mr. Hall. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Mason addressed his letter to Mr. J. E. Hall, instead of Mr. M. F. Hall, and now his little scheme to injure Mr. Wilson in the second district is exposed.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 29.

—One of the two battle grounds in the state is the sixth, or what is known locally as the Newark district. The administration pressure that forced Lehlbach into retirement bred heart-burnings and disagreements and so disaffected the German element that it was believed that the district could not be saved again to the republicans. They gave the nomination Mr. Lehlbach was not permitted to have to Elias M. Condit. The Times has heretofore told of the contest between Gen. Sewell and the Essex republicans over the distribution of the federal patronage. One of the bitterest of recent struggles was over the revenue collectorship. The Newark republicans wanted a Newark man appointed because he was to succeed a Newark man, and because it is in Newark that most of the revenue of the district is collected. Gen. Sewell induced President Harrison to give the place to an ex-senator from the Hunterdon wilderness. There was another breach between them and Sewell over the United States district attorneyship, and the Newark republicans were discomfited again. Then Judge Fort wanted to be solicitor general, and he failed to get it. Wayne Parker wanted two or three things. He received in place of them an offer of something he did not want.—New Jersey Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 6.

—One of the most active of the republican managers in the work of raising money from government clerks and employes during the campaign just closed, was the notorious W. W. Dudley, of "blocks of five" fame. His latest effort in that line was in the interest of republican candidates here and there, who needed "boodle" in their districts. Dudley's plan was simple enough. In the case of a South Carolina candidate, for example, he wrote a personal letter to the clerks from that state, saying that he had himself subscribed $100 for use in Mr. Blank's district, and calling upon the clerks to give liberally to help the republicans to win. Dudley was careful to send letters to the house addresses of the clerks, and so keep himself just outside of the penalties of the civil service law, which forbids any importuning of clerks for political contributions in their offices. If Dudley really contributed $100 to the campaign fund of each of the candidates for whom he has asked money from others, he will have a snug little bill of expenses for the republican congressional committee to foot.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Nov. 4.

—The arrangement now is for President Harrison to leave Washington for this city Sunday night. He will arrive here Monday night and return to Washington Tuesday afternoon or night. Attorney-General Miller and Private Secretary Halford will accompany the President. With the exception of the President, Mr. Miller and Mr. Halford, nearly all the Indianapolis men holding government positions at Washington are here to vote. Several came in last evening, among them the President's barber.—Indianapolis News, Nov. 1.

—According to the officers of the various state associations, who have been very active in the work of driving voters home, not less than 5,000 government employes will be absent from their posts next Tuesday for the purpose of voting in their respective congressional districts.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 29.

—Congressman Sherman, of New York, secured the appointment of country postmasters by the score, but in the majority of cases he thereby provoked lasting enmities. It appears to have been his ambition to build up a personal machine as an annex to the "gang," and, as is usual in such cases, the unworthy received his favor. But the climax came a year ago. The whole county of Oneida was intensely excited over the impending struggle for the district attorneyship. The "gang," which is largely reinforced by gamblers and other law-breakers, set out to capture the office of public prosecutor. Sherman threw his whole influence for one Van Auken, who had been a tool of the "gang." By means of his postmasters and other official retainers he was enabled to control the county convention and nominate Van Auken. The better element of the party fought Van Auken in the convention, where much bad blood was displayed. Their candidate was Josiah Perry, an able and reputable lawyer. Then followed one of the most exciting contests in the history of this storm center of state politics. The democrats renominated district attorney Thos. S. Jones, who was the mortal enemy of the "gang." The result was that Sherman's candidate was snowed under by 2,300 plurality in a county that had given Harrison 1,932.—Rome [N. Y.] Dispatch to New York Times, October 13.

—When the new ballot law left the hands of the governor, the employes in the several state departments breathed easy. They felt that it exempted them from further political assessment. This belief was strengthened when it was learned that there was to be no contest over the court of appeals judgeship. When the 1st of October had passed and no notification had been given of any assessment, the clerks and others felt certain that they were to escape. Then, without warning, notification was given the employes in nearly all the departments that an assessment of 2½ per cent. on yearly salaries was needed immediately.

The order was reluctantly obeyed, but there was no dodging it, and portions of the month's salaries were assigned over to Controller Wemple and State Treasurer Danforth. Clerks were assessed $30 to $40, and orderlies and messengers $10 to $15. The corruption fund amounted to several thousand dollars.—Dispatch from Albany to New York Times, Oct. 17.

—HEADQUARTERS OF THE CENTRAL REPUBLICAN EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, DR. M. URWITZ, Secretary, Houston, Tex.: FELLOW-REPUBLICANS—Our patience is exhausted, and we can not any longer endure the shame, disgrace and humiliation brought upon the republicans in Texas by the audacity, arrogance, corruption and treachery of the negro leaders and their followers. They have taken forcible possession of our primaries and ruled our conventions with relentless tyranny, and have driven many of the best and most patriotic white republicans out of the party ranks. They have demoralized and disorganized the republican party of our state. They have laughed decency to scorn and branded patriotism with ignominy. They have bartered their citizenship away in open market and have sold their votes to the highest bidder at every election. Republicanism in Texas has become a stigma upon American citizenship, a reproach to our civilization and a curse to our country.—Circular Referring to Collector Coney [Galveston], St. Louis Republic, Sept. 17.

THE REST OF THE PLATFORMS.

We condemn it for its deliberate abandonment of civil service reform, for its use of cabinet and other official positions to pay financial campaign debts.—Michigan State Democratic Platform, September, 1890.

We again pledge the republican party in this state to the fullest sympathy with the letter and spirit of every reform which would prevent the bestowal of public offices to secure political support, and trust that the principle of the civil service law will be extended throughout the post-office department, and that the president, under the authority already given him, will extend it wherever practicable. And we call upon our representatives in congress to support the civil service commission by such appropriations as may be required for its greatest efficiency.

We congratulate the administration on its national civil service commission, which has executed and defended the civil service law with courage and vigor. The very successful application of the principles of that reform to the employment of laborers in the city of Boston suggests a method of regulating the employment of laborers in the navy yards and other public establishments, which would prevent all charges of suspicions of abuse, and we urge the consideration of this upon the President and congress.—Massachusetts State Republican Platform, Sept., 1890.

We condemn the administration for its open and defiant repudiation of the letter and the spirit of the civil service laws, for making wholesale removals and appointments for purely partisan purposes, and for permitting the active interference of federal officeholders in Massachusetts politics, an interference in striking contrast with the course of the holders of the same offices under the democratic administration.—Massachusetts State Democratic Platform, Sept., 1890.

We arraign the present republican administration, not only for its gross and willful violation of its pretensions in favor of civil service reform by the removal of competent and faithful officers before the expiration of their terms, but for the appointment to office of notoriously incompetent, disreputable and corrupt men, and for its reward of unscrupulous partisans because of their corrupt connection with the elections of 1888, in contributing large sums of money to poison the ballot and debauch electors.

We denounce it for prostituting the census bureau to secure partisan information, to the neglect of a correct and complete census in all sections of the country.—Indiana Democratic Congressional Convention, Terre Haute, July 24.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE.

We have still to convince them [the independent voters] that democracy means something more than mere management for party success and a partisan distribution of benefits after success. This can only be done by insisting that in the conduct of our party principles touching the public welfare shall be placed above spoils, and this is the sentiment of the masses of the democratic party to-day.—Ex-President Cleveland to Young Men's Democratic Club, Canton, Ohio, December, 1890.

Indianapolis, Indiana.

AN organization in Washington calling itself the Indiana Republican Club, and apparently headed by one W. W. Curry, met December 6, and resolved that the exigencies of the hour call for the appointment of "tried and true republicans in place of democrats holding positions outside of civil service scope." The brazen quality of this resolution is almost beyond comprehension. About everything in Indiana "outside of civil service scope" has been handed over, and throughout the country post-offices have been given to "tried and true republicans" at the rate of over thirty thousand a year, and other offices at the same rate. The Washington special sending the above resolution to the Indianapolis Journal of December 8, also says: "The President has stood by the party workers, and in a way that elicits the endorsement of all members of the party here and wherever the conditions are known." And yet, upon the heels of this, comes the worst defeat the republican party has ever known.

THE truth is, Washington clubs have become a source of dislike to the people. They are largely made up of office-holders, some of whom are forced in by the others who are the most offensive type of politicians. In addition, there is a crowd, such as claim agents, whose business somehow goes better if their party is in office. Almost all are obscure persons. For instance, away from his neighborhood about all that is known of W. W. Curry is that he is from somewhere in Indiana, and that he was one of those who, by the sufferance of President Harrison, were engaged in bleeding government employes just before the late election. The Indiana Republican Club has but one conviction upon the subject of its resolution, and that is that receiving a living off the government as spoil is a good thing and must be kept up, and the way to keep it up is to have as much of it as possible.

THIS is all there is of it. This club could not change two hundred votes in Indiana. Its actions in campaigns impress the people as an attempt of a ring of office-holders and hangers on to control the state from Washington. The appearance here of the Ransdell-McFarland crowd from Washington before the late election affected the republican party adversely a hundred-fold more than it did favorably.

These are not the times for office-holders to interfere in campaigns. When the time comes that they can write and speak and give money to a political cause without affecting their own tenure, they will do it from a belief in principles, and it will, within the fair limits of discussion and within the efficient performance of their duties, be a harmless and proper exercise of their rights as citizens.

THE system upon which labor is obtained by this city is wasteful and extravagant. It is a system of personal and political favoritism; and any public work of any kind which is done by the rule of favoritism is done at a needless expense. It is, besides, a corruptor of public morals, for it teaches laborers to rely, not upon their own merits as workmen and as citizens, but upon the power of a political boss. It is time that this species of boss government was done away with. The Boston labor system accomplishes this by providing registers upon which laborers, without regard to color, politics, religion, or political or personal influence, may get their names in the order of application and in turn may get employment. It is sufficient to say that criminals and bad citizens can not get their names upon these registers.

CHAS. E. VANDEVER, a republican of Terre Haute, was appointed by President Cleveland agent of the Navajo Indians. There is the highest authority for saying that his record as agent was excellent. He was dismissed not long since and the Indian Rights Association, much disappointed by reason of its great satisfaction with Vandever's work, tried to ascertain the cause. The department of the interior replied that "the department does not feel at liberty to disclose the contents of private files, whatever their nature." It is not surprising that a secretary who has played a trick with the public service should sneak behind the shelter that the evidence of his trick is "private files." It is not aside the mark to say that Vandever was dismissed because some party boss wanted his place for a henchman. This proceeding is in line with Secretary Noble's career.

"Gene" Higgins appears to have lost some of that serenity for which he was well known as a Democratic office-holder. He was here yesterday on a visit of some sort, and at a well-known saloon he fell in with another ex-office holder named Gallagher. An animated controversy that was begun in the saloon was continued with him on the sidewalk, and finally led to a bout between Gallagher and Higgins, when Gallagher pressed Higgins hard and presently thumped him with so much vigor that "Gene's" blood besprinkled the sidewalk.

Spectators of the affray say that Higgins drew a glittering weapon after he was struck, but did not get a chance to defend himself with it, and that a companion named Lathrop, from California, when Higgins was knocked down, drew a preposterously large "gun" from his pocket, to the dismay of the throng that was studying the fighting qualities of Higgins and Gallagher. The controversy is understood to have been about an election matter.—Washington Dispatch to New York Times, Dec. 3.

This is the henchman whom Senator Gorman compelled President Cleveland to retain in office against the protest of respectable democrats, though the President knew perfectly well that the scandal of his yielding to such compulsion would stain his whole administration.

In the same manner President Harrison, as a resident of Indianapolis, must be entirely familiar with the history of McFarland, employed in the government printing office, an appointment so disgraceful that the seasoned politicians even felt squeamish. It is instances like these that disclose the real character of a government by feudal chiefs. Higgins and McFarland are obscure men of unsavory character. Such are likely to slip into public place, but why is it that a president can not, or does not, turn them into the street when decent people demand it? They are somebody's henchmen, and no interference will be tolerated with the lowliest of their hirelings.

THE Indianapolis Journal of December 8, has a special from its Washington correspondent containing an interview with a man who, he says, is "a republican representative from the west, and his name is a household word throughout a broad expanse of the country." The representative said:

"Don't publish my name, but say to the world that in politics we find the basest and most general ingratitude to be encountered anywhere. I can respect the person who stands his neighbor up in the dark at night and robs him; he gains that which will bring him happiness. I can have patience with the one who kills his fellow; he has an excuse. But the man who accepts of his friend's assistance in a campaign and fails to appreciate it, or the civilian who gets a place at the hands of his congressman and then turns his back in indifference is worse than the thief or the murderer, for he has no excuse except ingratitude. I never was so much impressed as in the recent campaign with the fact that only those who stand by their friends through thick and thin can ever succeed. It is this ingratitude that upsets confidence and gives defeat. I did very much for some men in my district who never stirred a peg in the recent contest, and on the other hand I presume there are some of my constituents who think I am the most ungrateful man on earth. Public men have to keep on intimate terms with those who make them. If we let a little indifference arise we soon become separated. Men who are elected to office should never grow to believe they are better than their party or the fellows who helped them when they were in need of friends most. There was a heap of 'evening up' in the recent contest, and the result is many heartaches on both sides of the issues."

The debauching influence of the spoils system is here proved in a most startling manner and by conclusive evidence. This congressman who, like the great bulk of his fellows, has abandoned his constitutional duties or performs them but perfunctorily, and has become a divider of spoil, gives it as his moral condition that he has respect for a thief or a murderer, but that worse than these is the man who has received an office through a usurpation by his congressman and then refuses to work for the latter's re-election—in other words who refuses the feudal service which calls upon him politically "to plow the lord's land, to make his hedge, or carry out his dung."

THE POLITICAL CENSUS.

The Indianapolis Journal of December 8, has an editorial headed "No Partisanship in the Census," and quoting from Census Superintendent Porter's late article in the North American Review to the same end. The quotation says, "in no case have chiefs or experts been selected because of their political faith." To this the Journal adds: "The supervisors were selected with reference to their fitness for the work, some of them being democrats, and the enumerators were appointed on the recommendation of the supervisors." There is some satisfaction in seeing those who made spoil of the census bureau smart under criticism, and it is not surprising that they should be prone to forget the facts. Editorials and articles in reviews can not save them. It is not necessary to go out of Indiana to confound both Mr. Porter and the Journal. The CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE for March and June, 1890, covers the ground. In recapitulation, did not Mr. Porter describe himself as "waist-deep in congressmen" after spoil? Was not every supervisor in Indiana a republican party worker? In the Terre Haute district did not the supervisor refer the appointment of enumerators to the chairmen of the several county committees of his district, and did not the Indianapolis Journal say:

Mr. Wilson H. Soale, census supervisor for the Terre Haute district, has referred the appointment of census enumerators to the chairmen of the several county committees of his district, and these in turn are referring them to the chairmen of the different township committees. That seems a queer way of getting official subordinates to perform an important executive work.

Who is Sid Conger, the supervisor of the Indianapolis district? Is he not a poultry raiser of Flat Rock, a smart republican politician, and a defeated republican candidate for office? Did not Conger leave the choice of enumerators for this city to Merrill Moores, who was in no manner connected with the public service, but who was a member of the republican county committee and who is said on good authority to deal in slum politics? Did not Moores say in the Indianapolis Sentinel of June 19:

"Some of those I recommended have turned out most miserable failures. When Mr. Conger was first appointed supervisor, a great many people knowing him and me to be intimate friends besieged me for recommendations as enumerators. After they had received their appointments, they bothered me for instructions, and now since they are at work and have found out they won't get their money before the middle of July at the earliest, they have importuned me to loan them money."

Is not the case in Indiana typical of the operation of the census bureau throughout the country? The affirmative is the truthful answer to every one of these questions. It is no wonder that a census taken in such a manner should be doubted on every hand. The mischief is done and can never be rectified. The present duty is to see to it that those who with cool insolence in the face of protest used the census bureau as a political machine do not soon hear the last of it. The load is heavy, but they will have to carry it.

"A CENTURY OF DISHONOR."

The people of the United States have little to be proud of in their dealings with the Indians, and they have much that will forever be a disgrace. We can boast of our physical greatness as a nation, but we are put to shame by the removal of the Cherokees from Georgia. We have succeeded in killing Sitting Bull, against whom there was a widespread animosity for causing the death of Custer; yet the battle which led to Custer's death was brought on by a plain violation of a treaty by us. In its course with the Indians our government has from the beginning been a swindler and a promise-breaker. Sitting Bull knew us; he rated us at our true value and declined to be cajoled or swindled. If he and his men had lived in Canada under the honorable treatment of the Canadian government hostile acts would never have proceeded from them.

Our treatment of the Indians has not been without protest from our side. The American people are not inhuman, and if we had not been ruled by bosses the wrong would long ago have been righted. Nor have efforts been lacking. President Grant called in philanthropic people and a great show of justice was made. But when contractors and Indian agents robbed, Grant refused to anger his party machine by removing the politicians who held the offices and his efforts came to nothing. The most powerful, systematic and beneficial attempt to help the Indians that has been made is that of the Indian Rights Association; and this attempt is handicapped and its noblest efforts repeatedly brought to nothing, for no reason but that party bosses must have places for henchmen. The most infamous practice is the latest and goes by the name of "home rule." It means, for instance, "Dakota loot for Dakota looters." Under this rule President Harrison's bosses worked until under inexperienced and worthless agents the griefs of the Indians broke out, not in hostilities, but in their form of protest.

According to General Miles the Indians were starved, and according to General Howard hostilities were begun by white men. Doubtless the administration is proud of its military maneuvers and of its attempt to seize Sitting Bull under the guise of a parley, which attempt resulted in his being killed. Strange things sometimes stir up pride. His killing was no better than murder—not on the part of the Indian police nor of the troops—but on the part of the administration. He was not a marauding and murdering Indian. He was trying to maintain the rights of his people, and he did it in the same spirit in which John Hampden refused to pay taxes. His death may cow the Indians for a time, but their wrongs will remain, and will cry out. The root of these wrongs is in the boss system, which at this most critical time, at the most critical points in the Indian country, such as the Pine Ridge and the Cheyenne River agencies, gives us new and inexperienced agents and other employes who know nothing of the Indians and how to deal with them. President Harrison could have stopped this long ago, but he apparently proposes to perpetuate the system by which, and by which alone, the government is and can be kept a cheat and a swindler for the benefit of political bosses and private greed.

THE Bloomington branch of the State Civil Service Reform Association has elected Prof. J. W. Jenks, of Indiana University, president, and C. M. Hubbard, of Indiana University secretary. It is the intention to have a public address again this year. The last one was given by Theodore Roosevelt.

AMERICAN FEUDALISM.

Allotments thus acquired, mutually engaged such as accepted them to defend them; and as they all sprang from the same right of conquest, no part could subsist independent of the whole; wherefore all givers as well as receivers were mutually bound to defend each other's possessions.  Every receiver of lands, or feudatory, was therefore bound, when called upon by his benefactor, or immediate lord of his feud or fee, to do all in his power to defend him. Such benefactor or lord was likewise subordinate to and under the command of his immediate benefactor and superior; and so upwards to the prince or general himself; and the several lords were also reciprocally bound, in their respective gradations, to protect the possessions they had given. Thus the feudal connection was established, a proper military subjection was naturally introduced and an army of feudatories was always ready enlisted and mutually prepared to muster.
—BLACKSTONE.

—All that is left of the Kings county republican general committee met last night in the Athenæum, on Atlantic avenue, Brooklyn, and tried to ascertain what had happened. Franklin Woodruff presided and found all the discredited "bosses"—Israel F. Fischer, David A. Baldwin, Naval Officer Willis and William J. Buttling—in front of him.

As soon as the meeting had been organized, Fischer, who has been running the navy yard patronage since Harrison's election, and who was mainly responsible for "Billy" Watson's nomination in the twelfth assembly district, sent up a cry for reorganization. He had been talking to three or four friends, he said, and had about concluded that reform was necessary, whereat there was much derisive laughter, the significance of which Fischer didn't appear to appreciate at all. He went on to offer a resolution for the appointment of a committee of fifteen to consider the subject of a re-organization, and report in two weeks.

Then Col. John Wesley Jones, the same who was bought off by Congressman Wallace's backers in the third congressional district, arose with a mass of printed resolutions in his hand. These documents consisted of demands on the part of some unknown "independent citizens' and workingmen's reform" for a whole lot of things. Internecine warfare must cease, said the resolutions, and there must be a re-enrollment of republicans all over the county. The general committee must be reorganized, reduced in numbers, and its members must be elected for one year only. Col. Jones also demanded that no one be compelled to acknowledge a ward "boss," and that in the future all dirty linen be washed in private and not handed over to the reporters for their inspection. These were about all the reforms Col. Jones could think of.

But Hugo Hirsch thought the proposed committee should have power to discipline as well as to re-organize, and he made a long speech denouncing republicans who had knifed their candidates. He referred to young Timothy L. Woodruff who had supported Mr. Boody for congress, and demanded that men like him be expelled.

Then it was David A. Baldwin's turn. He was disgusted, he said. He had been a wheel horse for thirty years and didn't propose to do such work any more.

"We have too many bosses," he cried, and the crowd yelled. "We should have the power to discipline and bounce traitors."

Mr. Baldwin expressed opposition to doing any more wheel-horse duty led Chairman Woodruff to ask him if he would serve on this re-organization committee, and Baldwin said he would not.

"Perhaps you would like to drive," suggested some one in a loud tone; but Baldwin paid no attention to him.

William H. N. Cadmus raised a cheer when he attacked Mr. Fischer's committee of fifteen as a close corporation. It should consist of one member from each ward and town, Mr. Cadmus said, thirty in all, and then he went on to show how Mr. Fischer and his assembly district needed re-organization. His complaint was that Mr. Fischer and his pals in a ward that gave a democratic majority had forced Watson on the district, thereby throwing away one republican assemblyman and possibly a United States senator. The crowd hooted and yelled at Fischer, and the old faction feeling got so hot that several gentlemen induced Cadmus to sit down. His plea for a big committee had to be taken up, however, and it was made part of the original motion.

"Billy" Buttlings, one of the "boys" from the fifth ward, seized this opportunity of putting in a word for a straight out party machine built on the lines of the democratic one.

"What's the use of re-organizing?" he asked, in ungrammatical but very forcible language. "You will see the same old faces back here another year. What we want to do is to take care of the ward workers, the men that stand by us when we are out of power. Now, in my ward there were seventeen navy yard employes parading around on election day with democratic badges on their coats. There are 120 men from my ward got jobs in the yard, and only thirty of them are republicans. What sort of way is that to carry on business? The boys ain't got no show at all. A re-organization of this committee won't help them, but if we would give some of those who knife us the grand bounce the boys would like it."—New York Evening Post, Dec. 17.

—The closing of Delamater's bank, with $100,000 of state money and $45,000 of county money and $3,500 of school district money among its liabilities, comes at a critical moment for the republican party of Pennsylvania. Among the causes of the failure the Tribune's special from Pittsburgh mentions the heavy campaign expenses of the late candidate for governor thus:

It is the current opinion here that Senator Delamater's recent campaign for governor had not a little to do with his financial reverses. The canvass for the nomination lasted six months, and is known to have cost enormously, while after the convention Mr. Delamater's expenses were largely increased. He spent much money upon marching clubs and in aid of all manner of organizations, charitable and otherwise, paid a liberal sum to the state committee, and frequently answered the call for funds where they were most needed to affect the election. Some politicians estimate that the fight cost the senator $150,000, but that is perhaps $50,000 too high.—New York Evening Post, Dec. 17.

—A prominent republican office-holder stated here last night that since he has held a government appointment, the period not covering twelve months yet, he has paid three contributions for political purposes. Not only the government office-holders, but the judges and officers of the minor and municipal courts in the state, whose places will be affected by the results of next Tuesday's state election, are being assessed, or, in the parlance of the hour in political circles, "asked to contribute" to the campaign fund. It is actually asserted that the common pleas court in New Haven, of which the chairman of the state central committee is the clerk, has been apportioned $1,000 for the political fund that is to be brought into service between now and election night. The common pleas courts throughout the state are presided over by republican judges and officered by republican workers. The judges of most of the municipal courts, whose successors must be appointed by the incoming legislature, are dependent upon politics for their retention on the bench.—Hartford Dispatch to New York Times, Oct. 28.

—The President's southern campaign, opened by the notorious Mizell, will be watched with interest here. There is proof that it is to be a thorough one. The place-holders and the place-hunters are to be organized everywhere for the control of state delegations to the next national convention. The President is to be landed as the leader, who held on his way in spite of the discouragements of a disastrous defeat, and as battling more strongly than any other man in the party for the bill designed to bring the south again under national republican control. That sort of talk, supplemented by material things in the shape of fat offices here and there, will, in the opinion of the President's friends, soon make the whole republican south not only rise up and call him blessed, but wildly demand his renomination at the hands of the party at large.—New York World, December 15, 1890.

—For collector of the port of Wilmington, N. C., the President nominated, by direction of Congressman Cheatham, James H. Young, a negro. Young resides in Raleigh. He attended a ward meeting there just before the late election, was elected a delegate to the county convention, and that body made him secretary of the county committee and delegate to the republican state convention. Notwithstanding all this, he went over to Wilmington and registered and voted at the late election. Runnell, another negro, also wants the office, and his faction, armed with the above facts, are making it lively for Young on the ground that he ought to be sent to prison.—New York Times, December 13.

—Politicians regard the trouble as but a natural outcome of the rivalry between the Platt and anti-Platt factions. Col. Erhardt [collector] is supposed to take care of the anti-Platt people, while Lyon [surveyor of the port] is expected, on a modified scale, to protect the Platt patriots, in which policy he enjoys the support of the federal administration. Col. Erhardt's friends express the most exuberant admiration for his policy in making places for republican workers. In the nineteen months he has held the office he has made more removals than Collectors Hedden and Magone made in the four years of their occupancy. In the unclassified berths, which are exempt from civil service laws, not a democrat, his friends proudly boast, draws salary to-day.—New York Times, Dec. 17.

—At a recent election a candidate failed to pay a cent of his assessment. He continually promised to pay and as persistently failed to do so. Finally, about four or five days before election the delinquent candidate received a communication from the state committee, which informed him that unless his assessment was paid at once, an accident would happen which would be of peculiar interest to him. The accident, it was intimated, would be that in some of the counties this candidate's name would not appear upon the ballots. The assessment was paid within forty-eight hours.—Indianapolis News, Oct. 3.

—The politicians are wondering why Quartermaster Arthur Boyle of the navy yard is not removed. He is a per diem man, but he was away for two days last week electioneering for Congressman Wallace, and did not report for duty on either occasion. He did not answer the roll-call as others have to do.—New York Times, Oct. 5.

—Senators Quay and Cameron conferred with state party leaders at the Continental Hotel in Philadelphia, December 12. They were anxious to strengthen the lines of battle. The internal revenue collector, David Martin, was the first one summoned, and the three had a private conference. Three others were summoned. It was argued that nothing should be done which would lead to the belief that bossism was still rampant. It was also agreed that the houses of the state legislature should be allowed to choose their own officers.—From Philadelphia Dispatch New York Times, Dec. 13.

—And the party is likewise the aforesaid postmaster, at the present writing. He has the credit of wielding a tremendous influence in his capacity of professor general of local politics.—Richmond, Ind., Sunday Register [Rep.] on Richmond's Postmaster-Editor, Nov. 23.

—From away up in the Adirondack region comes a New York republican assemblyman who says of the election that "that census did the business; for every one of the enumerators appointed in each census district, ten workers were disappointed and resolved to get even with the local boss who had control of the appointments, wherever the census officials were located there was a center of discord and a horde of disappointed republicans."—Springfield Republican, Nov. 28.

TAMMANY HALL.

A Quasi-Feudalism Without the Romance or Courtesy or Honor of Feudalism.

Tammany Hall has begun its annual levy of campaign assessments. Within a week every police captain who desires to avoid conflict with the "powers that be" will have subscribed $25; every police sergeant and roundsman $15, and every police patrolman $10. Foremen of fire department companies will have paid $25 each if they desire to retain their places, assistant foremen $15 each, and firemen and truckmen $10 each. The clerks and other helpers in the various departments of the city government will have paid various sums from $5 up, according to the amount of their annual salaries. Heads of departments will not be exempt from the levy. It is said that no one is exempt from the Tammany campaign levies save the "Big Four" and a chosen few of the district leaders.—New York Evening Post, Oct. 18.

OUR estimated table of Tammany "assessments," as enlarged by yesterday's filed statements of candidates' expenditures, reads as follows:

Mayor	$4,000
District attorney.....	4,000
Sheriff.....	4,000
County clerk.....	5,000
Comptroller.....	2,500
President of the board of aldermen.....	2,000
Superior court judge.....	10,000
City court judge, two candidates.....	8,000
Coroner (not yet filed).....	2,000
Civil justices, two candidates.....	4,000
Congressmen, six candidates.....	6,000
Assemblymen, twenty-four candidates.....	7,500
Aldermen, twenty-four candidates.....	3,500
Total.....	$62,500

The price which judge McAdam paid for the superior court nomination emphasizes the well-known fact that Tammany has for years obtained a higher price for its judicial nominations than for almost any other within its control. The long term and the high salary which pertain to the more important judgeships are considered sufficient reason for this. It has happened frequently in the past that as much as $25,000 has been paid for a superior or supreme court nomination.—New York Evening Post, Nov. 14.

The importance to Bourke Cockran of Mayor Grant's re-election can scarcely be overestimated. Nobody except himself knows how many sources of income he has because of his "pull" with the mayor, but everybody knows they are numerous and valuable. It came out during the investigation of the sheriff's office, for example, that each of the thirteen deputy sheriffs had to pay $35 a month out of his pay of about $3,000 a year to Cockran as a "retaining fee" for Cockran's services in advising him about the levying of blackmail. Cockran's income from this source alone was, therefore, about $6,000 a year. It has since been shown that he had one of his relatives put on the pay-roll in the register's office, with little to do and a salary of $1,300 a year, though he had been in this country only two months, and never had been naturalized. These two revelations were mere accidental glimpses of the almost countless streams which flow in more or less circuitous channels between the city treasury and the pockets of the custos.—New York Evening Post, Nov. 1.

"I am not surprised that a man like Grant can be elected mayor of New York when there are people in the city who would make an alderman of 'Jake' Kunzenmann," said a resident of the fourteenth assembly district to a reporter for The Evening Post last evening. Kunzenmann is the fellow described in The Evening Post some days ago as the leader of the Voorhis democracy in the fourteenth, whose influence in behalf of that Tammany auxiliary was secured, as is alleged, by giving him the privilege of naming five policemen, whose appointment was to be secured (so he said) by Mr. Voorhis, the police commissioner. Kun-zenmann boasted that every "cop," which is the slang name for a policeman, was worth $100 or $150 to him.

"Kunzenmann," continued the fourteenth district man, "ran for alderman as an independent democrat, and was elected. Of course the decent people were up in arms against him, and every effort was made to prevent his election. No pains were spared to recall to the people's minds that he was one of the worst men this city had ever sent to Albany. One document that was liberally distributed was a circular showing that while a member of the assembly he had accepted bribes from both sides in the gas bill controversy, and that he had afterwards admitted it. This circular did not seem to bother Kunzenmann at all, but on the contrary seemed to please him. He went so far as to have 1,500 copies of it printed and distributed through the district. I asked him why he had done that, and he replied:

"Why, it makes me solid with the people. That's the kind of a man they like."—New York Post, Nov. 8.

Mayor Grant this morning, in fulfilment of two political bargains, appointed Patrick (commonly called "Paddy") Divver, a rum-seller, and the Tammany leader in the second assembly district, and John J. Ryan, an undertaker in the fourth assembly district, police justices. We quote from The Evening Post's "New Tammany Pamphlet":

"Patrick Divver, commonly called 'Paddy,' is the Tammany leader in the second assembly district. He is the keeper of a sailor's boarding-house, and is the proprietor, or has interests in, several liquor saloons. He is an ex-member of the board of aldermen, a race-track frequenter, and the friend and confidant of gamblers. He is on terms of intimacy with 'Johnny' Matthews and 'Jake' Shipsey, two members of the sporting and gambling fraternity, whose particular methods of gaining a livelihood are not unknown to the frequenters of Paddy Divver's and other rum shops on Park Row, where they are generally to be found."

Up to within a few months of the late election Divver was known to be at odds with the mayor, presumably because the mayor would not make him an excise commissioner, and the presumption was generally accepted to be correct. Divver and his friends were threatening all kinds of vengeful acts, the most serious of which was to "bolt" from the Tammany organization and carry the whole Tammany committee in the second assembly district with them. That alarmed the mayor and the other members of the "big four," and they at once set to work to make their peace with Divver. Just before the election Divver "fell into line" for Grant, and it was rumored that he took an active part in making Tammany's peace with the gambling fraternity, in which he has many friends. It was then said that Divver had been promised a police justiceship. This story was denied at the time, but it now turns out to have been true.

After making the appointments this morning, the mayor gave out the usual statement that they had been made at the recommendation of a number of good tax-payers. Divver's appointment was said to have been recommended by fifty citizens, among whom recorder Smyth and J. Edward Simmons were mentioned.—New York Evening Post, Dec. 17.

Mayor Grant to-day made public some of a large number of written indorsements, which he received, of the candidacy of Patrick Divver, Tammany rum-seller, for the police justiceship. Here are some of them:

J. Edward Simmons, president of the Fourth National Bank—I am informed that Mr. P. Divver is a candidate for the appointment of police justice. I have known Mr. Divver for many years and it gives me pleasure to commend him to your favorable consideration. I think he will discharge the duties of the office in an acceptable and efficient manner.

F. B. Thurber—I take pleasure in indorsing the recommendation of Hon. Patrick Divver for the position of police justice. Mr. Divver has an intimate acquaintance with the masses of the people, and possesses their confidence in a remarkable degree. This is not a position that requires an intimate knowledge of the general law, but simply a knowledge of the laws which apply to the administration of the police department and the administration of criminal justice. I believe he would make an excellent police justice.

David McClure—During the years that I have known Mr. Divver he has been a reputable gentleman, and has merited universal respect.

Recorder Frederick Smyth—I have known Mr. Divver personally for many years and believe him to be in every way well qualified to discharge the duties of the office to which he desires to be appointed. My long experience as a judge of the court of general sessions of this city convinces me of the propriety of placing men in the office of police justice of integrity, good common sense, and who are familiar with the peculiar population of which the city is made up.

State Senator William L. Brown (Tam.)—He (Mr. Divver) has a kindly heart, a quality much needed in the discharge of the functions of a police justice. I am sure his appointment would meet with general approval from your friends, of whom I am not among the least or unconcerned.

Joseph J. O'Donohue—There is nothing that has given me more pleasure during my entire business life than to recommend as one of the police justices Pat Divver. I have known him personally for many years, and could not say enough for him. I know him to be honest and, in my opinion, fully capable to fill the position.—New York Evening Post, Dec. 18.

The mayor's choice of Divver for police justice is universally condemned by the press of the city. The Herald says: "He is the toughest kind of raw material to make a police justice of. * * * The interests of New York be hanged. His honor has all he can do to look after the interests of Tammany." The Tribune says: "Here is a vulgar, illiterate gin-mill keeper, by his very profession a breeder of vice and a maker of criminals, as ignorant of the law as a kangaroo, whose saloons are the hanging-out places of gamblers and sharpers, elevated to the bench of that court where in all the virtue and charity and wisdom of which man is capable would often be severely tested. Could anything be more shameful or more disgusting?" The World, which supported mayor Grant for re-election, says: "These appointments are unfit to be made. Divver is a saloon keeper, a politician of a small and unworthy sort, an ex-alderman, and the friend and associate of men of defective reputation." Even the Sun does not venture to commend Divver's appointment, which shows that it must be a shockingly bad one.—New York Times, Dec. 18.

THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The seventh report of the federal civil service commission, covering the year from July 1, 1889, has appeared under date of November 20. It effectively devotes a large share of space to evasion and violation of the law under the power of removal. The tables of changes made in certain offices do not permit a comparison of removals in the classified service between corresponding years under Cleveland and Harrison, as has been claimed in some quarters. They do, however, show conclusively, that in the departments at Washington there has been, since the law went in force, but little disposition to remove those who obtained places under it, the average of such removals being in the first year of an administration, the time of the greatest temptation, only eight per cent. This proves that a man who has obtained his place in open competition has a moral power that beats back the hungriest office-seekers.

THE tables fearlessly place the spoils system and the merit system side by side. We copy the percentage of removals per annum under both systems in thirteen post-offices during the first months of President Harrison's administration:

	Months.	Classified Service. Per Cent.	Unclassified Service. Per Cent.
Indianapolis, Ind.	12	14	75
Denver, Colo.	12	19	50
New York, N. Y.	12	8	...
Jersey City, N. J.	12	19	48
Chicago, Ill.	12	7	70
Milwaukee, Wis.	10	3	48
Philadelphia, Pa.	8	11	28
Newark, N. J.	9	7	68
Syracuse, N. Y.	7	28	90
Albany, N. Y.	8	28	90
Pittsburgh, Pa.	5	22	90
Kansas City, Mo.	7	8	50
New Haven, Conn.	5	15	50

Of these figures the commission pertinently says:

Taking the first table given above and comparing the percentages of removals in the classified service in each post-office with the number of removals made in the unclassified and excepted places, the difference is astonishing. In one case the percentage ranges from 3 to 28; in the other, from 46 to over 90; and the average is about seven times as great among those employes not protected by the law as it is among those who are protected by the law. It would be difficult to advance any argument which would show more conclusively the good effect that the law has in preventing in the classified service clean sweeps and removals for political purposes. The interests of the public service demand changes to the extent of only 10 or 15 per cent. among those who have entered through the examinations, whereas 50 or 80 per cent. of those who have not thus entered are removed during the year succeeding any change of administration. The conclusion is irresistible either that where the law does not apply appointing officers put into excepted and unclassified places incompetent persons, or else that their successors remove from these places men who are competent, and who are therefore removed for reasons unconnected with the good of the service. These figures show either that, outside of the classified service, poorer grades of appointments are made, or else that there are large numbers of removals of perfectly good men who are sacrificed simply for party or personal considerations. Probably both of these conclusions would be just.

It may be added that this comparison holds good, almost without an exception, throughout the federal service.

THE report shows that during the year the commission examined 22,956 persons, of whom 13,811 passed. There were appointed during the year, from the eligible lists, 5,415 persons, the proportion of appointees being about one to two and a half. The spoils system makes a poor show next to these figures. President

Harrison could give only one out of thirty-five the office of collector of customs of this city. Mr. Blaine said there were more than 5,000 applications for 200 consulships, so that if all the places were filled only one in twenty-five could be appointed. Recently there were fifty applicants for a janitorship in the courthouse of this county. In the first year of President Cleveland and of President Harrison there were more than 100 applicants for each place in Washington that could be vacated as spoil, and these applicants, in droves, traveled hundreds of miles to Washington, and at their own expense for days and weeks ranged from the dearest down to the cheapest board, and at last came home humiliated and penniless. The number of applicants for each bit of spoil and the amount of bitter quarreling over it, if known to the public, would be the most astonishing and humiliating fact connected with our civil government. On the other hand, the competitors under the merit system go to a convenient point for examination and then return home. If an appointment follows, the appointee is beholden to no one, and he may enter upon his duties his own man. If he gets no appointment he has not humiliated himself.

It is proper to close these remarks by asking Mr. Wanamaker what, in the light of this report, becomes of the suggestion of his present private secretary on his behalf that the commission had, more than a year ago, examined enough persons to fill appointments for ten years, and were open to the charge of simply providing themselves with employment by holding further examinations? To the ordinary mind it would seem that fairness and decency call for an apology from Mr. Wanamaker, and a confession that both himself and his secretary were wholly ignorant of the workings of the merit system, which they had with an assurance bred solely in conceit, entered into a plot to discredit.

EXTRACTS

From the Report of the Civil Service Commission for the year ending July 1, 1889.

* * * * *
From July 1, 1889, to July 30, 1890, 3,751 applicants were examined for the departmental service at Washington, of whom 2,117 passed and 1,634 failed to pass. For the customs service 3,552 were examined, 1,746 passed and 1,806 failed; for the postal service 11,190 were examined, 6,801 passed and 4,389 failed to pass; for the railway mail service 4,463 were examined, 3,129 passed and 1,334 failed to pass. The whole number examined for the four branches of the classified service was 22,956, of whom 13,811 passed and 9,145 failed to pass. Compared with the previous year this shows an increase of 3,896 in the whole number examined, an increase of 1,833 in the whole number who passed, and an increase of 2,063 in the whole number who failed to pass. The whole number appointed in the year covered by this report is as follows: Departmental service, 534; custom service, 375; postal service, 3,106; and railway mail service, 1,400; total, 5,415; an increase of 1,634 over the previous year.

* * * * *
When President Arthur classified the departmental service it included, as above stated, some 6,000 persons. In his time 378 persons entered the service by examination. When President Cleveland came in he therefore found over 5,600 employes in the departments who had been appointed prior to the classification of the service, and less than 400 who had entered through the examinations. Under President Cleveland the classified service was extended so as to take in somewhat less than 2,000 additional persons, and 1,109 entered through the examinations. Deducting those who had been removed, there were at the beginning of the present administration in the classified service of about 8,000 people some 1,275 who had entered through the examinations, somewhat less than 2,000 who had been included in the classified service during the administration of President Cleveland, and somewhat less than 5,000 of those who had been in the service originally when it was classified by President Arthur. Every year, of course, sees a greater proportion of persons in the service who have entered through the examinations, and every year, therefore, sees a greater proportion of the government clerks at Washington whose appointments have been made wholly without regard to political considerations.

* * * * *
The commission takes this opportunity to reiterate, however, its belief that in all cases where a removal is made the appointing officer should give the accused man a chance to be heard in his own defense, and should be required to file in writing a full statement of his reasons for making the removal, such statement to be made public if the accused so desires it. In the event of a very large number of removals being made in an office this fact should be considered presumptive evidence that they were made for political reasons, and to overcome this presumption the officer making them should be able to give specifically and in detail the reasons for each removal made.

* * * * *
The commission respectfully points out the need of legislation by congress which will give it complete control of the central board of examiners, and which will allow the payment of small sums to the local boards and their appointment from within or without the government service. There should be a board of twenty examiners at Washington, selected under the rules governing the classified service and under the control of the commission. These examiners would be able to mark all the papers in every examination, local or otherwise, and thus secure a perfectly uniform system of marking and prevent any suspicion of carelessness or bad faith on the part of the local boards.

At present the central board at Washington consists nominally of ten men detailed from the various departments, and they thus owe a divided allegiance to the commission and to the departments. Being lent to the commission, they are lost to the sight of the promoting power, and are often passed over in promotions in consequence, while the commission itself has, of course, no power to promote them. This works an injustice to the examiners themselves, and often makes the best among them unwilling to be detailed to the commission. Moreover the commission is obliged to depend entirely upon the good will of the departments for furnishing the examiners. The departments are, of course, required to do so by law, but there is no way of enforcing the requisitions. Thus, during the last fiscal year, very nearly half of the commission's work has been done for the post-office department, yet, until very recently, the post-office department has been represented on the central board by but one man, and the commission, therefore, had to take up the time of men detailed from other departments to do work not from the departments from which they were detailed, but for the post-office department from which no detail could be obtained. Finally the commission was forced to notify the post-office department that it would be impossible any longer to mark the railway mail papers unless an adequate force was detailed. Ten examiners in all are now detailed. It would cause no increase of expenditure at all to have these examiners estimated for as employes of the civil service commission instead of as employes of the different departments from which they come. This would put them completely under control of the commission.

This transfer could be made at once in the appropriation bill, and it would cause no increased expense whatever. But there should also be ten additional clerks at an average salary of $1,400 or $1,600 to do the work of marking papers now marked by the local boards. This would secure a much greater uniformity and accuracy in marking of the applicants for the local offices than can be obtained at present. A sum of say $6,000 is needed in order that the members of the local boards may be paid something for their services, which even aside from marking papers are often arduous and always responsible, and the law should permit these members to be appointed from within or without the government service. The net increase of appropriation would be only some $21,000 by this arrangement, with the result of very greatly increasing the efficiency of the commission.

* * * * *

The commission has fortunately been able to make an experiment of its theory that good would result from putting on the local boards men unconnected with the offices for which those boards conduct examinations, and therefore free from all possibility of influence on the part of the local appointing officer. In Indianapolis and Baltimore the commission found citizens who were in the public service owing to their connection with the federal court or census bureau, but who had no connection with the local post-offices, and who were independent gentlemen of position and of high standing in the community. Messrs. Fishback and Butler, of Indianapolis, and Mr. Rose, of Baltimore, consented to serve on the postal boards in their respective cities, Mr. Rose at the time being connected with the census bureau, and Messrs. Butler and Fishback, with the United States court. The presence on the boards of these gentlemen brought about excellent results in convincing outsiders that the workings of the boards were absolutely non-partisan, and beyond all suspicion of improper influence. The commission already had thorough confidence in the integrity of both the Indianapolis and the Baltimore boards, but recognizes the fact that every means should be taken to insure public confidence in the working of the system, and hailed the chance of putting on these boards men of high standing in their respective communities, who did not make their living in the government service, and were entirely independent of government position. The result has been most satisfactory, and thanks are due Messrs. Fishback, Butler and Rose for their disinterested public service.

* * * * *

The most wholesome effect has been produced in many offices and departments by the prosecution or removal of delinquents in accordance with suggestions made to the proper departments by the commission after the investigation of cases of alleged misconduct. In other instances, where the law was being disregarded through mere ignorance, all that was necessary was to call the attention of the appointing officer, and of the board and of the community as well, vividly to what the law was, and great changes for the better ensued. Thus, the commission at its first visit to the Indianapolis post-office after the change of administration, was forced to express dissatisfaction with some features of the observance of the law in that office. It gives the commission great pleasure to say that at present the Indianapolis post-office is one in which the law is being observed most rigidly in letter and spirit. Any candidate for position of clerk or letter-carrier in that office, whether democrat or republican, or neither, is examined, marked, certified, and appointed absolutely without regard to his political belief, and is retained as long as by good conduct he merits retention, and of this the commission is satisfied by careful personal investigation. As is generally the case with an office where the civil-service law is being rigidly observed, the Indianapolis post-office is also remarkable for the efficiency and integrity with which the public business is executed therein.

* * * * *

The commission's decision to make public the eligible lists has worked admirably, and has given the greatest satisfaction. After an examination, the names of the persons examined are not disclosed until the markings are completed, the boards and individuals doing the marking being completely ignorant of whose papers they are examining. This is done to prevent all possibility of favoritism; but once the markings are completed, the papers are open to inspection by any proper person, and the whole proceedings in the case of every individual candidate can be followed out from beginning to end. It is thus almost impossible for any fraud to be committed without imminent and immediate risk of detection. There are occasionally cases of cheating, or attempt at cheating, among the candidates themselves at examination time, but as far as is known, during the year covered by this report, there has not been a single accusation of fraud against any governmental employe connected with the civil service examinations which has proved to have the slightest foundation in fact.

FIFTH REPORT

Of the Special Committee of the National Civil Service Reform League.

POLITICAL CHANGES IN PRESIDENTIAL POST-OFFICES.

To the Executive Committee of the National Civil Service Reform League:

Your special committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the federal service and the operation of the reform law would respectfully report as follows in regard to the political character of the changes made in presidential post-offices:

Our questions in regard to the politics of the postmasters removed and those appointed elicited the following results: Out of 437 answers received in which the information was given upon this point, it appears that in 427 cases the postmaster removed or resigned was a democrat, in 1 case a prohibitionist, in 1 an independent, and in 2 cases, the incumbents being women, it was stated that they belonged to no political party. There were 3 resignations and 3 removals of republicans. From 513 answers received regarding the politics of the postmasters appointed, it appeared that 510 were republicans, 1 was a Knight of Labor, 1 an independent, and 1 a democrat. The democrat was Samuel P. Burris, of Talladega, Ala., of whom his predecessor writes: "I was removed because I was a democrat, and not in sympathy with the administration. It was believed that my successor, being a protectionist, was in sympathy with the administration and would support it." The uniformity with which democrats were removed and republicans appointed shows pretty clearly that political motives were not absent in the making of these changes. It appeared in some cases that quite full inquiries were made as to the political faith of candidates for appointment before their commissions were issued. Thus, C. A. Gildea was postmaster at Bracketsville, Tex., and on Sept. 16, 1889, he resigned. Not long afterward, Robert C. Ballantyne was appointed; but a protest was filed against this appointment on the ground that Ballantyne was a democrat. An inspector who came to investigate a mail robbery was engaged for two or three days inquiring about Ballantyne's politics, questioning a large number of persons, among others the old postmaster. Mr. Gildea denied his right to make these inquiries. The inspector told Gildea that it was reported that Ballantyne was a democrat, and that, as an agent would have to be sent out to investigate, he would attend to it himself and save the expense. After some months' delay, Mr. Ballantyne's political orthodoxy was vindicated, and he received the appointment. The employment of post-office inspectors to do this sort of political work at government expense carries with it its own criticism. These facts are furnished by the concurring statements of the postmaster resigned and the one appointed.

Out of 423 answers to our questions regarding the political services rendered by the former incumbent of the office, it appeared that in 83 cases such services were rendered, 16 cases were disputed, and in 324 cases the answers showed that no political services had been rendered while in office. We are inclined to believe, however, that the proportion of the old postmasters who did political work was very much larger than would appear from these figures.

To our inquiries as to the political services rendered by the new appointees in the last campaign and elsewhere we received 496 answers. In 155 cases it was stated that no services were rendered, 6 cases were disputed, while in 335 cases, a little over 63 per cent., the new appointees were active in party work. The positions held in the party organization were as follows: officers and members of state, congressional, county and township committees, delegates to national, state and congressional conventions, candidates for various offices, officers of republican clubs, campaign speakers, county "leaders," distributors of tickets, etc. Chairman and secretaries of county committees and delegates to congressional conventions are quite prominent.

Some of the new appointees state quite fully the political services rendered by them. Thus, E. B. Fletcher, the new appointee at Morris, Ill., writes:

"I took part in the last campaign, as I have in every campaign, since the first election of U. S. Grant for president in 1868; was an alternate delegate to the last national convention; was vice-president of the state republican league; was chairman of congressional committee; was member of county central committee; was private secretary to lieutenant governor. I am now, and ever have been since casting my first vote in 1868, a member of the republican party. I am now, and have been for fifteen years, connected with the Morris Herald, a wide-awake, progressive republican newspaper, as one of its publishers and editors.

Robert J. Rogers, appointed by the President at Searcy, Ark., states:

"I am chairman of the county republican committee, and have been for fifteen years, and have represented the county in nearly every state convention; and I have taken part in every campaign from Gen. Grant down to the present. I owned some stock in the only republican paper ever published in this place. The reason they are getting up a howl against me is because I am a republican.

C. C. Bush, the appointee at Reading, Cal., has sent to your committee, neatly bound and in book form, a printed copy of the papers filed on his application. After the preface and table of contents appears the original petition from the patrons of the office and others, stating, among other things, the various offices which Mr. Bush had held, such as delegate from California to the national convention of 1884, alternate elector, and an active worker in the campaign of 1888. It is signed by the judge of the superior court, chairman and secretary and other members of the republican county committee, editor of the republican Free Press, county clerk, under-sheriff, sheriff, city attorney, marshal, and others, and is supplemented by a petition of democrats that, when a change of political complexion of postmaster at Redding is made, they desire the appointment of C. C. Bush. This is signed by the secretary and treasurer of the democratic county committee, by the mayor, city treasurer and others. Then follows a petition signed by all of the republican members of the legislature of California. Then follows a certificate by republicans of Tahama county that Judge Bush was an active, untiring republican worker in the campaign of 1888, and rendered efficient services. Then followed letters from ex-Governor Low, General W. H. Dimond, chairman of the republican state central committee, Hon. A. P. Williams, ex-Senator George A. Knight, Hon. M. M. Estee, chairman of the national republican convention of 1888, Charles F. Crocker, delegate to the republican national conventions of 1884 and 1888, two members of the republican county committee, ex-governors, members of congress, and other republican politicians, concluding with a letter from Hon. J. D. De Haven, M. C., from the first congressional district. This is believed to be a fair sample of "a strong petition" for the appointment of postmaster.

Adolph Zadek, postmaster at Corsicana, Tex., writes:

I held every position from precinct chairman to chairman of the republican state executive committee; was a delegate at large from this state in 1876 to the national republican convention held at Cincinnati, Ohio. I am at present chairman of my senatorial district. I published in this city, in 1872, a republican newspaper, was proprietor of same, and spent for that honor $2,000 out of my personal means and for the love of the republican party. The paper was called the Progressive Age. I was an applicant, for the first time, under this administration for the consulate at Hamburg. You can find my papers on file in the state department. I am personally known to the Hon. Secretary of State. Being a southern republican, I did not receive the appointment I thought I fully deserved for services rendered to the country and the party that saved the union. Colonel J. C. Degress, and other leading republicans of this state, wishing to see me recognized by this administration, requested me to make my application for this office. So I applied for same, and received my appointment. . .

The following correspondence shows a congressman's views on the claims of "party service":—

ELIJAH A. MORSE, Propr. ABNER L. MORSE, Agt.
ALBERT E. MORSE, Supt.

CANTON, MASS., March 23, 1889.

Mr. Wm. Burns, Plymouth, Mass.:

DEAR SIR—Enclosed find a letter accompanying the petitions of Avery, Whiting and Harlow, by which you will see I paid you and your assistant a compliment.

Your petition was received yesterday, and forwarded to-day. Your friends waked up to late in the matter. I doubt very much if the President would appoint you, or any other democrat, to a presidential office in the face of the clean sweep which the Cleveland administration made of republicans. From all I can learn, you will retire from the office with the good wishes of the people of Plymouth. Will you be kind enough to show this to your assistant?

Respectfully yours,

ELIJAH A. MORSE.

ADDRESS MORSE BROS., CANTON, MASS., U. S. A.

CANTON, MASS., March 18, 1889.

Gen. Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States:

DEAR SIR—The commission of the present democratic postmaster in Plymouth, Mass., in my district, expires the last day of March. I hand you herewith three petitions sent me by my constituents in that place—one for the appointment of Winslow W. Avery, one for the appointment of Henry O. Whiting, and one for the appointment of Henry Harlow. These several petitions are numerous signed by the business men and first citizens of Plymouth. Should you do me the honor to desire my opinion I say frankly it is difficult to decide between the three candidates. Either of them is well indorsed, and all are well qualified for the position. While Mr. Avery has the largest number of signers to his petition, Mr. Whiting has at least an equal indorsement from the business men of Plymouth; and, while Mr. Harlow has a smaller indorsement than either of the other two, he has among his indorsers the Plymouth Cordage Company, which is one of the largest establishments and manufactories of its kind in the world, and, of course, large patrons of the mail.

In your inaugural address, you stated that honorable party service would not be a bar to political preferment. Mr. Avery, the first gentleman named, is one of the editors of the Old Colony Memorial, an ably edited paper, having a large circulation in Plymouth county, and for twenty-five years that paper has been a stanch, honorable and able defender of the republican party, and to its influence is due, in a measure, the large republican majority given in Plymouth county for the last twenty-five years. So that, if I am asked to decide between these three candidates on the ground of honorable and patriotic party service, I should give my preference to Mr. Avery.

I learn from my constituents that the present democratic postmaster, whose term is now expiring, has faithfully discharged the duties of his office; and his assistant—whom I hope will be retained by his successor—is an affable, pleasant and courteous gentleman, universally popular in Plymouth.

ELIJAH A. MORSE.

FOUR YEARS' SERVICE.

One ground for the removal of postmasters is given thus, in the statement furnished by Mr. Clarkson: "Upon expiration of four years' service, and second commission not yet expired," and he states there were 201 removals on this account. It will be observed that in these cases the commission of the postmaster had not expired. Such cases generally occur where the appointment was made in the first place to a fourth-class office which became presidential during the administration of Mr. Cleveland, and a new commission, running four years, was thereupon issued by the President. The two terms of service, as fourth-class postmaster and as presidential postmaster, are thus added together in making up the four years. It is not claimed that these removals are made for inefficiency nor for the betterment of the service, but upon no other apparent ground than the impropriety of permitting a postmaster to serve more than four years. Instances of such removals are furnished in the following correspondence:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 20, 1890.

DEAR SIR—Your letter of the 12th inst., addressed to the President, and requesting to know why you had been displaced as postmaster at Neodesha, Kan., is received.

In reply, I beg to state that your original appointment was dated Dec. 4, 1885, while the office was fourth-class, and you have had continuous possession for over four years.

Yours truly,
J. S. CLARKSON, First Ass't P. M. Gen'l.
L. W. LEE, Esq., Neodesha, Kan.

John C. McCauley was appointed postmaster at Searcy, Ark., in July, 1885. In July, 1887, the office became presidential, and he was confirmed as postmaster for four years. In answer to an inquiry respecting his removal, the postmaster-general responds as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
WASHINGTON, D. C. Sept. 11, 1889.

Mr. Jno. C. McCauley, Searcy, Ark.:

DEAR SIR—Answering your letter, which bears no date, I beg to say that an examination of the records of the office shows that you were appointed originally on the 9th of July, 1885, and therefore you have held the office for more than four years fixed for the term. You would have no reason to complain if the President were to make a new appointment. I shall lay the case before him at an early date for his action.

Yours truly,

JNO. WANAMAKER, Postmaster-General.

The following copy of a letter from the postmaster-general is sent to us by C. T. Marsh, the removed postmaster at Oregon, Ill.:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 10, 1889.

Mr. C. T. Marsh, Oregon, Ill.:

DEAR SIR—I have to-day the honor of your letter of the 7th, inquiring as to the appointment of postmaster in your city, and beg to say that no charges of any kind were made against you, but the removal was made on the recommendation of the member of congress representing the district in which your office is located, because you had served a term of four years and upwards, having been appointed by the removal of your predecessor when congress was not in session. Yours truly, JNO. WANAMAKER, Postmaster-General.

Mr. W. J. Johnson had been appointed postmaster at Manchester, Mass., October 1, 1885. The office was then a fourth-class one. Later it became a presidential one, and Mr. Johnson was re-appointed January 16, 1888, his commission expiring January 16, 1892.

The position of the administration is clearly expressed in the following letter of the postmaster general:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 18, 1889.

Mr. W. J. Johnson, Postmaster, Manchester, Mass.:

DEAR SIR—In reply to your letter of the 17th, I beg to say that it is held that, when a man holds an office for four years, which is the usual term in cities and municipalities under the federal government, he enjoys a full term. Your commission dates from October 1, 1885; and all postmasters' commissions are at the pleasure of the President, who is taking great pains not to allow the removal of any good officer until he has had four years' enjoyment of the office.

Yours truly, JOHN WANAMAKER,

Postmaster-General.

The following letter from the member of congress for the district shows that he considers the matter simply a question of the length of the term and politics, and not of fitness for the place:

SALEM, MASS., Sept. 18, 1889.

DEAR SIR—Yours of the 17th have received, also one of same date inclosing your commission, which I return this mail.

Your present commission appears to run to January, 1892; but I have been informed that you will have served four years in January next, and it is my impression that the post office department think so too. Yours very truly, WILLIAM COGSWELL.

W. J. JOHNSON, Postmaster, Manchester, Mass.

The term of Jno. R. Brunt, postmaster at Osage Mission, Kan., expired Feb. 10, 1890. He was removed, and Ebenezer B. Park appointed on July 31, 1889. Prior to his removal, on Nov. 23, 1888, Congressman Perkins wrote to him thus: "I know of no complaints made against your efficiency; and, so far as I know, all that are asking for the privilege of succeeding you admit that you have made a faithful and efficient officer, and they seem to take pleasure in bearing this testimony in your behalf, but desire to succeed you as republicans." His successor, Mr. Park, writes as to the causes of the change: "I understand that this is a republican administration. I was appointed because I was the choice of a large majority of the patrons of the office, and because the term of the democratic incumbent had expired." (By the expiration of the term, Mr. Park probably means that Mr. Brunt had held the office more than four years.)

It seems evident that this cause for removal, like the others, is designed to cover a removal made for political reasons; and the political motive is all the more apparent from the inconsistency in appointing several republicans who, prior to the last administration, had served four or even eight years.

If it is right, as we believe it is, to re-appoint efficient republicans who have held office four years or more, why is it not proper, excepting from political motives alone, to allow efficient democrats to serve out the terms of their respective commissions, whether they had been in office four years or not?

On a careful inspection of the answers received, stating the dates of the expirations of the terms of the incumbents removed, it would appear that removals have been made on an average sixteen and one-half months before the expirations of these terms.

APPOINTMENTS DICTATED BY CONGRESSMEN.

The influence of Congressmen in dictating removals and appointments is very clearly shown in a letter sent by the chief clerk of the post office department to Edward Smith, postmaster at Carrollton, Ill., which is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF CLERK,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 25, 1889.

SIR—In reply to your letter of the 7th inst., which has been referred to this department by Rev. J. W. Scott, I beg to inform you that a change of postmasters for Carrollton was made upon the recommendation of Senator Cullom; that the postmaster has been commissioned; and that recommendation of this character is in accordance with the long-standing practice of the department, deemed to be the best ground of action. Very respectfully,

W. B. COOLEY, Chief Clerk.

MR. EDWARD SMITH, Carrollton, Ill.

Ebenezer M. Lockwood was postmaster at Burlington, Kan., upon the incoming of the present administration. Harrison Kelly, member of congress from that district, on July 10, 1889, wrote to Mr. Lockwood the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 10, 1889.

P. M. Lockwood, Burlington, Kan.:

MY DEAR SIR—I have been conferring with the department in reference to the appointment of your successor. Your four years from first appointment expires the 28th of this month. I think your successor will be appointed at that time. Courtesy to you suggests that you have an opportunity of resigning, to take effect August 1, if you wish to do so. Would be glad to hear from you in reference to the matter at an early date. Respectfully,

HARRISON KELLY.

Mr. Lockwood, however, did not resign, and was removed, Squire M. Lane being appointed in his place. Immediately upon his appointment, Mr. Lane appointed the daughter of Congressman Kelly to a place in the office, and a short time afterward promoted her to be assistant postmaster.

In many cases it was stated that the new appointee was active in congressional conventions in behalf of the congressman nominated at such conventions, and by whom he was recommended for the place.

In every answer received from the state of Arkansas, except one, the change is attributed to the influence of the Hon. Powell Clayton.

Offensive partisanship seems to have been employed as an agency of removal by this administration in much the same way as by the last. The following special dispatch to the Chicago Daily News, of March 19, 1889, published in an issue of March 20, states as follows:

Special to the Chicago Daily News.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19.—Representative Payson, of Illinois, made a test case before the postmaster general yesterday; and the result is shown in the list of nominations that came to the senate to-day. Judge Payson said to the postmaster-general: "I want Mark A. Reno, postmaster at Pontiac, removed. That is the town where I live. I have no charges to make against his official or personal character or conduct, except that he is a democrat, and an offensive partisan. He did all he could to defeat the republican presidential ticket and my election to congress; and I desire to make an example of him. I submit his case first, because I want to know what to do in other cases; and I want to have the department decide whether offensive partisanship is a sufficient cause for removal."

Mr. Reno informs us that he wrote to the department to ascertain whether this information was correct, and received a reply that it was.

It is clear to your committee that the motive for the numerous changes, more than sixty-four per cent. of all the presidential postmasters, has been in great measure political. Mr. Clarkson, in an interview sent through the Associated Press to all the leading newspapers of the country, is reported as saying: "The President has made no removals except for cause, for delinquency, inefficiency, or violation of law. He has refused to make any changes for partisan reasons." Our inquiries have led us to the conviction that this declaration can not be true; and, in our opinion, it would have been more just to have acknowledged the existence of political influences. This would have involved an inconsistency with the promises of the last republican platform, that the "spirit and purpose of the civil service law should be observed in all executive appointments." But, where the fact is as clearly established as it is in this case, the avowal of such inconsistency would have been far better than the attempt to conceal it by giving reasons for the changes, which, in point of fact, are not the real ones.

MR. CLARKSON AND MR. WANAMAKER.

It was indeed hardly to be expected "that the spirit of civil service reform" in the post-office department could be enforced through such instrumentalities as Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Wanamaker. Mr. Clarkson has been openly and conspicuously an opponent of the reform. At Boston, at Pittsburgh, and elsewhere, he has in public speeches endeavored to discredit the system to which his party pledged itself. His appointment as first assistant postmaster-general, gave him, we believe, control of a larger amount of patronage than that of any other officer appointed by the President.

The opposition of the postmaster-general to civil service reform has been less candid, but it has been no less intense. There are circumstances which have occurred since he has been in office, clearly showing his hostility to the platform of his own party in regard to this reform. Marshall Cushing, who afterward became his private secretary, undertook on his behalf an investigation of the present civil service system by addressing letters to a number of gentlemen interested in the reform, of which the following is one:

BOSTON ADVERTISER,
WASHINGTON OFFICE, D. C., Oct. 23, 1889. }
Confidential.

DEAR SIR—I have undertaken some investigations of the present civil service system for a cabinet officer, and beg to ask your distinguished assistance.

Why is the law and the commission subject to so much criticism at this time? What answer do the civil service reformers make to the objection that a civil pension list is the logical result of the present system; to the objection that, having certified enough clerks to last ten years, and having instituted yearly re-examinations, the commissioners are open to the charge of merely providing themselves with employment; to the objection that the efficiency of the departments will be seriously interfered with in ten or fifteen years by the old age of many of the clerks who can not be removed? Why should not both parties discard all their insincere professions for the law, and have the patriotism to go back to the old system, under which it was inquired simply whether the man was honest, capable and faithful to the constitution? How does the administration of President Harrison please the civil service reformers of the west? How has it compared in that respect with President Cleveland's administration?

What you write me, if I am honored with your confidence, will be merely for the eye of the cabinet officer referred to, and will not be printed. With the greatest respect, your obedient servant,

MARSHALL CUSHING.

HON. WILLIAM DUDLEY FOULKE, Richmond, Ind.

As this letter was unsolicited, and refers to a public matter only, the inquiries being made for a public officer and for public purposes, its contents can in no sense be regarded as confidential. It is believed that this is the first instance in which an inquiry instituted on behalf of a cabinet officer is based upon the assumption that the platform of the party upon which he came into power was insincere and unpatriotic.

The feeling of the postmaster-general toward civil service reform also appears in the statements made by him regarding Commissioner Roosevelt before the select committee of the house of representatives on reform in the civil service; and the report of this committee, which fully exonerated Mr. Roosevelt, is a severe commentary upon the groundlessness of the postmaster-general's allegations.

The postmaster-general's attitude toward the reform is further shown by his statement to Congressman Rockwell, of Massachusetts, who recommended the re-appointment of Gilbert W. Farrington, a democrat, as postmaster at Monson. Farrington was indorsed by the mass of the citizens and business men of that place, without regard to party, and his petition was then the only one on file. The statement made by Mr. Wanamaker, and taken down in writing by Mr. Rockwell, was as follows: "The postmaster-general declines to recommend to the President the appointment of a democrat unless it is clear that there is no republican to fill the place." It is not hard to divine the motive for removals and appointments under such an administration of this department.

Respectfully submitted,

WM. D. FOULKE, Chairman.

WITH the next number the CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE will close its second year. Its publication may end at that time, although it was intended to cover at least President Harrison's term. As has been stated, no one except the printer is paid anything for work upon the paper. It can not, however, enter into financial struggle or uncertainty. It has in the main occupied a field of its own in gathering from widely different sources facts of the actual working of the spoils system and printing them in a compact form. It is believed that this work has never before been done by any publication. As a weapon against that system, nothing else compares with it, not to mention the historical value of such a collection. This work ought to be done upon a greater scale, but the expense has been in the way. The managers have too much evidence from too many sources not to say frankly that the paper is abundantly appreciated. Being, however, a publication not for pecuniary profit, each friend is apt to think, sometimes in the case of his own subscription, that all other friends are supporting it and that it will go on forever. To the managers the work of the paper has been a labor that has brought its own ample reward. In case of discontinuance all unexpired subscriptions will be returned, and there will be no unpaid bills.

DURING the month some events have happened to the republicans of the state. Louis T. Michener has removed to Washington and entered into partnership with Dudley, who has been giving dinners to "attorneys, statesmen and federal officials" in honor of his new partner. This makes it very difficult to believe that Michener has not approved of Dudley's ways, which make the latter one of the greatest scoundrels out of, or for that matter, in prison. Michener sent here his resignation as chairman of the republican state committee and the committee met January 6 to receive it. For the vacated office, the Administration struggled in the old fashioned ward bummer style. William T. Steele, of Marion, Indiana, now governor of Oklahoma territory, came and acted as Administration Boss. Warren G. Sayre, of Wabash, now a member of some Indian commission, also came, as did other office-holders. Russell B. Harrison, son of the President, also came. Thus organized and led, the Administration proceeded to turn a hostile majority into a minority. It succeeded; just how does not appear. That it was the usual deal in which the people are to be the paymaster there is no doubt. This is an old practice, but that a President should so far forget the dignity of his office as to allow his son to go into a state where he is not a voter and does not live, and take part in struggles of party factions and join with office-holders appointed by his father, to influence the action of a party committee is a humiliation to the whole people. And the more so when it is done with reference, as in this case, to his father's renomination. After this meeting, The Indianapolis News of January 8 has the following relating to him:

He arrived at the New Denison hotel Monday evening and Tuesday night disappeared. This forenoon he walked into the hotel again.

"I thought you had gone," said a prominent republican.

"I did go but I am back."

"Where have you been?"

"Oh, I've been taking a quiet little run out over the state, doing a little work."

The friends of President Harrison believe it necessary that Indiana be kept in line.

The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under a republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all grades of the service to which it is applicable.—Republican National Platform, 1888.

Nearly two years have passed since President Harrison was inaugurated after election on that platform, and yet in not a single instance has the system been extended. In the meantime, the country is being filled with letter-carriers in all small cities and every one is the spoil of some congressman or local boss. There are dozens of offices of less than fifty employes, to which the system is in every sense applicable. Every friend of the Indians and all who are best able to say what the Indians need urge the extension of the system to that service. There is no pretence of argument against any of these extensions; it is simply not done. It would be interesting to know just what President Harrison understands by his position in the matter, for he approved the platform in writing. Does he wish it understood that he joined in a promise which he did not intend to keep? If not, why does he not keep it?

UNDER all political skies Maryland is despoiled. President Harrison made Bill Johnson postmaster in Baltimore, and he at the head of the republican ins has ever since been carrying on a tremendous war with some one at the head of the republican outs. The result of this and other similar transactions is that the republican party in Maryland is split in two, the factions being made up of the cold toes and the warm toes. Under the late administration Maryland gave great promise of becoming a republican state. The effect upon the Baltimore postoffice as a business institution has been disastrous and has made Mr. Wanamaker protest. The Civil Service Reformer says: "In addition, and of course, in explanation of this inefficiency, it is stated that the removals of the force left in by Postmaster Brown have been very numerous; as many, it appears, as one hundred and thirty among the carriers alone. Outside of the classified service there has been a clean sweep."

Among the multitude of good things said by Mr. Depew in his address at Pittsburg, this may be singled out as meriting a second reading: "That the fireman can become a locomotive engineer, the locomotive engineer the master mechanic, the master mechanic the superintendent of motive power, the superintendent of motive power the superintendent or general manager of the railway, and possibly its president, is the law of our American development and the source of our national pre-eminence." Mr. Depew rarely fails to hit the nail on the head. In this sentence he has admirably set forth a principle that bears upon every department of our complex life. It applies with equal force to all other vocations as well as to that of the railway man.—New York Tribune, Oct. 19, 1890.

But suppose Mr. Depew should inject into the above the stipulation that every railroad should only employ men of one political complexion and that "for the good of the service" there should be a clean sweep every four years. How would that look?

THE address of the Civil Service Reform Association, of Buffalo, written by Mr. Sherman S. Rogers, is published elsewhere and ought to be read by every one. It brings into strong light the limitations of our Commercial Club. This club has drawn a bill for the better government of this city, but, although the spoils system is the root and branch of bad city government, the club has evidently not even taken the trouble to post itself as to the means of getting rid of that system. Their bill is in brief a concentration of patronage distributing power. The fundamental evils such as have been in the police, the fire and street departments still remain. City after city is destroying the spoils system in its government, and it is discouraging that a club made up of the leading citizens of Indianapolis should seem to be unaware of the only distinctive progress that has been made in municipal government.

KICKING AGAINST THE PRICKS.

I.

THE old time civil service reformer who has been toughened by divers jokes and gibes of the "snivel" service order is appreciating that familiar observation that he laughs best who laughs last. For many months now he has been diverted by the wiggings and twistings and explanations and apologies of the spoilsmen, big and little. There have been two years of seeing Wanamaker cuffed about, his evasions brought to light in the most heartless manner and his equivocations exposed so often that his Sunday-school will surely soon have to bring him to account. General Wade Hampton, Commissioner Roosevelt and Mr. Foulke have all felt obliged to expose his tergiversations and all have done their work with much neatness and dispatch.

II.

THIS political census just finished seems full enough of humor to last for a decade. Census Supervisor Sid Conger, of this district, has evidently returned to the solace of fowl-raising for he is reported thus in the Indianapolis News of January 10:

"Sid Conger, of Flat Rock, is in the city. He says if the powers forgive him he will never again have anything to do with the taking of a census."

And the Civil Service Record, always mild and persistent and serious, buttonholes Porter thus:

"Commissioner of Census Porter declared before the congressional committee on civil service reform that his examinations for clerks were superior to the civil service examinations. We asked for samples of these papers to compare with the samples furnished by the civil service commissions, and especially to compare with the examinations for census clerks under the Massachusetts commission, and were told 'that it is impossible to furnish you with these documents.' Why it is 'impossible' we are not told. The examinations were held months ago, and if new ones should be held again, of course new questions would have to be asked."

III.

THE Raum family, too, have been an edifying sight since they were inducted into drawing wages from the public treasury. Commissioner Raum started in with a clever little scheme to beat the civil service law, which was promptly exposed and had to be hustled into an ignominious grave. Later the commissioner was put on the rack of a congressional investigation and had every appearance of having put into practice that vulgar saw that "public office is a private snap." Unabashed, however, Mr. Raum came out into Indiana to make campaign speeches with a happy result for Congressman Cooper who had been looking into the Raum way of doing business. Since the election the investigation has continued, and the following from the staunch and true Indianapolis Journal of January 20 must be authentic:

Green B. Raum, jr., was asked by Mr. Cooper the name of the man who took care of his horses. He replied that his name was O'Donnell, and when asked if the man was in the pension office said: "That is none of your business."

The committee admitted the questions, and Mr. Raum stated that O'Donnell was messenger at the pension office at $70 a month. He had been appointed by witness's father. O'Donnell did his duty and attended to witness's two riding horses after office hours, for which witness paid him. He refused to tell the compensation, saying it was none of Mr. Cooper's business.

Young Raum appears to have made Tweed's manner of meeting the public his study; all this must make the President wince.

IV.

BUT everything pales beside the spectacle of Ingalls ashamed of his old role of the Kansas Mephistopheles and tortured into a tea-custard and syllabub diletteism on the top of the frivolous and desultory sentimentalism of an epicene. What he said last May and how he squirmed over it by January must go side by side:

The purification of politics is an iridescent dream. Government is force. Politics is a battle for supremacy. Parties are the armies. The decalogue and the golden rule have no place in a political campaign. The object is success. To defeat the antagonist and expel the party in power is the purpose. In war it is lawful to deceive the adversary, to hire Hessians, to purchase mercenaries, to mutilate, to kill, to destroy. The commander who lost a battle through the activity of his moral nature would be the derision and jest of history. This modern cant about the corruption of politics is fatiguing in the extreme. It proceeds from the tea-custard and syllabub diletteism, the frivolous and desultory sentimentalism of epicenes.

He then referred to the newspaper interview with him several months ago, in which he had said that the golden rule and the decalogue had no place in an American campaign. It seemed superfluous to explain that in that utterance he was not inculcating a doctrine, but describing a condition. His statement was a statement of fact; not an announcement of faith. But many reverend and eminent divines; many disinterested editors; many ingenious orators perverted this utterance in a personal advocacy of impurity in politics. He did not complain. It was, as the world went, legitimate political warfare; but it was an illustration of the truth that the golden rule and the decalogue ought to have a place in political campaigns. "If the enemy smite thee on one cheek, turn the other" was a good precept to follow. But he would observe that until that precept was more generally observed than it had been, or was likely to be, if his political enemy smote him on one cheek, instead of turning to him the other, he would smite him under the butt end of his left ear if he could. [Laughter.] If that be political immorality, he must be included among the unregenerate.—Indianapolis Journal, Jan. 15.

V.

OF course we must have our joke in Indiana and Lawyer Brush does not stint in quality. The best of it is that the whole story is authentic. The Indianapolis Journal, of January 8, tells it as follows:

The only unpleasant incident of Tuesday's meeting was a speech by Mr. W. T. Brush, of Crawfordsville, in which he took it upon himself to say that the only way for republicans to carry Indiana was by the free use of money; that the state had been previously carried by this means, and that it could be done again, notwithstanding the Australian ballot law. There is no law to prevent Mr. Brush or any other man from making a fool of himself.

Lawyer Brush did not appear to think the Journal's version had enough touch and go. It is, perhaps, in a rather too heavy manner for comic writing, but the Journal refused to print Brush's version and it appeared in the Indianapolis News of January 10 and can not fail as an explanation to arouse the mirth of even the most effeminate civil service reformer:

William T. Brush, member of the republican state central committee from the eighth district, is very much put out over the sensation he caused by his speech before the republican conference at Indianapolis last Tuesday. His republican friends, upon reading the Sentinel's report of the affair, were very much disgusted, but his explanation has satisfied them that he made no such bad break as that paper claims. To-day Mr. Brush cheerfully consented to an interview.

"What makes me the maddest," said he, "is that the Indianapolis Journal, without investigation, seemingly, took for granted that the Sentinel's report was correct and proceeded to attack me. As soon as I saw the Sentinel's account I immediately wrote out from memory, as nearly as I could, the exact words that I said in that speech. I have written to the editor of the Journal in explanation, asking that he print my version of the speech, but no reply has come, and I don't expect any. I don't think the Journal, now that it has made a fool of itself, wants to do me justice."

Mr. Brush then read the speech as he had written it from memory, as follows:

Mr. Chairman:

In accordance with the motion passed at the last meeting of the central committee, I selected and sent to the secretary the names of five republicans from the eighth district to serve on this committee of sixty-five to prepare and submit plans and specifications for beating the democrats in 1892. I don't see any of the gentlemen selected here, and suppose their absence is to be accounted for on the ground that they have no plans to submit to the committee. I do not myself think this kind of a meeting amounts to much. It partakes too much of the nature of a post-mortem into the causes of defeat. We have already had one meeting of that kind. It was called to formulate plans of re-organization for the next campaign, and not for the display of oratory; but so far, while the districts from one to eight have been called, and responses have been received from three or four gentlemen from each, no plan for future action has been suggested, save the establishment of a cheap newspaper and the infusion of more harmony into the party. The burden of the speeches so far heard seems to be to convince us that some accident befell us in November, and that we were not really beaten at all. Let us not deceive ourselves into the belief that it was an accident, or that the lack of a cheap newspaper and the want of harmony did it. The fact is there are more democrats than republicans in Indiana, and a larger proportion of them voted last fall. Any poll of the state made within the last twenty years which shows it to be anything but democratic is wrong. That being the case, anybody can see that we have either to convert democrats to our faith or otherwise induce them to vote our ticket. Heretofore when the right kind of inducements were used we succeeded, and when not we got left, and we always will. The means of conversion and the inducements held out in the last campaign, it seems, were not sufficient. The democrats attribute their late victory to the existence of the Australian election law, and perhaps they are right about that, but I can't tell whether it made more democrats or lessened the number of republicans. If it did either we want to work some plan to circumvent the system, because we need more voters on our side, and we will have to get them or get left, in spite of cheap newspapers, more harmony and everything else. The plans used in 1880 and 1888 put us through in fine style, and the eighth district submits them for your consideration, if you can recollect what they were. The committee is to select a new chairman to-day, and I am in favor of finding a man for the place with a big head on him; one who has brains enough to know what to do, when to do it, and who has the nerve to do it when the time comes.

"Now, that is the whole thing. I never mentioned the words 'Harrison,' 'boodle' or 'money,' and no one interrupted me with a question, or with a remark of any kind. The people who were there will testify to this fact; but I don't believe the Journal had a reporter there, or it would never have followed the course it did.

"The speech was made, not in a serious vein, but to be laughed at, and it was taken in that way by all present. All the districts (before the eighth) had been represented by long-winded speakers who did nothing but whine over the past. I wanted to get them out of that rut and put a little life into things."

VI.

AS IF Brush's erratum were not embarrassing enough, The Delphi Journal joins in. It is all the more embarrassing for the President and Mr. Wanamaker because The Delphi Journal is a subsidized sheet. Its editor is postmaster and not only advocates buying votes, but flouts those who reprehend the practice. That puts the President and the postmaster-general, politically speaking, in a hole, for how can they indorse the following:

Mr. William T. Brush, of Crawfordsville, a good lawyer, a stalwart republican, and a most agreeable gentleman, appears to have thrown the staid and tight-laced Indianapolis Journal into a fit of hysterics. According to the Indianapolis Journal, which would fain appear to the world as prim, stately, saintly and virtuous as old Aunt Phoebe, who always sits at the head of the quilting frame, Mr. Brush has been guilty of an unpardonable sin. At a recent meeting of the leading republicans of the state, who met for consultation, the Journal alleges that Mr. Brush made the statement that the republicans could not carry the state in '92 without the use of money. And the truly good, pious party organ, taking this as a text, proceeds to denounce Mr. Brush as "a fool" and place him in bad odor generally. Nay, more; the sanctified expounder of republican principles at the state capital cries in a loud voice and would have the world know that Mr. Brush is the only bad man in the republican party in Indiana who has ever hinted at such a profane idea, and that the other members of the recent conference indignantly repudiated his expressions in the conference. The Journal then goes on and attributes the victories won by the republicans in this state to the "resistless tide of public opinion," "boundless enthusiasm" and the Lord, and attempts to make itself and the dear people believe that the two-dollar bill has not been "in it" at all. All of which has a tendency to make any one but a hypocrite and a pharisaical political psalm singer very tired.

Worse than all, their editor postmaster seems to gibe at the President and Mr. Wanamaker for being religious men. Of the campaign of 1888, he says:

We admit that there was much "boundless enthusiasm," "overwhelming popular uprising" and Lord business in the last campaign, but none of these touched the "floater."

Calmly and serenely he sat on the fence and asked for "turkey."

The democrat might talk to him about free trade and the republican about protection, but he would quietly whistle a little ditty and then ask, "What'll you give?" And then it was simply a question of who would give the most. The republicans generally got the best of it for the simple reason that the democratic workers insisted on putting the greater portion of the boodle intrusted to them into their own pockets. These are facts, and if the Indianapolis Journal is not acquainted with them it should come out in the country and consult some of the workers on the political history of the state. The republicans were driven to use money in elections in this state. The ugly business was forced upon them by democrats. They would have been a lot of noodles to have done anything else than fight the devil with his own fire.

And in conclusion:

If the Indianapolis Journal expects to ride to republican victory in this state in 1892 by dishing out to republican workers the tepid "pap" of civil service reform, and by recklessly abusing such stalwart, ever-vigilant party leaders as William T. Brush, it will be worse fooled than the celebrated character who attempted to weather the fires of hades by enlacing his carcass in a cotton jacket.

Ordinarily, one might expect to see an employe dismissed for such language, as being not only immoral, but showing contempt for his superior officers; but when this editor wanted about a year ago the Delphi postoffice, and the high spoils distributors seemed cold, he proceeded to warm them as follows—and got his office forthwith:

If, when John C. New, of the Journal, asked for the London consulship, he had been informed that Cleveland's appointee would be retained, what a blue tinge the air would have taken on. And how Dan Ransdell and W. H. H. Miller and Porter and Huston, and all the rest of them, would have howled in agony if civil service slop had been doled out to them. Under these circumstances would the Indianapolis Journal be feeding the pampered, weak-minded, scrofulous child on choice bonbons? No, indeed. The Indianapolis Journal would have been a center from which greased lightning would have darted in all directions. The Journal ought to know that it is of infinitely more importance to satisfy the working republicans in the outcounties on this point than the prominent politicians of that paper and in Indianapolis. For the outcounties give the republican majorities. * * * * *

We can see that President Harrison is merely executing the law as it now is. This is all right. But unless the present congress relieves him of the law by wiping it out of existence they will show to the country that they lack the courage of their convictions, that they are not in harmony with the republican sentiment of the country.

Let Congressman Cheadle go ahead. Let him force his bill to a vote. We want to see the names of the cowards who are tarred with the same stick that has made the names of Roosevelt, Curtis, et al. odoriferous to a purgative extent.

AN OLD-TIME MUGWUMP.

It seems that Attorney-General Miller was formerly guilty of the crime of being a mugwump. In 1872, being then a lawyer in Fort Wayne, he made a speech against the administration of General Grant which was very greatly to his credit. This was August 31, 1872, and the speech fills six columns of The Fort Wayne Sentinel of September 2, following. Of this speech which everyone ought to read and which displays throughout a high standard of ability to distinguish public evils and gives in every line evidence of independent thought and action, we can give only a few extracts. He says to fugitives from the effete despotisms of the old world:

I ask you, citizens of America by adoption, who have fled from the despotisms and family distinctions of the old world, whether a President who regards his high office, with all of its patronage and power, as mere family property; and a vice-president, who commenced his political life as a know-nothing, taking an oath that he would never support or countenance the election of a foreign-born citizen to any office, are according to your idea of a republican government?

And to Irishmen:

I ask the Irishmen of the land whose ancestors have for centuries, and whose fathers and brothers are to-day writhing beneath the heel of a carpet-bag government, whether they are in favor of maintaining such governments in the south? I ask all citizens of every class whether you are in favor of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in time of profound peace; of keeping alive forever the hates and enmities of the past; of the use by the President of his whole first term in manipulating and purchasing a second? * * *

Talk of civil service reform, with Tom Murphy, through his tool, Chester A. Arthur, assisted by Leet and Stocking still running the New York custom-house; with brother-in-law Casey, notoriously steeped in corruption, still holding the most important federal office in New Orleans, and with brother-in-law Cramer, misrepresenting the American name and disgracing the American people and the American pulpit at Copenhagen; with Butler, the worthy representative of his notorious uncle, rioting and reveling as consul-general in Egypt, with good men and true being daily removed from office for daring to doubt the wisdom of Grant's re-election, with assessments being daily levied on all government clerks and employes for the purpose of carrying on the administration campaign in direct violation of these pretended regulations; * * * * * with the heads of the departments scattered from Maine to Oregon, using all the influence, patronage and money at their command to bolster the failing fortunes of their chief.

It is true that in seeming derogation of the foregoing sentiments, Mr. Miller is now perhaps the most influential member of an administration which has set off a very large share of patronage "as mere family property." And if the President, whom he much admires, is not manipulating for a second term on a scale never known before then all signs fail. And it must be admitted that for many years Mr. Miller has not been heard to lift up his voice in favor of civil service reform, although Wanamaker, Clarkson, Noble, Nathan, Willis, Warmouth, Johnson and others under his very nose revel and riot in spoil. And many "good men and true" have been removed from office by him. Neither does he prosecute plain cases of assessments nor encourage such prosecutions, although the evidence is so plain that if pressed the culprits would likely throw themselves upon the mercy of the court. Canting Phari-sees may urge these objections to Mr. Miller, but this ought not to detract from a just and large admiration of him as a fearless and independent young man in 1872, and as a worthy example.

INDIAN PROSPECTS.

The spoils system in the Indian service goes bravely on. It is not surprising that the party in the spoils machine who is responsible for the reckless order to, in effect, kidnap Sitting Bull should be kept concealed. And solely out of our system of spoiling the Indians with bogus agreements, bogus supplies and bogus officers came the massacre of Wounded Knee Creek, in which we have the honor of having killed sixty-three women and children. It turns out, also, according to Mr. Welsh, and undisputed statements from all quarters, that the administration appointed as agent at Pine Ridge a man named Royer because he had rendered conspicuous services to some boss in a county convention in South Dakota. One day an attempt was made to arrest an Indian in front of the agency, but he drew a knife and got away. Royer at once took a bee-line for the nearest railroad station and telegraphed for troops, and did not return to the agency until the troops had gone first and made sure of his own precious safety. President Harrison and Secretary Noble built up their own spoils machine in the Indian country in contempt of the advice and protests of those who had known and worked for the Indians many years. The fine-working qualities of their machine are illustrated by the fact that that when trouble came, and their Indian agents should have been of inestimable service, as, in effect, fathers of their people, the administration had to put out a whole grist of them, and appoint in their places army officers of honesty and capacity, and experience with the Indians. Royer went with the rest, remarking with incomparable brass that his removal had been brought about "by political influences, jealousy, and at a time when the Dakota delegation in congress was at home looking after an election." Whether any permanent improvement will, under this administration, be the outcome of the present Indian troubles seems doubtful. It is announced that none of the henchmen who posed as agents have been permanently removed except the abused Royer. This means that as soon as it seems safe for them to again become a part of the Indian spoils machine they will be allowed to do so. The instructions from Washington to Captain Pierce, the new agent at Pine Ridge, are not to clear out the barnacles he may find in the service at that agency, though that would be the only way to carry out the boasted rule of the spoilsmen that the man who is responsible for an office should have the appointment of his subordinates. He is ordered to look over his subordinates and make report to Washington as to such as he can not keep, with explicit reasons in detail for his objections. This simply means that the reasons are to be referred to the congressmen who own these henchmen, and who will either bully the administration into keeping them, or will foist upon Captain Pierce another crowd of the same stripe. The bottom of all this is, that President Harrison has determined to take a hand in securing his own re-nomination, and he is afraid to offend congressmen. He has precedents before him to show that a re-nomination by a party machine, bought with patronage, does not insure re-election.

Several thousand miners have sent in a petition to the Indiana state legislature to the effect that the great hazard connected with their work renders it an outrage to appoint as mine inspector a man who knows nothing about mines and mining. It is stated that Governor Hovey appointed for this important position a farmer who knew nothing about mining. A bill has been introduced to have the state inspector of mines appointed by the state geologist instead of by the governor and that there shall be a pass examination.

Pass examinations were discredited years ago. They offer no protection against favoritism and are no bar to incompetency. Tammany uses them in New York for its braves and finds them no inconvenience. Unless the legislature is willing to let all applicants have an equal chance by means of competitive examinations, it is quite as proper to let Governor Hovey go on frankly appointing farmers as mine inspectors who may draw the salary of $1,500 and thus be paid for political work.

Dr. R. French Stone, one of the pension examiners at this point, has been removed, and Dr. S. A. Elbert, a negro, appointed. At its meeting, January 20, the Marion County Medical Society, forty members being present, unanimously resolved:

WHEREAS, The various boards of examiners for pensions were created by the government for the purpose of fairly adjusting the claims of wounded and disabled soldiers; and,

WHEREAS, It was the intention of the law that these boards should be composed of intelligent and reputable physicians in order that justice might be done to both the soldiers and the government: therefore,

Resolved, That the recent action of the president of the United States in removing from the board of pension examiners of Indianapolis an honorable member of this society and a veteran union soldier, in order to give place to one who is not, and who never has affiliated with the profession, and who does not possess the necessary qualifications for the important trust thus committed to his hands, is a base and inexcusable prostitution of the office of pension examiner to partisan purposes, and an insult to every reputable physician in this city and state.

Resolved, That the secretary is instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States and to the daily papers of this city.

Elsewhere are given illustrations of the institution known as the primary or caucus. It is not lovely. These examples are of the noisier variety and their sharp practice is coarser, but in the main they do not misrepresent the spirit which governs these meetings. In the better bred neighborhoods the tricks are slicker. For instance, lately we heard one of the better element complain that at the caucus in his ward the usual allowance of five minutes for difference in watches was not made, and when he got to the place of meeting five minutes late, not only had the delegates been chosen but every one who had taken part in the choosing had vanished. The workers never tire of saying that those who object to their delegates and candidates should attend the primaries and choose better ones, well knowing that if this were the only way of putting them down they would stay up a long while. At the primaries they are invincible, but at the polls they are becoming more and more helpless. No duty of contending in a primary with rough and ready rounders or with smooth tricksters rests upon a citizen. So long as millions a year are to be fought over as spoil, this will continue, and in the meantime it is the duty of citizens to have no bowels of compassion for parties or persons at the polls.

A new republican club, with Roger Wolcott as president, has been organized in Massachusetts. It is composed of men whose sincerity and patriotism will not be questioned, and who will have to save the republican party, if it is saved at all, from the Dudleys, Quays and Ingallses. The club demands, among other things:

That this club authorizes a committee of the members, to be selected by the president, to urge upon the President of the United States the extension of civil service reform, and increased appropriations for that purpose.

We understand that a representative of this club, together with Congressman Lodge, Mr. Roosevelt, and Mr. Sherman S. Rogers, have called upon the President to urge him to extend the operations of the civil service law and were courteously received.

Theodore Roosevelt has "An Object Lesson in Civil Service Reform" in the February Atlantic Monthly.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE has been regularly sent for some months to the libraries of about four hundred colleges over the country. In some instances the gift has been acknowledged. It is requested that the trouble be taken to state whether the paper has been received and is on file for general reading.

SMUG MR. WANAMAKER.

[From the last report of the postmaster-general.]

1. I hope to see the civil service examinations, especially with reference to the railway mail, improved.

2. A year's experience confirms me in the judgment formed twelve months ago, that the civil service system, as applied to the rosters of the post-office department, is susceptible of improvement. The examinations for the inspector force and for the railway mail service ought to be made more difficult, so that the candidates for places will better stand the test of actual work.

3. The inspector can not be capable unless he is full of resources and alertness.

[Comments by the civil service commission.]

1. The commission has never received a hint that its examinations were not proper.

The individual commissioners have repeatedly told the general superintendent of the railway mail service that they were anxious to get any advice about these examinations, and would at once remedy any defect.

2. The commission is strongly of the opinion that in most cases this force can be best supplied by promotion of men already in the post office department, which contains in the neighborhood of 17,000 classified employees. The commission, however, is confident that it can supply a reasonable number of good post-office inspectors from its open examinations, and is surprised to learn that the postmaster-general does not regard these examinations as satisfactory. They are of the same kind as those that were used in the department itself before these employees were classified, with the exception that from being pass examinations they are now made competitive. Of the seventeen men appointed from the commission's list to these places during the year and a half that has just elapsed, sixteen are now in the service. Only one has resigned or been dismissed. Any system that produces such results can not be said to be ineffective or to work badly. In any event, the commission is convinced that it will be most detrimental to the public interests to go back to the old method of treating the appointments of these post-office inspectors as so much patronage. More effort has been made to have these post-office inspectors put back under the patronage system than has been the case in regard to any other branch of the classified service. Every member of the commission has been approached by influential politicians, asking that post-office inspectors should be excepted from examination; and in almost every instance where the request has been made it has been based upon the ground that the post-office inspectors in office when the service was classified had been appointed chiefly for political reasons. One of the commissioners has himself seen a letter in which a very prominent political leader was urging this change, and urging the appointment of a post office inspector in his district frankly for the reason that he wished to know about the political attitude of the various local postmasters. Another of the commissioners was frankly told by a political leader of great importance in a certain state, that he wished the inspectors to be excepted from examination, because from the nature of their office they were calculated to render such very important political service; and inasmuch as the previous inspectors, then in office, had rendered this service to the out-going administration, the gentleman referred to desired that their suc-

4. It is estimated by the railway mail office that the proportion of railway mail eligibles who fail to fill the requirements of that exacting employment is a quarter or a third of all those examined.

5. The railway postal clerk can not be efficient unless he has physical endurance.

6. Nor is it truth—and it will not stand the test of time—to reiterate over and over again that the railway mail service, which had been made the most effective body of civil servants in the United States under an old established merit system of its own, was basely prostituted to partisan ends when this administration of the post-office department was busying itself with putting back these trusty and tried men in the places of persons whose room was more valuable than their bungling assistance, and with waiting for the tardy certification of eligibles.

sors should render equal political assistance to the in-coming administration.

4. The records show that, of the 1,525 eligibles appointed in the railway mail service from our examinations up to June 30, 1890, about 145 have resigned or been removed. There were but thirty-one removals; and doubtless many, if not most, of those who resigned did so of their own free will, and should not by rights be included at all in these figures. In other words, instead of one-third, only one-eleventh have been separated from the service. The others (over 90 per cent. of the whole number) are still in; and the commission had assumed, not unnaturally, that they would not be retained if they did not give satisfaction, inasmuch as the commission stands ready at any time to fill the places of any dismissed, and inasmuch as it is a cardinal doctrine of the commission that any government employee should be promptly dismissed if he fails to do satisfactory work.

5. We require now a surgeon's certificate as to the applicant's good health and strength. Moreover, part of the examination is, as the postmaster-general doubtless knows, the six months' probationary test.

6. The system of examinations and tests applied after appointment, under which the postmaster-general says the railway mail service had become the most effective body of civil servants in the United States, has been preserved intact, without an iota of change under the civil service rules; and, in addition, an entrance test has been prescribed in the form of an open, competitive examination, which takes the place of the practice in vogue before the civil service rules were applied to this service—of allowing members of congress and others to nominate to the department the persons to be appointed.

This sentence refers to the changes made immediately after the present administration took office, between March 4 and May 1, 1889, the latter being the date on which the railway mail service was classified. According to the only authorities accessible to the commission, there were some 1,500 removals or over during these eight weeks, at least a third and perhaps a half of the employees appointed during the preceding four years being removed at this time. All of those employees had been appointed under the patronage system. It is clear, then, from the postmaster-general's own statement, that under the patronage system of making appointments, a very large proportion—probably a half—of those appointed are of such poor quality that even after several years' service they do their work in a manner so bungling as to render their presence in the department a drawback, not an advantage. Comparing this with the results achieved during the last year and a half under the system of open, competitive examinations, the enormous superiority of the latter is observable at a glance from the postmaster-general's own report.

Under the law, the civil service examiners are detailed to the commission from the various departments. The post-office department until within the last two months has been very backward in thus detailing examiners. Not an examiner was detailed to the commission from the railway mail service until a year and a quarter after this service had been classified, and only then when the commission, after repeated requests for the detail, was obliged to notify the department that it would no longer be able to do the work for the railway mail service unless the detail was given it. Thus for a year and a half the entire work of the commission for this branch of the service was performed by men detailed from other departments of the government, who had to neglect the work of the departments from which they were detailed in order to perform the work of examining, marking, and certifying applicants for positions in the postal service.

Let me briefly mention one or two special causes for Thanksgiving:

1. Civil Service Reform. I see progress in this direction, and I will tell you why. You know that when the present administration came into office, it came in with the most distinct pledges that the civil service was to be non-partisan; it was to be more impartially managed than ever during the previous administration. The promise was clear, and they were elected and put in power upon that understanding. And what has been the result?

The great post-office department, which is so closely connected with the life of the people; which has to do with every county, every town, every village, every little hamlet in the land, which has nothing to do with politics, for it makes no difference whether the postmaster who handles your letters is democrat or republican, Presbyterian, Episcopalian, Roman Catholic, or even atheist, so that he does his work intelligently and honestly—this great department is the field above all others where reform was most needed. The service required to be made non-partisan, and the promise was given that it should be. Well, we all know that the postmaster-general violated his promises most shamefully. His first assistant postmaster—a Mr. Clarkson—has boasted that he has removed thousands and thousands of postmasters for partisan reasons, to put in members of his own party, and not to improve the service. And this was done with the hope and expectation that this would benefit the political prospects of the party that did it. And what have the people said? Why all over the country, and right in the very section which claims Mr. Clarkson as one of its leading men, the verdict of disapproval has come. The people have said, "This won't do. Step down; we are masters, and we will show you what we think of men who break their solemn pledges and promises." Will anybody tell me that after this popular verdict, any party will dare to think that they can strengthen themselves by prostituting the civil service to partisan and dishonorable uses? Hence I seem to see that out of this evil progress has come in the civil service idea.—From the Thanksgiving Sermon of Rev. Hall Harrison.

The spoils system is a system of brutal iniquity. [Cries of "Good!" and applause.] I have chosen my words carefully, simply to describe it with scientific accuracy. [Laughter and applause.] With your permission I will give one or two instances to bear out the words I have used, although they are instances that I have quoted to certain gentlemen here present on another occasion. Of the two instances, I shall take one happening under the last and one under the present administration. One of the most painful things in connection with my duties as a civil service reformer is being brought in contact with so much wrong that I am powerless to right, to remedy, or to attempt to remedy in any way. We have a very wise rule forbidding re-instatements of people in the government service who are out more than a year; for, if we allow people to re-enter after a greater time than that, there would be apt to be in the beginning of each administration a wholesale putting in of men dismissed under the preceding administration. It is a rule generally right, though of course in individual cases it works harshly.

A poor woman came to me early in my service as commissioner, to ask if she could not be re-instated. She had been turned out some two or three years before, and had been a clerk in the government office at Washington. She was a widow, with two children. A certain senator had need of her place. It was at the time not in the classified service. He wanted it for a henchman of his own. He had notified the division chief of the department that he needed that place. The division chief summoned the lady, and told her that he was very sorry for her, but she had to go.

I wish to say here that I want to condemn the system rather than the men who did wrong under it. The senator who made the request made a request simply for a vacancy, and did not know anything about the hardship of the case or the person who had to be turned out; and the division chief who had to do the turning out acted under compulsion and with extreme reluctance. The woman came to her chief, and told him she was absolutely dependent on the salary she had—that it meant bread to herself and children and a roof to cover them; that she had been in the service some thirteen or fourteen years, and had entirely lost all connection with any of her former friends. There was no place where she could go, and no niche that would be open for her.

She worked very much on the sympathy of the division chief, who said: "Go you back. I will keep you in." She went, and was kept about six weeks more. But down came the senator. His man was clamorous. The senator said it was no use talking, he had to have the place, that the thing must be done. The thing was done.

The woman was turned out. She did manage to pick up a little work here and there—enough to keep herself and her children insufficiently fed and insufficiently clad. She managed to just live.

The woman came to me and told me her case. I told her how keenly I appreciated the wrong she had suffered, but that, if we established a precedent in this case, it would entail our helping hundreds of other cases who would not have been worthy of help. The woman was perfectly reasonable in the matter, and saw the position in which we were placed. She said, "Of course, I understand how you are situated; but it is a little hard for me to live on one meal a day."

Now, I fail to see how any person can be brought in contact with instances of this kind and not feel that the spoils system is an outrage on American manhood; and no man of self-respect, with the least spark of manhood in him, can support such a system.—From the Address of Hon. Theodore Roosevelt Before the Commercial Club in Boston, Dec. 20, 1890. Printed in Full in January Civil Service Record.

"Let the man who is too good and too conceited to belong to either party go to the primaries and see that good men are chosen, instead of staying away and then kicking against the candidates."

Party Boss.

If a gang of wild beasts had taken possession of Parnell Hall Saturday night, they could not have made more noise than the seventy-five delegates who assembled there to nominate two democratic candidates for aldermen in the fifth district. The mercury registered something near ninety degrees. In the hall, thirty by forty feet in dimensions, were crowded the seventy-five delegates and a hundred spectators who were present to see that there was "fair play between man and man," as they announced. There is a saloon beneath this little hall, and of course all the spectators and delegates had looked in the bottom of a glass before they went upstairs. This prosperous saloon-keeper also kept cigars which he sold for the moderate price of 2½ cents each.

There were three small windows in the room, through which there was danger of some fresh air circulating, but seven or eight thoughtful young men, who were present as ornaments only, were kind enough to stand in these air passages, and thus make it utterly impossible for the air to get in, or the tobacco (?) smoke to get out.

Tom Mahoney elbowed his way through the crowd and mounted a platform, the base of which was on a level with the heads of the delegates. He stroked his flowing mustache once, and then announced that he was ready for business. In a twinkling a half-dozen persons had been proposed for chairman, and every time Mr. Mahoney would attempt to ask for a vote the friends of each man proposed would set up a yell that would drown out his voice. Mr. Mahoney concluded he would just let them yell, and folding his arms he posed on his high perch and calmly said: "I am at your services, gentlemen."

Pretty soon an idea struck Pat Kelley, of the twenty-fifth ward, and mounting his chair and shaking his head like an orator reaching a climax he said: "Mr. Cheerman, in the interest of harmony I nominate John Rail for cheerman of the convintion." There was a chorus of "yes's" and a chorus of "no's," and then some one raised the point that the chairman had to be taken from among the delegates. Finally Chas. Gauss, the nominee for council in the twenty-fourth ward, was elected with a whoop.

Julius Reinecke, John Reardon, John Blackwell and Peter Carson were placed in nomination. It was decided that a majority of all the votes cast would nominate. The balloting was carried on amid confusion. The vote on the first ballot was as follows: Reinecke 20, Reardon 27, Blackwell 22, and Carson 9. There was little change in the vote until the eighth ballot, when Blackwell received 41 votes and was nominated.

There was a great uproar for a few minutes, and the ballot was taken for the second candidate. As Reinecke's friends had helped to nominate Blackwell, it was supposed Blackwell's supporters would now come to Reinecke, and that they did. On this ballot but seventy-six votes were cast, and of this number Reinecke received thirty-nine, Reardon thirty-five and Carson two. Reinecke had received the majority of all the votes cast, and his friends immediately set up a gleeful yell that stirred the hot blood in the fighting Celtic sons of the twenty fifth ward. Pat Kelley gave his head an infuriated toss, and the fun began. The friends of Reardon pretended that he had been counted out. They maintained that seventy-eight votes had been cast, and that Mr. Reinecke must have forty to nominate him. Mr. Kelley, with a voice like a fog horn, was heard above everybody else.

"We will have our rights, Mr. Cheerman," said he. "We come here not to be bull-dozed, but to receive fair treatment as between man and man, and that we will have, Mr. Cheerman."

Chairman Gauss, as he stood on his elevated perch, was the picture of distress. He feared personal violence if he declared Reinecke the nominee, so he stood there and made speeches. He must have made twenty-five, and this is what he said every time: "Gentlemen, I have announced the vote as it is before me. If you can't agree it is no fault of mine." His twenty-sixth speech was a little more elaborate. He begged for mercy. "You ought to understand my position," said he. "It was unfortunate that I should have been called to preside over this meeting. I have the vote as it was cast, and yet if I announce it you will come over into my ward and knife me for council."

The wrangling was kept up for an hour and a half, and then Reinecke's followers withdrew from the hall. The followers of Reardon remained to argue with Mr. Gauss, and would probably have been there until daylight had not Reardon withdrawn from the race, and advised them to support this nominee. A little before midnight the lights were turned out, and the disappointed were forced to seek the street cars.

There appears undoubtable evidence of deep treachery in the party ranks, and it is not surprising to find Councilman Markey as the supposed conspirator. To accomplish his purpose he appears to have turned his knife upon his own relatives, or such of them as he found were not of his own way of thinking. It was given out that Markey's relatives, particularly John Reardon, candidate for alderman, were receiving all the support that Markey and the corporations could give him. Everybody turned in to help defeat the supposed corporation candidates, and in doing this helped on Markey's real candidates. John Blackwell, the nominee for alderman, is understood to have secured, through Markey, a position as engineer at the Insane Hospital. Michael Toole, a relative of Markey's, who didn't want a public place, and who, through Markey's influence, secured a position as spotter on the street railway lines, voted against Reardon. John German, a twenty-third ward delegate, says Rail—who was ostensibly Reardon's friend—advised him to vote against Reardon. The Indianapolis Gas Company's employees were present in strength doing Markey's bidding—and one of them, by the way, on Markey's renomination, presented him with a cane.

The point of it all is that Markey's supporters, who had been understood all along to be for Reardon, when it came to voting all turned to the other fellows. It was a cute trick, but it was carried too far. Markey's relatives can hardly be expected to complain, but their friends and a legion of democrats are in open rebellion. An independent candidate is almost a certainty. Reardon has declared himself for the whole democratic ticket, but the solid democrats down that way who are not restrained by personal relations will settle all of their disaffection by voting against Markey. They say he has represented corporations instead of the people; that he brought corporation agents to the primaries from every nook and corner. Fred Hoffer, grocer, head of many benevolent societies, will probably be the independent democratic nominee for council against Markey. As a bit of good politics the democrats hope the republicans will indorse the independent. Mr. Hohlt is also being considered as a possibility.—Indianapolis News, September 2, 1889.

II.

Everything was "cut and dried" for the re-nomination of Thomas Markey in the twenty-third ward, and it was practically useless for the opposition to attempt to change the prearranged programme. Markey had the party machinery at his command, being himself ward committeeman, and he was shrewd enough to use it to good advantage. Yesterday afternoon the opposers of Markey saw the way the fight was going, and they persuaded all the opposition candidates to withdraw but W. H. Hohlt. Mr. Hohlt was acceptable to all those who didn't want to see Markey re-nominated, and his friends felt confident that he would be nominated.

It was an enormous crowd that blocked the street in front of the engine house for half an hour before time for the primary to begin. There must have been nearly 500 men, all of whom claimed to be democratic voters in the twenty-third ward. When the meeting was called to order by Robert Keller, one of Markey's friends moved that Con. Sullivan (said to be a relative of Markey's) be made permanent chairman. The supporters of Hohlt named another man, but the Markey crowd set up a yell that was deafening, and, while the uproar was going on, Sullivan was declared elected chairman. As Sullivan mounted the chairman's table, some one called out: "Look out; he knocked out Kilrain."

As soon as Sullivan had the meeting in hand for his principal, an effort was made to carry out a scheme of the Markey-Reardon crowd. Young Albert Lieber offered a resolution which provided that three gentlemen (naming them) should constitute a committee to select delegates to the aldermanic convention. The persons named were at once recognized as supporters of Reardon, and one hundred voices were raised in chorus against the presentation of such a resolution. Mr. Lieber saw he could not get the resolution through at that time, and he announced that he would withdraw it for the present.

Chairman Sullivan then announced that nominations for councilman were in order. August Kuhn nominated Thomas Markey, and forthwith some relatives of Markey in the crowd moved that the nomination be made by acclamation.

"Not much you won't," yelled the crowd. "No, everybody's got to have a show," said Chairman Sullivan, as he called for more nominations.

William H. Hohlt was then placed in nomination, and so was Philip Wolf. The latter at once withdrew and requested that his friends support Hohlt. Another effort was made to have Markey declared the nominee by acclamation, but the crowd objected so strenuously that the chairman didn't dare to carry out the scheme and entertain a resolution of that kind.

The arrangements for going through the farce of voting was then made. Everybody was driven out of the engine house, and the front and rear doors locked. The tellers were then stationed at a side door, where they received the votes in a hat as the crowd pushed into the house again. No effort was made to prevent non-residents from voting, and there were charges that Markey had many supporters there from every ward, from the insane hospital to Irvington.

Markey and his gang had planned well. It was arranged that when the crowd should be turned out of the engine house, the Markey gang should take up their positions near the side door where the votes were to be taken. The plan was carried out, and the first 200 votes taken in were nearly all for Markey. When the Markey ringsters thought about all the votes for their candidate were in, some one of them burst open the front door to the engine house and the crowd surged out and around to the little side door where the ballots were being taken. There was but one thing to do, and that was to close the ballot-box (hats). More than one hundred men were still in line, waiting their turn to vote, and they all had Hohlt tickets in their hands. They protested loudly, and demanded that the entire vote be taken over again, but the protests counted for nothing. The tellers, who were, of course, Markey men, said they could not be held responsible for the doors being opened, and to avoid the confusion they went up stairs to a private seance to count the vote.

The Hohlt supporters, disgusted, went home, and then it was Reardon's (Markey's brother-in-law) chance to have his supporters chosen as delegates to the aldermanic convention. The Lieber resolution, which had been hooted down once, was adopted with a whoop and a hurrah. The committee of three retired, one of them pulled from his pocket a list of delegates Reardon had selected, it was pronounced all right, and the report was made to the meeting, which was now composed exclusively of Markey-Reardon supporters. Of course no one objected to the list of delegates.

There was a little wait, and then the teller came down the stairway smiling and announced that Markey had received 209 votes and Hohlt 125. There was some applause, and a call for Markey, to which he replied after the stereotyped fashion.—Indianapolis News, August 31, 1889.

III.

The nastiness of gang politics was faithfully pictured in the twenty-second ward last night, where a most disgraceful affair took place. A dirty struggle to elect a gang committeeman has disgusted the better element of the republican party in the ward. The so-called "convention" was held in a vacant storeroom in the Bristol Block on Virginia avenue. Mike Toomey, the clerk of the board of aldermen, is the authorized agent of the Tin Horn crowd in that ward, and it was known that he would capture the convention by high-handed methods, if such a thing were possible and necessary. Early in the evening a number of business men and good citizens who have not attended a primary for years arrived, and it was sought to have decency and fair play. But they did not know the gang. At 8 o'clock one of Toomey's subalterns carried a starch box into the room. Ostensibly it was to be used as a ballot-box, but the subaltern sat with his arms about the box and no one could get near it. When John Howard, the old committeeman, called the meeting to order, Toomey and his cohorts, composed in part of a gang of potatoe peddlers, democrats, ward heelers and sluggers, arrived. Mr. Howard attempted to have a permanent chairman elected.

This started the row. Toomey sprang on a chair, and, waving a dirty piece of paper, shouted that he had been appointed temporary committeeman by the city committee, and he at once assumed to be chairman of the meeting. Pandemonium broke loose then. John A. Porter was nominated for committeeman by Howard and Charles Egger was nominated by Toomey. Porter's friends insisted that no democrats should be allowed a voice in the proceedings and should be asked to go out. To this Toomey objected.

"How can you tell who are democrats," he shouted.

"We know them, and know who has them here," yelled the other side. "Let the police come in and put them out."

"No policeman can take any one out of here," howled the Tin Horn crowd. Howard climbed on a table and attempted to speak, but he was jeered and hooted at until his voice could not be heard. Toomey clambered up beside him and screamed his orders as chairman, and he, too, was greeted with hisses and yells of derision. Once or twice a fight was imminent and several blows were passed in the crowd. Howard called for the ayes and noes and declared Porter elected committeeman. Porter attempted to speak, but was hissed down. Toomey waived his hat to command silence.

"Shut up," yelled some one in the crowd.

"I'll come down there and climb your collar," elegantly remarked Toomey.

"Climb whose collar?"

"Yours; you know me," continued Toomey, with a yell like a Comanche Indian. "Hands off," "put 'em out," "knock 'im off the table," hisses, groans and oaths followed. Howard, Porter and his friends left the hall, fairly driven out by the gang. Toomey then organized what he called the twenty-second ward convention, and declared Egger the committeeman. Egger was boosted on a table (which, by the way, was a poker table), and Mr. Egger made a little speech. He entertained all motions in the affirmative. The negative side of a question was not thought of, particularly as Mr. Toomey made all the motions and introduced all the resolutions. The poker table and the starch box were moved up to the door, and as the gang walked out a ticket was dropped in. Everyone voted that wanted to, no matter what their age or politics, and Egger was declared elected by the Tin Horn crowd. As might be expected, a wide split among the republicans of the ward is the result. The gang's bulldozing methods were condemned by the better element. "We can not expect to beat all the potato peddlers and democrats in this end of town," said a business man. "This affair is disgraceful, and will result in a democrat's election. We are tired of Toomey and his gang, and don't propose to submit any longer." "None of Porter's friends cast a vote," said another. "Do you suppose we would vote for a man put up by a gang like that?"

The question as to who is the committeeman elected—Porter or Egger—will probable come up before the city committee. That organization is controlled by Tin Horns, and Egger blows with them. The claim that he had been appointed temporary committeeman by the city committee made by Mr. Toomey, is questionable. Mr. Howard was the old committeeman, and would hold over until his successor was elected, and the city committee had no right, it is claimed, to declare his office vacant and appoint another in his stead. "He was elected by the people," said one of Howard's friends, "and the committee could not remove him, especially as Mr. Howard has been attending to his duties. There was no vacancy. Howard was chairman of the convention, and Porter is the legally elected committeeman. Toomey was an interloper, and had no authority to act as a chairman."—Indianapolis News, August 28, 1890.

IV.

A Donnybrook fair isn't a circumstance to the riot that marked the democratic first ward caucus to-day, and in the midst of it was the Hon. William F.

Sheehan, leader of the democrats in the assembly and Gov. Hill's right bower. He was supported by several of his creations, among them a dairy inspector and a section superintendent of the Erie canal.

Gasman Bradley wanted a renomination for alderman, and Iceman Sullivan was after the same office. Sheehan considers Bradley a juggler, and so he was for the iceman. The chairman of the ward committee, Charles McDonough, is a Sullivanite, and during the saloon hours, when honest men were asleep, last night, it is said that Sheehan, McDonough, and a few others put up the "job," and early this morning a gang of Sullivan's men swarmed around the voting place and took entire possession of the sidewalk, the building, and the room wherein the ballot boxes were to be placed. When Bradley and his friends arrived they could not get within a gun-shot of the polls. Finally a few of the most valiant fought their way into the room with Jack O'Connell at their head. O'Connell tried to talk, but he was "fired out" immediately. Then the Bradley crowd picked up Tom Shay and pushed him through the transom over the door. Toomey just touched the floor when he was bounced out. Others went in and were put out in the same way. "Billy Sheehan is inside," shouted a man who was clinging to the awning irons in front of the place. "Put him out, he has no right there." In about an hour Bradley came out covered with perspiration. He had been ejected by the police. He was excited, and said: "They have robbed us of the organization." He then began distributing his tickets.

"Hold a caucus outside, Johnny," said one of his adherents. "Let us organize here."

Mr. Sheehan came out later. He, too, was very warm and showed the effect of the effort to organize with the struggling mass. He said: "All there is to it is that Sullivan had the ward committee and Bradley wanted to get the organization. He tried to make an independent movement and was put out." Bradley mounted a wagon and tried to make a speech. The wagon was pulled away, but it was dragged back, and Mr. Bradley managed to keep his balance long enough to say that the Irish coercion act was not a marker on the methods taken by Sheehan and his gang to coerce and beat him out of a nomination which he was justly entitled to, and that he then and there withdrew from the caucus and was a candidate of the people regardless of the gang who propose to rule or ruin the democratic party in the first ward.—Buffalo dispatch to New York Times, October 14, 1890.

A caucus of the democratic electors of the second ward was held in the livery stable, No. 136 Carroll street, yesterday afternoon. The polls opened at 4 p. m. and the voting was done by register.

"It was rather a tame affair this year," a bystander sententiously remarked. "Nobody was arrested, and the stable is in as good repair as ever, and no furniture was destroyed with the exception of a stove."

"They had a divil of a time," said one of the three policemen on duty, at the end of the count. "When they began to elect a chairman, the divil was to pay then, and five men were standing on that little table at the same time. We had to send for the patrol wagon with more men, and we clubbed the room out twice, before we got any order."

Alderman Frank J. Trautmann and John F. Burke were the rival candidates for the aldermanic nomination. Alderman Trautmann's friends got there first and crowded into the little seven-by-nine office of the livery stable and left no room for Burke's dilatory backers. Then the fun began. Each candidate wanted his own chairman, for each knew that that meant his nomination. Trautmann's friends finally secured their chairman and the other party threw up the sponge. The caucus resulted as follows:

For alderman, Frank J. Trautmann, 108 majority; for supervisor, Thomas H. Munsell; for constable, Wm. Chandler. About 280 votes were cast.

The defeated candidate, Mr. John F. Burke, said to an Express reporter last evening after the smoke of the battle had cleared away: "The men attending the caucus fought for two hours like human tigers. The caucus should have been organized at four o'clock, but it was impossible to elect a chairman for two hours; there were ten policemen present, and all took a hand in the affair and clubbed everybody into line for Trautmann. I understand Police Commissioner Illig sent for one man—a Seneca-street saloon keeper—and told him that unless he came out and worked for Trautmann his license would be revoked. The saloon keeper told me so. I was clubbed and my hat was crushed in the melee. I never before witnessed such a struggle. A great many outsiders voted, and the way the proceedings were conducted was outrageous. One cause of the trouble was that a fight was made against William F. Sheehan's ward ticket, and he was knocked out. I have no thought of contesting the result of the caucus."—Buffalo Express, October 10, 1891.

VI.

A thirteenth-ward democratic caucus is generally a sight for gods and men. Yesterday's was no exception. Though the day passed without an actual display of fistic hostilities, the feeling ran none less high. There was a merry war all around. Three candidates were in the field for the aldermanic nomination. They were ex-Alderman Adams, Willis J. Crane, and Alderman "Tosh" Summers. And the last was first in this case. Alderman Summers scored a genuine triumph in the caucus, and the other candidates were left so far in the rear that it was with difficulty that they realized they had been in the race.

Queer methods prevailed at the caucus. In the first place, Alderman Summers had the ward committee so well "fixed" that they directed that the caucus should be held at James Welsh's saloon, No. 1145 Seneca street. This was manifestly an unfair place to hold the caucus, as it was clear over to one end of the ward, and well nigh inaccessible to over half the inhabitants of the ward. One member of the committee, Henry Clark, refused to sign the call for the caucus in this place. Next, the hour as set by the committee for holding the caucus was from two to eight o'clock. Instead of that the time was extended until nine o'clock. And finally, it was asserted on all sides that everybody, irrespective of party lines, was allowed to vote. The etiquette in the thirteenth in regard to this little matter does not seem to be very lofty.

When the votes were about to be counted, and all the candidates were collected in the room with the caucus committee, Chairman Manning broke silence, and said: "Before we open the ballot-boxes, is there any objection to the way this caucus has been held?"

Engineer Crane and Alderman Summers said they were satisfied. Not so ex-Alderman Adams. He boldly stated that the whole thing was a fraud from beginning to end, and he was not satisfied.

"Do you charge the committee with fraud?" asked one of its members.

"No, I don't say that the committee has acted wrongfully," answered Mr. Adams, but he did not retract his assertion that the whole thing was a fraud, neither would he promise to support the caucus nominee.

"Well, as long as he doesn't charge the committee with fraud, let's open the boxes," said the chairman. Forthwith the boxes were opened and the counting began. According to the list 748 men had voted, but the committee announced 768 ballots, of which Alderman Summers had received 443, Mr. Crane 233, and William Adams 94, a total of 770. The discrepancy was not accounted for, and besides 22 ballots were thrown out.

The vote for supervisor was as follows: Thomas Fletcher 448, Mr. Weyand 180, W. S. Wiles 139. For constable, Arthur Mullen received 278 votes and Robert Hughes 481.

As soon as the result was announced ex-Alderman Adams left the room in high dudgeon. To an Express reporter he unbosomed himself as follows: "The whole thing was a fraud, from first to last. Look at the place they held caucus. None of my friends could get over here. This is Summers's stronghold. He lives right near here, and so, too, does Crane. It is eight miles from my part of the ward. It took me over an hour to get here, so you can see how far it is. Republicans were allowed to vote as well as democrats. And look at the place where the voting was done. There were lights at both ends of the block, and that was all. It was as dark as a pocket there, and no one could tell who was voting. Notice, too, how the ballots came out. The whole thing was run in Summers's interest."

When asked whether he was going to run as an independent candidate, Mr. Adams would not say "yes," though it was evident that he thought seriously of so doing. Some of his friends assert that he will undoubtedly run.

After the caucus "Tosh" "set 'em up" to the boys. There was a very rum crowd collected in the saloon, and they must have run up a pretty big beer bill for the president of the common council. With his 210 majority, however, he cared not how much beer was drunk.—Buffalo Express, October 10, 1890.

VII.

They say experience is a teacher, but Brooklyn republicans don't seem to find it so. They fought last year over the control of the local organization and were snowed under on election day. Now they are fighting just as bitterly as before, with this difference—no actual bribery has been discovered. The fight is along the same lines, however, Woodruff against Nathan [internal revenue collector], and a great amount of bad blood has been created. Franklin Woodruff said to a Times reporter the other day:

"Mr. George B. Forrester can have the chairmanship of the general committee if he wants it, and he wants it bad."

"Would you take it again, Mr. Woodruff?"

"Not if a salary was tied to it," was the reply. "I didn't want it last year, but the opposition set up such a howl, and 'Al' Daggett came over here and opened headquarters and began to shout 'Anything to beat old Woodruff' until finally I had to go in and make a fight or go out of office under a cloud. I fought, but I wouldn't do it again. I've had enough of this kind of politics." Some of Mr. Woodruff's old friends and allies in this committee fight do not agree with him about the probable result of the election next Tuesday evening. Clarence A. Barrow, the secretary of the general committee, and always a consistent Woodruff man, said a day or so ago:

"I don't think Forrester has 'a snap' at all. In fact, I think Nathan will control the committee and the organization during the remainder of the year. I think he will run it to the lowest ebb and will then get kicked out, after which the party will begin to pick up."—New York Times, January 11.

VIII.

A last effort was made last night to harmonize the Woodruff and anti-Woodruff factions in the Brooklyn republican machine and to agree upon a candidate to be elected chairman of the Kings county republican general committee on Tuesday night. The Woodruff people appointed Naval Officer Willis, William H. Leayercraft, Israel F. Fischer, Jacob Brenner, and Major E. H. Hobbs a committee to confer with a committee of Nathan adherents. This latter committee consisted of David A. Baldwin, William J. Beattie, John K. Smith, George F. Elliott, and Michael J. Dady.

The committees met in the old party headquarters, at 153 Lawrence street, went away up to the top floor, and posted guards and sentinels below. Reporters were rigidly excluded. The Woodruff people made a demand that George B. Forrester should be nominated, while Baldwin and his associates wanted W. W. Goodrich selected.

After discussing these names for over three hours the conferrees came to the conclusion that they could never agree, and so they adjourned. The Nathan men reported to a caucus then in session in Everett Hall the failure to agree on a compromise candidate. There were 180 members of the general committee in this caucus, over which William C. Bryant presided. After considerable discussion Goodrich was named for the office of chairman of the general committee as the candidate of the caucus, and by a unanimous vote he was selected. The entire Nathan faction will vote for him on Tuesday night.

In the meantime the Woodruff committee reported back to the Woodruff caucus in Waverly Hall, in Waverly avenue, and this caucus decided to support Forrester for chairman. There were 150 men in this caucus. It will require 203 votes to elect on Tuesday night.—New York Times, January 11.

IX.

The republican machine in Kings county was organized for 1891 last night, and Internal Revenue Collector Ernst Nathan was on hand to boss the job. He succeeded, too. The Athenæum, on Atlantic avenue, where the general committee met, was packed to the doors, and Nathan's lieutenants were all over. They included David A. Baldwin, George F. Elliott, W. H. N. Cadmus, James C. Fuller, ex-Assemblyman Taylor, and a number of others. The Woodruff faction, which wanted to elect George B. Forrester president, was led by Naval Officer Willis, Port Warden Leayercraft, United States District Attorney Johnson, and "Bob" Sedgwick.

Both sides were extremely confident, and before the committee met some heavy bets were made. One of $100 to $90 on Forrester was taken six times over, but later on the odds were in favor of W. W. Goodrich, the Nathan candidate. The fight was the old one of Nathan against Woodruff, and Nathan won it.

The retiring president, Franklin Woodruff, called the meeting to order as soon as the members had paid their dues for the ensuing year. Under the new by-laws this pre-payment of dues became the most important feature of the evening, for the possession of a receipt for $10 was the credential that each member had to have before he could vote. The first business was a call for resignations, and thirty-five were received. The only important ones were those of S. V. White, Robert J. Tilney, Col. John W. Jones and "Billy" Watson. Elijah K. Kennedy, the weak-kneed Moses of the twenty-second ward, was so disgusted at his inability to get control of the general committee that he refused to qualify or attend the meeting at all, but he did not produce his much-advertised resignation.

It was 9:30 o'clock before President Woodruff announced that the election of a president was in order, and that no nominating speeches would be made, but that each delegate, as his name was called should announce his choice. The first ward went solidly for Forrester. So did the second, but Goodrich got 9 out of the 10 votes in the third. He received the entire vote of the fourth, and all but 1 of the 6 in the fifth.

The first sensation came when Luther W. Emerson of the seventh rose to vote. He made a speech, and said: "I am sick and tired of this factionalism; sick and tired of being counted as a sheep or a goat according to the boss that claims me. We had lots of fun out of this factional fight, but last fall 20,000 republicans failed to appreciate the fun or to see where the joke came in. Now is the time, when the democratic hulk is water-logged, for us to come in and sink her. I can not, therefore, vote for either of the factional candidates presented, but cast my vote for Eugene D. Berri."

This produced lots of applause, and one other delegate voted for Berri. The others went on with the fight. There was loud hissing and cat-calling when "Mike" Dady voted for Goodrich, and cheering when Jonas M. Farrington, an old Woodruff man, deserted to the Nathan candidate. When the last vote was polled Goodrich was found to have received 212, while Forrester had only 166. This announcement was received with tumultuous cheers and more enthusiasm than had been seen in the committee before for over two years. Finally a committee was sent after Mr. Goodrich.

When they brought him in Mr. Woodruff made a little speech, urging a cessation of strife in the future. He thanked everybody, and then introduced his successor. Mr. Goodrich expressed pleasure that there had been no personal aspersions during the canvass. He thought that no jealousies would remain and that harmony must prevail.

"I have pledged myself," said Mr. Goodrich, "to be the chairman of no faction, but of the general committee. We have made gross mistakes, but they have been confined to neither of the factions. Now we are all disgusted, and we must cry 'quits.'"

He then went on to deny that he had ever voted the democratic ticket in his life, unless the Greeley ticket could be called a democratic one. As for the charge that he had sent ex-President Cleveland a telegram beginning "Hail to the chief," Mr. Goodrich said that his friends understood it, and as for others he didn't care a cent."

Then he gave Mr. Forrester a chance to speak, and the defeated candidate pledged his support to Mr. Goodrich. The men back of Forrester were disgusted by this time, and they made no protest when George F. Elliott had the following slate elected: Vice-presidents, John R. Smith, J. S. Ogilvie, W. H. N. Cadmus, W. S. Ryan; secretary, Warren S. Treadwell; treasurer, Jas. W. Birkett.—New York Times, January 14.

X.

Although this is the politicians' off season, they have plenty of things about local organizations to discuss. This week will bring with it two primary elections. The republican primary will be held Tuesday and the Tammany primary on Friday. As already indicated in The Times, the republican primaries will develop into contests in some of the districts; perhaps the most interesting one will be in the twentieth assembly, where there is a stiff opposition to the continued leadership of Police Justice Solon B. Smith. This fight against Smith is mainly interesting because it indicates that republicans not only in the twentieth district, but elsewhere throughout the city, are heartily sick of the Tammany influence that is exerted within their party.

Smith has so often been accused of being friendly to Tammany that people have come to believe that his management of the twentieth district is by no means wholly in the interest of the republican party. Another thing that operates against Smith in the present fight is that he is anti-Platt, and that he is a member of the republican state committee. Platt would like very much to have him off the state committee, and, of course, Platt's friends in the district are going to do their utmost to beat him. William A. Gans, who is the leader of the opposition to him, will have an opposition ticket in the field, but it is the judgment of most of the politicians who are watching this fight with interest that Smith can not be beaten this year because he has the machinery of the district too well in hand.—New York Times, Jan. 11.

XI.

The republican primaries were held in all the assembly districts in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth wards yesterday. In three of the districts—the fifth, thirteenth and twentieth—there were lively contests, and in each case the faction already in power won the fight. In the fifth an effort was made to depose Stephen B. French, and in the twentieth the fight was against Police Justice Solon B. Smith. Both Smith and French came out on top. In the thirteenth the old fight between the Fred S. Gibbs and the Cowie-Sprague factions was fought over again, and Gibbs, who has been ejected from the republican county committee, won after a sharp struggle. In the sixteenth district Richard Lush succeeds Henry Kropf as leader as a result of Mr. Kropf's retirement. The total result of the primaries leaves the executive committee of the republican county committee practically as it has been for the past year. T. C. Platt is in control, of course, and he is credited with gaining one man more in Richard Lush of the sixteenth.

There were no serious encounters in Gibbs's district, but uncomplimentary phrases were thrown back and forth very freely. The ticket headed by Henry L. Sprague was defeated by a majority of 97 in favor of the Gibbs men. At first it looked as though the result would be very close, but in the evening scouts were sent out by the Gibbs crowd to the saloons and street corners to trap such republicans as they could find, and a long line ranged up before the ballot-boxes. The contest grew bitter as the time neared for closing the polls, and efforts on the part of the Gibbs adherents to substitute their voters in the line called forth a wordy war, but a large squad of police kept all desire for fistic encounters in check.

The line reached down stairs from the republican rooms in the Grand Opera House to the sidewalk when the polls were closed. The total vote was 563, of which the ticket headed by Gibbs's men received 330 votes to 233 for that of the Cowie-Sprague faction. An incident of the day was the marching in of a large body of drivers and conductors on the Twenty-third Street Cross-Town railroad under the guidance of Mr. Cowie.

The statement was circulated in the fifth district that Stephen B. French had retired, and that the struggle for the leadership would be among four contestants. They were named as Frank J. Carroll, "The" Allen, Andley J. Mooney, and Cornelius Donovan, who waged an unsuccessful fight against Col. Fellows for congress last fall. But at 3 o'clock, when the polls opened, there were only two tickets in the field. Within the twenty-four hours preceding there had been an amalgamation of the contending forces, and the fight settled down to a question of supremacy between the French-Dodd-Mooney clan on the one side and the Donovan-Carroll clique on the other.

James T. Snedeker was chairman of the primary, with Edward Kinley, Henry Brockmeier, and Terence Radford as enrollment clerks and inspectors. Seated in the rear of the hall in which the primary was held was ex-Police Commissioner French, surrounded by a few of his workers. "All I want is a vindication," he said to a Times reporter. "I have been maligned in this district for a long time simply because I won't submit to dictation. If I am re-elected I shall see that the district is in proper hands and will then resign."

A feature of the struggle was the hot and furious work done by "The" Allen. It had been expected that he would hold aloof or at least lend his support to Donovan and Carroll, but he appeared on the French side and watched the ballot-boxes closely.

The first skirmish occurred when a German attempted to vote on the name of Gerard. He was challenged by George Cooper on behalf of the Donovan-Carroll forces. Ten minutes later the same man appeared and said his name was Meyer. Again he was challenged, and while his case was being argued he slipped away.

A would-be voter who seemed to be in the last stages of consumption said that his name was George Keegan, and that he lived at 9 Varick Place.

"I challenge this man!" yelled Allen, and immediately the opposing factions assumed the attitude of battle.

"On what ground?" demanded the chairman.

"That his name is not Keegan."

Then the real Keegan came to the front and the French adherents demanded the arrest of the man. The consumptive said that his name was Haynes; that he had met Carroll, and that Carroll had asked him as a favor to vote on the name of Keegan. He didn't think it was wrong, and had agreed to do so. He was allowed to go.

An Italian attempted to vote twice on different names, but he was caught and hustled out of the polling place.

After 6 o'clock the battle proper occurred. Men who for weeks had been the habitués of the lodging houses of the district flocked in and attempted to vote, but the challengers of both sides were wary and exercised their functions. Scores of men came up to the polling tables with their hats off and gave names which were not on the enrollment list.

Just at 9 o'clock there were loud cries for the polls to close. The hall was densely packed, but Chairman Snedeker exercised his prerogative and, guided by his watch, closed the polls. At that time there were at least fifty men in line. The result was announced as follows: French ticket, 279; Donovan ticket, 102; scattering, 5.

The effort to put an end to Police Justice Solon B. Smith's leadership of the republicans of the twentieth assembly district was not successful. William A. Gans, who headed the opposition ticket, made a stout fight, but he was outnumbered three to one. He, however, made Smith's friends work to save him. Mr. Gans and his followers object to Judge Smith's leadership because the district has been making so poor a showing in republican affairs lately, and be- cause there is a strong suspicion that Mr. Smith is a very good Tammany republican. Mr. Smith had all his workers at the polls, and several who have moved out of the district were on hand to use arguments in his favor. Henry C. Perley and City Marshal Goode were the leaders of the Smith contingent. Curiously enough, the main arguments in Smith's favor used by them was that if he was defeated as leader the chances that Mayor Grant would re-appoint him as a police justice would be diminished. They went on the theory that Grant would re-appoint him if he was re-elected leader. Smith succeeded in getting 169 votes for his ticket, while Mr. Gans got 61. The latter said that he did not expect to win under the circumstances, but he thought that he had made a start in the right direction. —New York Times, January 14.

XII.

The results in the republican primaries last night were discouraging to the anti-Tammany republicans. Wherever a district leader, who had been accused of secretly aiding or favoring Tammany or Tammany schemes, sought a "vindication," he got it. Frederick S. Gibbs triumphed over James A. Cowie in the thirteenth, and as soon as the result of the vote was announced gave utterance to a dramatic speech which teemed with defiance to ex-Senator Thomas C. Platt. Gibbs is not "out of the woods" yet, though. The Cowie people charge that the primary was carried by fraud, and will contest the election in the county committee. The Platt people still have a majority in the committee.

In the twentieth district Solon B. Smith proved himself entitled to a re-appointment as police justice by Mayor Grant by defeating his opponent, William A. Gans, by a vote of about five to one.

Henry C. Botty, the first lieutenant of ex-Alderman Thomas Rothwell of the "boodle board" of 1884, is to succeed Jacob M. Paterson in the leadership of the tenth district. Botty will be merely the nominal leader, Rothwell will really control the organization.

Stephen B. French was re-elected in the fifth district. He played a very quiet game. Yesterday his friends announced that he was willing to retire, but might run a ticket in the primary. When the primary was opened it was found that there was a full French ticket in the field, and that it was backed up by the Dodd and Allen factions. The opposition ticket was supported by Frank Carroll and Cornelius Donovan. —New York Evening Post, January 14.

XIII.

The ring "let itself loose" in Hudson county at the primaries for the election of new members of the county democratic committee Monday night. The boxes were all manned by the most active and offensive of Davis's gang of ballot-box stuffers. At one of the precincts Davis was a candidate himself for election. He had the assurance to offer John A.

Whelan, one of the ballot-box stuffers now on trial, as a candidate in another precinct. Whelan was beaten, but the ticket that the heelers forced was successful everywhere else.

One gang of repeaters made the round of the second district polling places and carried things with a high hand. In many precincts the polls were opened in advance of the advertised hour to let the heelers get their ballots in without challenge, and closed when it was seen that an army of opposition voters had been marshaled outside the booth. In another precinct the heelers were divided into one line, leaving the opposition crowd in another line. The police kept the opposition crowd from voting, while the heelers got in their ballots, and then the polls were suddenly closed. In the seventh district ballots were voted in bunches, and where the decent democrats succeeded in carrying the polls they were boldly counted out.

Yesterday warrants were issued for the arrest of William English, John Carroll, Luke Conniff, and John English, of the ninth precinct of the sixth district for stuffing the box. There will be no end of protests when the executive committee meets; but there is small hope of the results of the fraudulent practices being set aside.

The trial of the indicted election officers who officiated at the polling place in the second precinct of the second district in the fall of 1889 was continued before Judge Lippincott in Jersey City yesterday. The evidence submitted was that of an array of men from whose houses voters appeared on the poll-books as having voted. They all swore that no persons owning the names on the poll record resided in the buildings assigned to them.

State Committeeman James C. Young testified that he had found a young man named Waddick in a liquor saloon on election day, and that Waddick had a number of stamped and wetted "joker" ballots in his possession. He was giving them out to workers.—New York Times, Nov. 26.

ADDRESS OF THE CIVIL SERVICE REFORM ASSOCIATION OF BUFFALO.

To the Citizens of Buffalo:

The late decisions of the court of appeals establishing the validity of the state civil service statutes, and Mayor Bishop's recent extension of the competitive system to a large additional number of city offices seem to warrant our calling public attention to the law and your duties and privileges thereunder. This we desire to do briefly and simply.

THE CIVIL SERVICE LAW AND RULES SETTLED BY THE COURTS.

First. As a matter of fact, the constitutionality of the civil service act and the legality of the rules and regulations prescribed by the mayor for its enforcement have been declared in the most explicit manner by the highest court in the state. Hereafter, those aldermen who have for years been in rebellion against the law and the public officials who have sympathized with them and more or less openly endeavored to defeat the operation of the law will not have even the semblance of excuse for like conduct.

ALDERMEN AND OTHER OFFICIALS WILL TAKE NOTICE.

The statute (Laws 1884, section 8) provides touching such rules and regulations as follows: "It shall be the duty of all those in the official service of such city to conform to and comply with any regulations made pursuant to this act, and to aid and facilitate in all reasonable and proper ways the enforcement of all regulations, and the holding of all examinations that may be required pursuant to this section."

We invite the attention of every city official to this mandate of the law.

NEARLY ALL CITY PLACES IN COMPETITIVE SCHEDULE.

Second. As a matter of fact also, the competitive system extends to nine-tenths of all the official services of the city outside of the educational department.

No vacancies in any one of those places can be filled except by fairly competing for the place before the examiners, and winning it upon the applicant's merit.

There are nearly eleven hundred of these places, the compensation ranging from $1,200 a year down to $1.50 a day.

In the water department seven places only are excepted; in the fire department six places only; in the police department six places only; in the health department only one place; in the city poor relief department but one place, while in the other departments, except those of the comptroller and treasurer, most of the places are in the competitive schedule of the civil service regulations.

In short, the public service of this city is at last practically taken by law out of the spoils system.

A MAYOR AND COMMISSION WHO WILL ENFORCE THE LAW.

Third. We have a mayor who is heartily in favor of enforcing the law, and we have also a live and earnest civil service commission.

FAIR COMPETITION AND NOTHING ELSE WILL WIN.

Fourth. As a necessary consequence it follows that if any one wants one of these city places he must apply for it under the civil service rules and he will have a fair chance to obtain it.

Heretofore the enemies of the law have induced many people to believe that it was time and trouble thrown away to apply, under these rules, for a place the appointment to which was to be made by an official who was not of the same politics with the applicant.

In some cities there may have been foundation for such a charge. Many federal officials undoubtedly have been glad to have such an idea disseminated. It was an easy way to discredit the law and to cause none but political friends to apply for places. There have been also many officials in our own City Hall who were more than ready to sneer at the law and to decry it as "a humbug." So long as the validity of the law was in debate they were not afraid to do this.

But the day has passed for this sort of thing.

The opponents of civil service reform have been beaten everywhere.

THE CIVIL SERVICE LAW "HAS COME TO STAY."

Few thoughtful men now doubt that the reform system "has come to stay" and that it will be extended gradually to the great majority of subordinate administrative places both in state and nation, except such as are filled by the direct vote of the people.

Its friends do not pretend that its methods have reached perfection. On the contrary they welcome every suggestion for improvement in those methods.

But it is safe to say that the law will never be blotted from our statute books. Every day makes it stronger. Every day makes it clearer that it is necessary; that it lies at the foundation of ballot reform, of municipal reform, and of every practical movement towards a purer politics and a true government of the people by the people.

OFFICE SEEKING UNDER THIS LAW IS HONORABLE.

And now, nothing is wanted to make it irresistible and to develop its beneficence to the full, except its practical use by the people without distinction of party.

These public places are legitimate objects of ambition for capable and faithful men. They are open to all; no official who cares for his oath or his personal liberty dares lay a straw in the way of any applicant because of his politics.

Citizens of Buffalo, we earnestly press these considerations upon your attention.

Especially do we address the young men, many of whom are seeking places. Why should they not look for them in the service of the city? The odium that under the spoils system is incurred by "office seeking" can not attach to the manly strife for official place under the reform law.

Let them inform themselves then as to vacancies in such places as they aspire to fill, and present themselves for examination. Let them dismiss from their minds the idea that political connections or influence must be employed by them. They need not be; they can not be so employed. Personal influence is of no use here. Much more than places in private service are these places to be had because of personal merit only.

Applicants have not to ask for them. They have no political work to do for them—neither they nor their families or friends. They may demand these places of their own right if they show themselves on a fair competition to be the best men.

And when they have obtained places the practical fact is that they can hold them just as long as they conduct themselves as they ought and discharge their duties faithfully.

WHEN THE BATTLE IN BUFFALO WILL BE WON.

When it is once made plain that they know and will insist upon their rights under the civil service reform law to compete for these places as they would for a situation on a railroad, or in a bank, or with an insurance company, or a manufacturing company, or with any other employer who needs service of similar character and is willing to pay for it, the battle of civil service reform in Buffalo will be won.

APPEAL TO CITIZENS.

To all citizens we say: There never was a more democratic system than that which the civil service law and rules provide. They recognize no claim to these places but the claims of manhood, honesty and ability. There was never a less democratic system than that degrading and corrupting one which so long has parceled out these places as spoils.

We invite you then not only to believe that the civil service statutes and the rules and regulations prescribed by the mayor are law and must be obeyed, but we earnestly request you to avail yourselves of their benefits and to co-operate with us for their enforcement.

BUFFALO, December, 1890.

CURRENT NEWS.

The report of Theodore L. De Land, examiner in the treasury department, and a long-time advocate of the merit system, is a document of some ninety-two pages. It is an instructive and encouraging statement of the workings of the competitive system, and contains a large number of specimen examinations.

Civil Service Reform, Its Later Aspects, by William Dudley Foulke, is Economic Tract No. XXXI, and printed by the Society for Political Education, 330 Pearl street, New York City.

The annual report of the New York State Civil Service Commission states that the appointment of assistant physicians in the state hospitals will hereafter be determined by competitive examinations instead of pass examinations as heretofore. This was urged by the state commission in lunacy, and is a long step in advance. During 1890 999 persons were examined; in competitive examinations only 285; of these 62 received appointment; in the pass examinations [which are subject to about all the abuses of the purely spoils system] 714 were examined and 687 were appointed.

THE CIVIL SERVICE CHRONICLE is able to announce that its financial matters have been satisfactorily arranged for the coming year. Its managers thoroughly appreciate the prompt and generous manner in which its interests are being cared for. It is desirable that the circulation should be increased to the greatest possible extent especially through out the west and it is hoped that every friend of civil service reform will lend a hand. If he does not care for the paper for himself, he can see that some library, or club or person gets it.

MR. FOULKE is about to enter upon his duties as president of Swarthmore college. He has for a long time filled a large place as an enemy of the spoils system and those who keep in public life or profit in private life by that system need not flatter themselves that they have heard the last of him. It is expressly stipulated that the duties of his new position shall not interfere with his efforts for a better public service. Mr. Foulke has been a formidable man in this cause and in no respect more so than in his last work at Washington. The value and the singular power of his position there can not be over-estimated. Here was the platform upon which the Administration had been chosen and here was a man who had helped to choose it. He took his stand where he could see the operations of the government and gathering together a multitude of facts to support him he pointed out acts and said "This is not as you agreed. This is contrary to the platform upon which you were chosen, and it is also intrinsically wrong." In no case has he been refuted. The moral effect of such a work as has been done by Mr. Foulke is irresistible. No administration can withstand its silent leavening process among the people.

SINCE last month, a new movement against the spoilsmen in Indiana has attained unexpected prominence and has come to a present conclusion. Elsewhere is printed Senate Bill Number 272, introduced by Senator Magee, who was President Cleveland's minister at Stockholm. A glance at the bill shows that it had but a single intention, which was to take the eight charitable institutions of the state out of politics. The matter thus narrowed to a single issue, concerning which the people at large do not have two opinions, became a crucial test of individual humanity and political wisdom. The first noticeable feature of the movement was the enormous advance of public opinion. The Marion County Medical Society, without a dissenting voice, indorsed the competitive feature as applied to that profession. The Social Turn-Verein of Indianapolis, at a large meeting, after a full expression of opinion indorsed the whole bill unanimously. The Indianapolis Sentinel, the leading democratic paper of the state, earnestly advocated the adoption of the measure. All this happened within a few days, and there is no manner of doubt but that in a short time the public opinion of the whole state, in all the ways in which that opinion is expressed, would have been practically unanimous in favor of this bill. A section of small politicians in the general assembly are the only ones who have made no progress and who have not recognized the signs of the times. Senator Magee urged the bill with ability and great earnestness, in which he was supported by all the leading and the best men of the senate irrespective of party. When the vote was taken upon the passage of the bill it stood as follows:

UNDER the system which these twenty-six senators say shall be continued these charitable institutions have been for years and on a large scale the scenes of inhuman and devilish cruelty. With the rarest exceptions this cruelty is due to the system of place-filling controlled by party and personal favoritism. And to this system Senators Burke and Sweeney and Hudson and their followers turn as a dog turns to his vomit. Doctor Thompson of this county stands with them against the unanimous opinion of his county medical society. He is too old to learn anything and happily he will soon be too old to occupy public positions and obstruct progress. When the bill establishing the board of state charities was under consideration two years ago Senator Burke opposed it on the ground that he was opposed to anything which was not partisan. And he made it an objection to the present bill that the board of state charities had appointed as secretary a gentleman from Chicago and that a matron from the same city had been employed in the home for feeble-minded youth. He is a nice man for a law maker. Fellows like Burke have made Indiana public affairs a bye word through the country. Senator Thompson, of Pulaski, has a twelve year old son whom he has jumped about from one place to another at five dollars a day. At last accounts he was carrying the senate mail. This seems a small price, but it is evidently enough to smother in this Thompson feelings of pity for the insane.

SENATORS Hudson and Foley, of this city, voted stolidly against the bill. They pose as the representatives of working men, and the former is chairman of the committee on labor. They do not represent workingmen. When by their votes they say to the people of this state that working men are in favor of continuing the charitable institutions under the present infamous system, they insult workingmen and lie to the people. All the instincts of workingmen are for the betterment of the condition of those whose lot is harder. And their public expressions are in the same direction. We call the attention of these two bogus representatives of labor to the words of the Labor Signal in another column, and to the following resolution adopted at the annual session of the Indiana Federation of Trade and Labor Unions at Indianapolis, September 23, 1890:

WHEREAS We have witnessed the evil results of partisan control of state institutions, wherein all public interests are subordinated to the interests of party; therefore, be it Resolved, By the State Federation of Trade and Labor Unions, that we demand such legislation as place all state institutions under non-partisan control.

If the twenty-six democrats who voted in the negative had planned to put their party in the deepest hole with the narrowest mouth they could count the result as the greatest triumph of their political lives. The multitude who compose the democratic party are not in favor of the inhumanity to which these petty senators have committed them; but their party organization is irrecoverably bound by the result, and however undeservedly, the multitude must stand silent when the charge is made against the party. There is absolutely no escape; the republicans, to a man, with a wisdom which comes to republicans in a crisis, having voted on the right side. The gravity of the situation is fully shown by the following editorial from the Indianapolis Sentinel of February 21:

The democratic state senate on Thursday dealt the democratic party of Indiana a severe blow when it defeated Senator Magee's bill to regulate the selection of employes of the benevolent institutions. It is not in the power of the republicans of Indiana to do the democratic party of the state so grievous an injury as the twenty-six democratic senators inflicted upon it when they voted down this eminently just, wise and righteous measure. It is amazing that men who profess to be sagacious politicians, who are familiar with the recent political history of the state, who are acquainted with the wrongs which have been perpetrated in our benevolent institutions under shelter of the barbarous and infamous system of "patronage," which has converted them into asylums for cross-roads bummers and ward heelers, who know how much odium the democratic party has had to carry, much of it unjustly, because of the abuses growing out of the existing system—it is amazing, we say, that men priding themselves upon their sagacity as politicians should, when the opportunity was offered them, decline to relieve their party of a burden so oppressive.

The democratic senators who voted against Senator Magee's excellent bill committed an act of political folly so gross as to be almost criminal. The defeat of this measure will cost the democratic party thousands of votes at future elections. No party can hope to hold its own in this state which deliberately sets itself against the moral sentiment of the people; which plants itself across the pathway of progress and reform; which obstructs measures in whose behalf every consideration of humanity, decency and common justice demands.

We say to the twenty-six democratic senators who voted down Senator Magee's bill that they have placed the democratic party in a false position before the people; that the great democratic masses of Indiana do not approve their action and will not sustain them in it; that the representative democratic newspapers of Indiana will not apologize for it or defend it in any way. There is, in point of fact, no defense to be made for it. It is a manifestation of "peanut politics" in its most cruel and offensive form. That sort of politics is, thank God, pretty well played out in Indiana, and the politicians who practice it, and the party which tolerates it, will, sooner or later—and more likely sooner than later—come to grief.

We have no doubt that many of the democratic senators who voted to kill the Magee bill did so thoughtlessly; because of some prejudice against civil service reform, or some exaggerated idea of the political value of the patronage of the benevolent institutions. But whatever motive actuated them, they have shouldered an unnecessary burden upon the democratic party. Let no one doubt that such a measure as the Magee bill will, in due time, be placed upon the statute books of Indiana. This legislature refuses to do this righteous thing, but the next legislature, whatever its political complexion, will do it. Mark the prediction. The people of Indiana, without regard to party, are determined that the insane, the idiotic and the other helpless wards of the state shall not continue to be the victims of the barbarism which is now practiced under the shelter of the spoils system in our public institutions. Democratic senators may not realize the condition of public sentiment on this question, but the Sentinel does, and as a democratic journal which believes that it serves its party best when it serves its state best, it warns the legislature against a repetition of such serious mistakes as the senate made when it defeated the Magee bill.

INDIAN Commissioner Morgan appears to have been sent about the country to make speeches of general apology for the management of the Indians by the Administration. General Morgan apparently lacks the moral courage to stand by the facts. The sacrifice he thus makes to officialism is too great.

The Indians were starved, the treaties were not kept with them, they were put into the hands of politicians, and some of the leading agents were so incompetent that President Harrison had to remove them. No man has had as much to do with this or is so much to blame for it as Secretary Noble. He and President Harrison have repeatedly dismissed without cause experienced employes. They have established the "home rule" policy, by which the places in the Indian service were given to henchmen of congressmen in the vicinity like Royer. Secretary Noble has treated with supercilious contempt protests of people much more competent to judge than himself. It is not worth while for Commissioner Morgan to gloss over a record of incompetency and corruption which finally led to the loss of five hundred lives, men, women and children, and to an expense of two millions.

UPON the question of how the Indians have been treated, such witnesses as Bishop Hare and Herbert Welsh will hardly be discredited even by the statement of the President in his somewhat ungracious letter to the Cambridge Civil Service Reform Association, printed elsewhere. An additional witness also appears in Mrs. Cook, the wife of the Episcopal missionary to the Yanktons. Under date of January 22 she writes to Commissioner Morgan from Greenwood, South Dakota:

We have been suffering a season of unusual sickness, a mild form of la grippe having been epidemic, aggravated by the well-known tendency of our Indians to pulmonary troubles. Men, women, and particularly children, are lying sick everywhere. Though such is the state of things, we have been altogether without medical attendance for the past three weeks, except such as has been rendered un-professionally by missionaries and others. At special request the physician from Fort Randall was called down for twenty-four hours. During this time the medical man sent here by the department has been in Pierre, engaged in political work. During the past three months he has on two other occasions been absent for a week at a time, we are told, for the same purpose. Is it the intention of the department that 1800 persons should frequently be left for longer or shorter periods without the services of a physician who has been sent out for the express purpose of caring for them? If the services of any one man are indispensable to the successful management of Dakota politics, it would seem to the disinterested that that man should not assume the duties of physician on an Indian agency.

In the recent debate upon the attempt to strangle the civil service commission. Congressmen Cannon and Grosvenor repeatedly whined that no one could suggest any improvement upon the merit system without bringing down upon himself the charge of being a spoilsman. Probably this whining was partly hypocritical and partly the smart which came from the sound drubbing which these men and their likes have received of late. The improvements which they have in mind are such as Wanamaker's move in rushing into the railway mail service, a horde of congressmen's henchmen to get the start of the civil service law. Another improvement to the mind of these men was Raum's attempt to get the law set aside in order that a crowd of favorites might be chosen for the pension office. Still another improvement is the move fathered by Senator Plumb to transfer the employes of the census bureau into the other departments without competition. The bulk of the appointments in the census department was the riff-raff of political heelers and bummers. Having taken a census which will always be discredited, they are now fit, in the minds of the Grosvenors and the Cannons, for other public employment. If these employes have any experience that is worth anything it will avail them in open competition. To put them in as proposed would sap the foundations of the civil service law and that is what these congressmen are after. As long as they come forward with such suggestions, they may expect their hypocrisy and malice and greed, to be denounced.

LOCAL FREEBOOTING.

In another part of this paper are gathered together some random facts to illustrate how spoils ramify in a fine net work through every branch of the public business centering in Indianapolis. They extend only over the last two years. Indianapolis is the better object lesson because it is not a great city, nor is it by comparison especially corrupt. If a mass of such facts were to be examined by a barbarian his impression would be that a community where they exist must be terrorized by a majority steeped in corruption and hardened to evil. But the truth is that the great majority of this community are untouched by corruption or sympathy with corruption. These things go on because the Better Element is inclined to be lazy and is in fact selfish. Sin Coy affords an exact test of how his sort work for spoil and of how the Better Element work to protect the public and themselves. Coy is a disreputable and mercenary politician who was finally convicted and imprisoned for altering tally sheets. There was an outbreak of righteous indignation among the Better Element and for a little time they forsook private matters and became citizens in the true meaning of the word and they triumphed as they always do in like cases. Then they sat down apparently exhausted. But Coy came out of prison and resumed his business of getting spoil out of the public as if there had been no lapse. His work has been patient and unremitting and at the present moment like a busy bee he is flitting about the legislature actively in pursuit of sweets; and the Better Element looks on tranquilly.

When the Coy element fails, it is never discouraged. It gathers itself up for a fresh assault on some exposed position. When it fails and has to face the jeers that always go along with any failure, it is not sensitive; it does not bury itself and refuse again to expose itself. It shows a fine imperturbability; but the Better Element can not stand failure. Take these scandals, one by one, and consider the fact that an intelligent community has learned no lesson in the two years, and that every cause for every scandal is still left to produce a fresh crop.

In the fire department a capable man was displaced after years of conscientious service by a cabal as insignificant as it was malicious. Public opinion went far enough to see him restored after a time to his old place. But in the selection of his subordinates he is still left to be hounded by the Hicklins. His disposition is to have a department of the highest efficiency, but no one supposes for a moment that his time and strength will not be drawn upon to a large degree, to the detriment of the public service, to consider political and personal favorites for positions. It is asking little of this community to say that it should force Mr. Webster to throw the vacant places open to competition ascertained by practical tests; and that the politics of the applicants should be considered no more than their religion. And so in every other department the spoilsmen are pursuing their business unflaggingly, and the dilettante citizens observe the process curiously and helplessly.

THE END OF A SPOILS INVESTIGATION.

One of the odious features of a government run by spoils is its assassination of the character of the men it can not otherwise dispose of. It clings to the oriental practice of stabbing its victim in the dark. In the last administration, Dr. Sherer at the head of the sugar laboratory of the appraiser's office in New York was a shining mark. To any open attack he was impregnable, and his place could not be got for a henchman. Therefore secret charges of sugar frauds began to be whispered about, until a consent to an investigation was obtained. That investigation will always be a disgrace to those who allowed it. It was conducted by an irresponsible and unqualified newspaper reporter, secretly and with no opportunity to Dr. Sherer to meet the charges or the accusers. The peculiar baseness of such methods is that few honest people take the trouble and the time necessary to weigh the matter and very soon there was a wide spread impression that Dr. Sherer's official character was smirched. He was removed on the adverse report of this reporter, and, as the impression was conveyed, because his reading of the polariscope in testing sugar was lower than the Boston reading and must be corrupt. After a time and a vigorous protest he was reinstated; but the lower rating continued, and some special agents made an investigation and reported that they knew nothing about the rules of reading, but that Dr. Sherer was lower and was probably wrong and ought to be removed. He was removed, but under his successor the polariscope would not read high. Finally the government concluded to tackle the polariscopes of New York, Boston and Philadelphia, and Professor Tittman of the coast survey was set to work. The result is the complete vindication of Dr. Sherer, the Boston polariscope deviating forty-eight one-hundredths; the Philadelphia fifty-one one-hundredths and the New York only fifteen one-hundredths from the true standard.

The road to the vindication of an honest and capable man has been long and trying.
